ing, for the moment, what I regard as most unlikely—namely, that this Board, which deals with no religious questions, always divides as Catholics and non-Catholics, no doubt the results would be, as stated in the Question, if a member of one side or the other were absent, and all the other members were present; and the other contingencies of the kind may be almost indefinitely multiplied; but the defect—if it is one—is not peculiar to the Intermediate Board. The true test is the practical result; and the Government have no reason to suppose that the existing arrangement does not work well, or that the public are dissatisfied with it. It is true that hitherto there has been no Roman Catholic clergyman on the Board; but this will no longer be the case, as His Excellency has just appointed the Rev. John Egan, D.D., a Fellow of the Royal University, and at one time Principal of the Ennis Diocesan Training College, to the seat rendered vacant by the death of Lord O'Hagan.

NEW GUINEA—OCCUPATION OF NORTHERN COAST BY GERMANY.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have reason to believe that the Northern Coast of New Guinea has been, or is about to be, taken over by a private German Association for colonization and administration similar to the British North Borneo Company; whether such an arrangement would give Germany any greater sovereign rights in New Guinea than Great Britain has in Borneo; and, whether the right of such private Association to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects will be recognized by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: In reply to the first Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, Her Majesty's Government have no information as to the proposed administration of the Northern Coast of New Guinea by a private German Association similar to the North Borneo Company. In reply to the second Question, no sovereign rights are claimed by Great Britain in Borneo. The third is a hypothetical Question, and cannot be answered without a knowledge of the conditions under which such an Association would claim to exercise jurisdiction.

MR. GORST: I would ask whether Her Majesty's Government will make some inquiry as to the practical administration under which North New Guinea is placed by the German Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Of course, we always make inquiries in such cases.

CYPRUS—M. BISTACHI, CHIEF INSPECTOR OF REVENUE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is a fact that, on the sworn information of Mr. C. Sarsboghi, clerk to the Nicosia magistrates, a warrant for the arrest of Mr. Bistachi, Chief Inspector to Revenue, was issued; whether, during the period between the swearing of the information, its consideration by Sir Robert Biddulph, and the placing of the warrant in the hands of the police, Mr. Bistachi was allowed to leave the Island; whether the police have followed him, and whether any steps will be taken to secure his arrest; and, whether it is a fact that the Auditor occupies the same dwelling-house at Nicosia as Bistachi did up to the day of his absconding?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The sworn information of Mr. Saripolos was not preferred until after Mr. Bistachi had left Cyprus for Alexandria on leave of absence. He was immediately ordered by telegram to return, and has telegraphed that he will do so. The police would have no authority to arrest him in Egypt, where he had gone; and the offence with which he is charged—namely, receiving a bribe, is not an extraditable offence within the Schedule of the Cyprus Extradition Order in Council, 1881. Though we have no official information as to the latter part of the Question, I believe it to be a fact that the two gentlemen referred to, being bachelors, occupy separate parts of one large building.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether it was within the knowledge of the Colonial Office that Petitions, largely signed by both Greeks and Catholics, had been presented through the Christian Mission praying that the corrupt administration of Cyprus may cease, that the British will evacuate the Island, and that it may join the Hellenic Kingdom?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I have no knowledge of it.

ORDNANCE SURVEY—COUNTY OF HEREFORD.

MR. RANKIN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What is the cause of the great delay in the completion of the survey of the county of Hereford, and when it is probable that the 25-inch scale maps will be published for that county; and, whether it would be practicable to publish maps of those portions of the county which were already completely surveyed without waiting for the completion of the survey of the whole county?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The detailed survey of Herefordshire was begun last year, and has been proceeded with uninterruptedly, more than half the county having now been surveyed. There has been no delay in carrying on the work. The publication of the maps on the 25-inch and 6-inch scales of the northern portion of the county has been commenced, and will be continued as the plans of the different parishes are finished, as usual, without waiting for the completion of the survey of the whole county. I am not able to give the hon. Member a specific date when the publication of the plans of the entire county will be finished.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TEACHERS IN VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS
—MR. DRAPER.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been called to the dismissal of Mr. E. Draper, who had been for twenty-six years master of the parochial school of St. Giles, Northampton, for "want of sympathy with the general religious and church work of the parish, as evinced by his long-continued absence from the church," and the unsatisfactory Government Report just received; whether, in view of the fact that Mr. Draper's school earned more than 17s. 6d. per head and the "good merit" grant, the Department has its dissatisfaction with Mr. Draper; and, whether want of sympathy with the general religious and church work of a parish is to be regarded as a fitting reason for the dismissal of a master of a school receiving a Government grant?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Education Department has no complaint whatever against Mr. Draper. He is a good and successful teacher, his school was well reported on at the last examination, and he has earned a good grant. But it must be borne in mind that the teachers are the servants of the managers, not of the Education Department; and we have no power to interfere with the dismissal of a teacher by the managers of a voluntary school, whether the reasons for dismissal are justifiable or not.

THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS—ADMINISTRATION BY THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

MR. JOHN MORLEY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he proposes, during the present Session, to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the administration of the Endowed Schools Act by the Charity Commission; or whether he proposes to defer the inquiry until the new Parliament?

MR. MUNDELLA: I was fully prepared to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Endowed Schools Acts; but on conferring with several Members who are anxious for inquiry I found them all agreed that an inquiry during the present Session would prove abortive, and that it would be better to postpone it until the first Session of a new Parliament. Under those circumstances, I do not propose to move for a Committee this Session unless it is the general wish of the House that I should do so.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked if the Charity Commissioners would postpone the completion of any further scheme until the Committee should have reported, or, at least, those schemes such as were proposed for Sutton Coldfield and Horsham—with respect to which it was alleged that the rights of the poorer classes were being taken away in order to provide higher education at a cheap rate for the children of the rich—should be held over?

MR. MUNDELLA said, that it was impossible to arrest the work. The Commissioners would go on completing their schemes. He knew nothing of the schemes until they came before the Education Department. If there were any schemes involving such a question as that alluded to he would think it his duty to suspend them.

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—IRREGU-LAR PUBLICATION—THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRAWLING

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has yet been able to ascertain whether the irregularity of the Report of the Royal Commission on Trawling having been sent to the newspapers one week before it was laid upon the Table of this House, is owing to a breach of confidence on the part of the Government printer, or any other person having official access to the papers of the Commission; and, if not, could he explain the way in which it occurred? He begged to say that it was not his intention to make any insinuation against the Government printer or any other official; but he had not been allowed to put the Question as he framed it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, so far as he could make out, there was no breach of confidence on the part of anyone. The Report of the Commission ought to have been sent to the Home Office; but by some blunder it was sent to the Board of Trade. It reached the Board of Trade on the 28th of February; but it did not find its way to the Home Office till last Saturday. In the meantime, it was supposed that the Report had been sent to the Home Office, by whom it would have been communicated to the Queen and to the House of Commons, and in consequence of that the Report was allowed to be published. The whole thing arose from the blunder of sending it to the Board of Trade, who could not communicate the document to the Queen or the House of Commons.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: When will it be circulated?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It was circulated last Monday.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: It has not yet been circulated.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Then I shall make inquiries.

MR. RAIKES: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to state that the publication referred to was made by some official of the Board of Trade?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, Sir; I understand that either the Chairman or the Secretary of the Commission, believing it to have been duly communicated to the Queen and the House of

1. REASONING - The ability to think logically and solve problems.

1. The first step is to identify the problem. In this case, the problem is that the system is not working properly.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY
WASHINGTON, D. C.
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF
HEADQUARTERS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
1945

1. The first step is to identify the problem or question that needs to be addressed. This involves understanding the context and the specific requirements of the task.

2. Next, it is important to gather relevant information and resources. This can include researching existing solutions, consulting with experts, and identifying the tools and materials needed.

3. Once the information is gathered, the next step is to develop a plan or strategy. This involves breaking down the problem into smaller, manageable tasks and determining the sequence of steps to be followed.

4. The fourth step is to implement the plan. This involves carrying out the tasks identified in the plan, using the resources gathered, and monitoring progress as the work progresses.

5. Finally, it is essential to evaluate the results and reflect on the process. This involves assessing whether the problem has been solved, identifying any challenges encountered, and considering ways to improve the process for future tasks.

1. The first step in the process of the investigation is the identification of the problem. This is done by the investigator who is responsible for the study. The investigator must first identify the problem that is being investigated. This is done by the investigator who is responsible for the study. The investigator must first identify the problem that is being investigated.

1. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

1. The first step is to identify the problem or goal. This involves understanding the current situation and what needs to be achieved.

1. The first group of variables, demographic, includes age, sex, and marital status. The second group, education, includes years of schooling, high school graduation, and college graduation. The third group, employment, includes employment status, occupation, and industry. The fourth group, income, includes household income and personal income. The fifth group, health, includes self-rated health, physical health, and mental health. The sixth group, social, includes social network, social support, and social participation. The seventh group, psychological, includes life satisfaction, happiness, and psychological well-being. The eighth group, behavioral, includes smoking, drinking, and exercise. The ninth group, environmental, includes neighborhood safety, neighborhood quality, and neighborhood resources. The tenth group, policy, includes government policies, community policies, and workplace policies.

[illegible]

THE KENNEDY HAVE NOT OCCUPIED THE

1. Chlorophyll a (Chl a)

Isidor: I am-- I have no reason to believe that it is the only pass through the mountain north of Urumi available for a railway. The House will agree with me that it is not available, in the present state of the negotiations, to give information as to the claims of Russia.

Mr. STOREY
 the Secretary of State for the War has noticed the following extract quoted in The Times of 11th Nov. The North German Ge- zeiter

"We have referred to a map prepared by the Government of India for India, and described as being compiled principally from original authorities. It shows the boundary of Mier and Herat is shown about 20 English miles south of the confluence of the Khashk with the Murgab, and 10 miles south of that very subject lying on the left bank of the Murgab, and still about 20 miles north of Herat."

1. Whether the India Office is cognizant of or responsible for any such anti-

Mr. H. H. CHASE. The map referred to in The North German Gazette is apparently one of Persia prepared at the Indian Office in 1875 by Major St.
John. That map possesses no authority whatever as to any portion of country lying within the Persian Frontier; but it does lay down a point upon the Russian border 27 miles north of the confluence of the river with the Murghab.
It is in the vicinity between Merv and Herat. As the maps of Turkestan published between 1875 and 1885 under the authority of the Government of Russia show the boundary between Merv and Herat to the north of Benjuch.

- WANTED FOR MURDER - POLICE
 - ARREST OF LA
 - DEAD

Mr. JAMES COLLINGS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether attention has been called to the fact that in 1894 News of the following effect:—
"James and Thomas [names] were engaged in cutting wood, and they were taken into custody by a policeman and a policeman, and one of them charged before the magistrates at Aylesbury. Henry Thomas with [names] as if to see if there was anything about and then taking up a rail." According to the evidence of the witnesses, Thomas Wilson had no hand in the business, and was at work when his brother James found the rabbit, which he does not hesitate to declare was placed there by the game-keeper or the policeman, or by both. The Bench sentenced the two men to twenty-one days' imprisonment, with hard labour, and whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the circumstances of the case, and will state whether policemen, who are paid by public money, can be legally employed to act as game-keepers to private persons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that as he had not had time to ascertain the facts of the case, he would request the hon. Gentleman to postpone the Question.

LAW AND POLICE - WANDSWORTH POLICE COURT

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has lately again been called by the Local Authorities to the very defective and inadequate accommodation of the Wandsworth Police Court, whereby grave inconvenience and serious impediments to the due administration of justice are occasioned; and, whether he persists in his determination to defer dealing with this matter until after the indefinite date of the passing of the London Government Bill?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have never disputed that the inadequate accommodation at the police court referred to has been the cause of great inconvenience to the public, and I have long endeavoured to get the evil remedied. But I can now only repeat to the hon. Baronet the advice I gave him some months ago. I have exhausted my resources, and I am sorry to say I cannot get the necessary money. I shall be very glad, therefore, if the hon. Baronet will turn his batteries towards the Secretary to the Treasury instead of towards me.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE said, that as it was impossible for him to turn any battery on to the Treasury, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman on Monday whether his determination not to deal with this subject until the London Government Bill had passed would not have the effect of inflicting great inconvenience on the people of the

Wandsworth district for several years; and, whether the want of a proper court would not increase whether the London Government Bill passed or not?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will answer that Question at once. I have no such determination as that attributed to me by the hon. Baronet in the second half of this Question. On the contrary, I have been labouring week after week and month after month to get this thing done, and I do not mean to postpone the matter until after the passing of the London Government Bill.

EGYPT MILITARY EXPEDITION: THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY SUPPLY OF PUMPS.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, with reference to a letter he read from Messrs Tangyo alleging that the pumps for the Suakin-Berber water service could not be obtained for some months in England. Whether he is aware that the pumps for the Aldershot experimental service were ordered by Mr Tweddle Messrs S Owens and Co. on the 20th May last, and were completed and sent to Aldershot on the 4th June, and that Messrs S. Owens and Co. made all the oil line pumps required by Mr. Tweddle for the Caucasus; if he will state on what date the order for the pumps now making was given to Mr. Tweddle, and on what date they will be delivered in England; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Agreement with Messrs Edwards and Tweddle?

MR. BRAND: Yes, Sir; the pumps for the Aldershot trial were ordered from Messrs. Owens and Co., and the orders were completed in about the time mentioned; but they were not duplex pumps. They were much smaller than those required for the Suakin route. Mr. Tweddle informs me that he ordered three sets of Blake's large duplex American pumps from Messrs. Owens for use in the Caucasus; but he considers that they are inferior to the Worthington pumps. The right hon. Gentleman will confer a personal favour upon me if he will make inquiries and inform the House as to the time occupied by Messrs Owens in completing the order. I venture to say that the further he pursues his inquiry the more he will find that the action of the Depart-

Commons, thought, in the ordinary course, it might be circulated.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
KASSALA.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any further information respecting the garrison of Kassala, or whether there has been any further communication with that garrison; and, what are the numbers of the garrison and the inhabitants, respectively, according to the latest advices? The hon. Member added: I wish also to ask another Question on a telegram which I have only received during the last hour, and of which, therefore, I could give no Notice—

"According to rumours from Cairo, Kassala has fallen. Anyhow, mere question of time. Doubtful if Sultan has ever been bond fide invited to co-operate on fair terms."

I should like to ask whether the Sultan has been on fair terms invited to co-operate?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to the first portion of the hon. Member's Question, I have no further information to give than that contained in the replies already given in this House. According to a statement contained in Sir Evelyn Baring's despatch of December 3, 1883 (Egypt, No. 1, 1884, p. 125), the garrison consisted of 1,259 men. The population in 1881 is stated by Captain Gascoigne to have been from 25,000 to 30,000.

SIR HENRY TYLER: Will the noble Lord answer the further Question?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I must ask the hon. Baronet to put the further Question on the Paper.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Robat Pass, the only pass through the mountains north of Herat available for a railway, is now in Russian or in Afghan possession; and, whether it is within the territory claimed by Russia, but shown in Russian maps to belong to Afghanistan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Russians have not occupied the

Sir William Harcourt

Robat Pass. I have no reason to believe that it is the only pass through the mountains north of Herat available for a railway. The House will agree with me that it is not desirable, in the present state of the negotiations, to give information as to the claims of Russia.

MR. GOURLEY (for Mr. STOREY) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has noticed the following extract quoted in The Times of Tuesday from The North German Gazette—

"We have before us a map prepared by the Secretary of State for India, and described as compiled principally from original authorities, in which the boundary of Merv and Herat is drawn about 26 English miles south of the confluence of the Khushk with the Murghab, and 19 miles south of that very Penjdeh, lying on the left bank of the Murghab, and still about 94 miles north of Herat;"

and, whether the India Office is cognizant of, or responsible for, any such map?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The map referred to by The North German Gazette is apparently one of Persia prepared at the India Office in 1875 by Major St. John. This map possesses no authority whatever as to any portion of country lying outside the Persian Frontier; but in this map there is a point upon the Khushk River, 25 miles south of the confluence of that river with the Murghab, marked as the boundary between Merv and Herat. All the maps of Turkestan prepared between 1872 and 1883 under the authority of the Government of India show the boundary between Merv and Herat to the north of Penjdeh.

LAW AND POLICE (ENGLAND)—POLICE
AS GAMEKEEPERS—ARREST OF LA-BOURERS FOR PICKING UP A DEAD RABBIT.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a statement in The Daily News of Tuesday last, to the following effect:—Two labourers, James and Thomas Wilson, were engaged in cutting wood, when they were taken into custody by a gamekeeper and a policeman, and one of them charged before the magistrates at Ashford (Kent) Petty Sessions with "going round as if to see if there was anybody about, and then taking up a rabbit." According to the evidence of the witnesses, Thomas Wilson had no hand in the business, and was at work when his brother James found the rabbit, which he does not hesitate to declare was placed there by the gamekeeper or the policeman, or by both. The Bench sentenced the two men to twenty-one days' imprisonment, with hard labour; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the circumstances of the case, and will state whether policemen, who are paid by public money, can be legally employed to act as gamekeepers to private persons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that as he had not had time to ascertain the facts of the case, he would request the hon. Gentleman to postpone the Question.

LAW AND POLICE — WANDSWORTH POLICE COURT

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has lately again been called by the Local Authorities to the very defective and inadequate accommodation of the Wandsworth Police Court, whereby grave inconvenience and serious impediments to the due administration of justice are occasioned; and, whether he persists in his determination to defer dealing with this matter until after the indefinite date of the passing of the London Government Bill?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have never disputed that the inadequate accommodation at the police court referred to has been the cause of great inconvenience to the public, and I have long endeavoured to get the evil remedied. But I can now only repeat to the hon. Baronet the advice I gave him some months ago. I have exhausted my resources, and I am sorry to say I cannot get the necessary money. I shall be very glad, therefore, if the hon. Baronet will turn his batteries towards the Secretary to the Treasury instead of towards me.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE said, that as it was impossible for him to turn any battery on to the Treasury, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman on Monday whether his determination not to deal with this subject until the London Government Bill had passed would not have the effect of inflicting great inconvenience on the people of the

Wandsworth district for several years; and, whether the want of a proper court would not increase whether the London Government Bill passed or not?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will answer that Question at once. I have no such determination as that attributed to me by the hon. Baronet in the second half of this Question. On the contrary, I have been labouring week after week and month after month to get this thing done; and I do not mean to postpone the matter until after the passing of the London Government Bill.

EGYPT MILITARY EXPEDITION — THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY — SUPPLY OF PUMPS

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, with reference to a letter he read from Messrs. Tangyo alleging that the pumps for the Suakin-Berber water service could not be obtained for some months in England. Whether he is aware that the pumps for the Aldershot experimental service were ordered by Mr. Tweddle Messrs. S. Owens and Co. on the 20th May last, and were completed and sent to Aldershot on the 4th June, and that Messrs. S. Owens and Co. made all the oil line pumps required by Mr. Tweddle for the Caucasus; if he will state on what date the order for the pumps now making was given to Mr. Tweddle, and on what date they will be delivered in England; and, whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Agreement with Messrs. Edwards and Tweddle?

MR. BRAND: Yes, Sir; the pumps for the Aldershot trial were ordered from Messrs. Owens and Co., and the orders were completed in about the time mentioned; but they were not duplex pumps. They were much smaller than those required for the Suakin route. Mr. Tweddle informs me that he ordered three sets of Blake's large duplex American pumps from Messrs. Owens for use in the Caucasus; but he considers that they are inferior to the Worthington pumps. The right hon. Gentleman will confer a personal favour upon me if he will make inquiries and inform the House as to the time occupied by Messrs. Owens in completing the order. I venture to say that the further he pursues his inquiry the more he will find that the action of the Department was fully justified. The present pumps were ordered on the 25th of February. The first arrived on March 3. Mr. Tweddle having taken upon himself to anticipate the formal order, the second arrived on the 10th instant. The third is due to-morrow, and the last three were on board the Republican, due on Monday. It is not proposed to lay the contract upon the Table of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether other communications have been received by the Department from the trade, in addition to the testimonial he read the other day from Messrs. Tangye; and whether he will lay Messrs. Tangye's testimonial on the Table of the House?

MR. RITCHIE: What is the date of the informal order to Mr. Tweddle?

MR. BRAND: In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that one other communication has been received from a firm, the name of which I at present forgot; but it must be taken cum grano. All I can say is that the specifications are now ready, and the tenders will shortly be issued for these pumps. I shall be very agreeably surprised if the orders can be completed in England by the time suggested by the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. As regards the letter of Messrs. Tangye which I read, I do not see that there is any objection to lay it on the Table if the right hon. Gentleman wishes it.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the hon. Gentleman obtain it in the form of a sworn information?

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) —
ALLEGED WOUNDING OF DENIS MURPHY AT CASTLEISLAND, CO. KERRY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How long were the eleven men in county Kerry imprisoned whom the police arrested because of the shooting of Murphy by one of the Force; and is it proposed to make them any compensation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I find that in consequence of the reprehensible conduct of the policemen in this case, which I have already explained to the House, 11 men were detained in custody for three days and seven hours. The Government are of opinion that the case is one in which they may fairly consider whether some compensation should not be given.

Mr. Brand

MR. SEXTON: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the charge to be made against the constable?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not acquainted with the details of the charge; but I have seen a telegram stating that he was brought up before the magistrate and discharged, it being found that the occurrence was an accident. The Coroner's verdict was, I believe, to the same effect; but of these matters I have only telegraphic information.

MR. HEALY: I shall ask to-morrow if it is true that the Coroner's inquest exonerated only one of the two constables; and whether the other constable will be prosecuted for having caused the imprisonment of 11 innocent persons by making a false statement, and inducing others to corroborate it?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN was understood to say that the verdict exonerated both constables, in that it found the occurrence to be an accident. With regard to the culpability of the policemen, he had already said that both had been dismissed from the Force, and that it was intended to prosecute them. Whether the prosecution would be confined to the one of them he could not say.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that if the Crimes Act comes to be renewed, I will propose a clause to make it penal to spread false reports of charges, especially by the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

NAVY—THE TRANSPORT "ARAB."

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether or not it is true that the Arab transport sailed from Southampton to Suakin on the 17th of February last with only eight boats, which were together capable of carrying about 250 men, whilst there were on board 701 officers and men, besides the ship's complement of about 100 men, making in all about 800 souls, of whom about 550 might have perished in case of fire or shipwreck?

MR. CAINE: It is true that the Arab left Southampton with the number of boats stated. This number complies with the requirements of the transport regulations, and also with the Passengers Act.

THE EDUCATION ACTS—INJUSTICE TO NONCONFORMISTS AT TOTNES

MR. SAMUEL MORLEY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If his attention has been drawn to a case of hardship to Nonconformists in the working of the Education Acts at Totnes; the building at present used as a Board School was formerly used as a British School, and is leased to the School Board by the Trustees for a term of years for the education of boys and girls; this building has now become quite inadequate to receive all the pupils; hence the existing Board proposes, instead of increasing the accommodation, to transfer to a Church School all the girls as well as all the infants; whether it is true that the School Board consists of four Episcopalians and one Nonconformist; and, whether he can intervene in the matter?

MR. MUNDELLA: My attention has been drawn to this case, and I have directed inquiry to be made in the locality as to the alleged proposals of the Board, and as to the manner in which the deficiency of accommodation can be suitably supplied. I shall be happy to communicate the results to my hon. Friend when the investigation is complete.

THE METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD—EXPENDITURE

MR. JAMES STUART asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the alleged increased expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board for the year ending Lady Day 1884 of £167,330 (exclusive of that in repayment of loans), as compared with the year ending Lady Day 1850, and, whether he will direct a thorough investigation of the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and to give instructions for an exhaustive report thereupon?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The accounts of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylums District show that, comparing the year ended Lady Day, 1884, with the year ended on the same day in 1850, the expenditure, excluding expenditure out of loans, had increased by £167,000. Without going into the details of the expenditure, it may be observed that since 1880 an asylum for 900 imbecile patients at Darenth has been erected, three hospital ships for small-pox patients have been provided, the North-Western Hospital has been opened, and wharves and ambulance stations have been established. There has also been a large expenditure on alterations and additions at the small-pox and fever hospitals since the date of the Report of the Royal Commission, with the view of diminishing any risk of spread of disease from the hospitals, and also a considerable increase in the payments in respect of principal and interest of loans.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, If the Local Government Board has received a copy of the Report of a Sub-Committee of the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and of the notes of evidence taken by such Committee in an investigation into the expenditure of the Metropolitan Asylums Board upon the Eastern Hospital of that Board; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board will order an inquiry to be conducted into all matters relating to such expenditure?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have received a copy of the Report of the Committee of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylums District as to their investigation into the expenditure on the Eastern Hospital, and of the notes of the evidence. The investigation extended over 10 days, and the evidence, which is very voluminous, was only received by the Board three days ago. The subject is now under the consideration of the Board, and no decision as to the course to be taken has as yet been arrived at by my right hon. Friend.

ARMY MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SOUDAN—DEFECTIVE CARTRIDGES

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following extract from the description of the battle of Abou Klea by the special correspondent of The Daily Telegraph:

“Possibly much of the wildness of aim was occasioned by the excitement of finding that hundreds of cartridges jammed fast after the second or third shot. I have since been told by officers that this year our mongrel cartridge sticks worse than ever. Positively at Abou Klea, and later at Motemneh, I saw scores of weapons rendered temporarily useless. . . . I myself took up a Martini-Henry, but the third cartridge stuck ;"

and, whether he can give the House any information on the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: At present I can only repeat the answer I gave on Tuesday, that the matter is under examination.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—COMPLETION OF

SIR CHARLES BARRY'S DESIGNS.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Junior Lord of the Treasury, Whether the completion of the Houses of Parliament, according to the designs of the late Sir Charles Barry, has been under consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and, whether it is the case that, if carried out at the estimated cost of £500,000, a saving of upwards of £20,000 per annum would be effected by the discontinuance of rent paid for premises elsewhere?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The statement that the completion of the Houses of Parliament, according to the designs of the late Sir Charles Barry, would, if carried out at the estimated cost of £500,000, effect a saving of upwards of £20,000 per annum by the discontinuance of rent paid for premises elsewhere, rests on an assumption which, in the opinion of the First Commissioner of Works, is not accurate. If the hon. Baronet will refer to pp. 20 to 23 of the Civil Service Estimates, he will see that, with some exceptions, it would not be possible, without great inconvenience, to make changes in the position of premises rented by the Government, so as to effect a saving in rent of the amount stated. Moreover, it would be an act of at least very doubtful expediency to lodge Public Departments in the Palace of Westminster.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked, considering the great interest attached to the complete scheme, whether the hon. Gentleman would cause drawings of the complete elevation to be placed in the Library?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE replied that the matter should be considered REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1884—INSTRUCTIONS TO CLERKS OF UNIONS AND RATE COLLECTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Local Government Board have issued any instructions to the different Clerks of Unions and Poor Rate Collectors in Ireland, pointing out to those officials the increased work which has been imposed on them under the new Franchise Act?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have not issued any such instructions. As I stated, in reply to a Question of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), on the 23rd ultimo, the Board have performed the duty imposed on them by the Act, and have prescribed an altered form of rate book; but they do not consider that it devolves on them to go any further than this in the matter.

MR. KENNY asked if it was intended, in consequence of the increased work to be discharged by these officials, to improve their position?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That Question was asked the other day.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE GRAND JURY OF MEATH—EXEMPTION FROM SERVICE.

MR. SHEIL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it the fact that Mr. F. H. Langan, a Catholic magistrate in Meath, owner in fee of 1,100 acres, has never been allowed to serve on the Grand Jury for the last ten years, while one of his tenants, Mr. Handy, J.P. a Protestant, has regularly been called on the Grand Jury; if so, can he explain by what right a gentleman of inferior qualification is summoned before one of superior qualification?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The summoning of Grand Juries was a matter for the High Sheriff for the year, and the Executive Government have nothing to say to it. I have, therefore, no information as to the matters stated in the Question.

MR. HEALY: Will the Government take care in the appointment of the High Sheriff that he will be a person suitable for such an appointment?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN'S reply was inaudible.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill dealing with the Grand Jury Laws in Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is a Question which I cannot answer.

In reply to MR. W. J. CORRY.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir. I have said that this question rests entirely with the High Sheriff.

EGYPT MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SOUDAN—VOTES OF THANKS TO THE TROOPS.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER for SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to move Parliament to vote its thanks to the seamen and soldiers who fought at Abu Klea, Gubat, and Kerbeka, or to follow the precedent of El Teh and Tamar, and omit the usual vote of thanks for victories?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In the opinion of the Government it would be rather premature at this moment, when further operations are probably imminent, to come to a decision on this subject. When, in the opinion of the Government, the proper time arrives they will give this subject their best consideration, with reference not only to the precedent referred to, but to the whole of the precedents.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL, If his attention has been called to the case of Regina v. Mack, or Joyce, and to the statements of the learned judge, as to the careless way in which the affidavits therein concerned were drawn; whether culpable negligence was shown on that occasion, by taking the affidavits of men of no character, without due caution and inquiry; and, whether he will give the matter his careful attention, and, if possible, so amend the Law as to render the recurrence of such proceedings impossible?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL SIR HENRY JAMES, in reply, said, he had no access to any information upon the subject which was not open to everyone else. It was quite impossible for him to express an opinion condemnatory of any persons whose case had never been stated to him, and who had not had an opportunity of giving their own views on the subject. As to the question whether he would endeavour to amend the law, he could not see how he could make a declaration on the point; but if the hon. Baronet would make any suggestion he should be very happy to consider it.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER: If I supply the hon. and learned Gentleman with full details of the facts of the case, will he, as Law Officer of the Crown, express an opinion?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL SIR HENRY JAMES: I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. Baronet; but I fail to see why I ought to express any condemnatory opinion.

EGYPT FINANCE, &c.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, having regard to the answer given by the First Lord of the Treasury last Friday, the time has not now arrived for the production of the Papers relating to Egyptian Finance, "without the consent of others concerned?"

The following Question also stood upon the Paper in the name of MR. DIXON-HARTLAND:—

"To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If he has seen the telegram from Cairo in The Times of Saturday, which says 'The financial arrangement appears to be quite settled if not signed,' and, whether such financial arrangements are settled; and, if so, how soon they will be submitted to the House?"

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the two Questions referred to the same subject, and he would give the same answer.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, his Question was so utterly mutilated by the way it had been altered at the Table that he declined to put it as it appeared on the Paper.

MR. SPEAKER said, what the hon. Member stated to be mutilation was the omission of a newspaper comment, which was couched in strong language, and did not contain a mere statement of fact.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: In reply to the right hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Bourke), I beg to say that it is expected that the Financial Agreement will be signed very shortly, and the Papers and the Agreement will be laid on the Table together.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—EMPLOYMENT OF TURKISH TROOPS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that Her Majesty's Ministry, in December 1883, prevented the Khedive from applying to His Sovereign, the Sultan of Turkey, for Military aid to relieve the garrisons in the Soudan; what are the occasions since January 1st 1884 on which Her Majesty's Ministers have "suggested to the Sultan that he should resume the direct administration of the Red Sea Littoral;" what conditions were appended to such suggestions; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have, since the fall of Khartoum, invited the Sultan to send relief to the garrison and people of Kassala?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: On the 12th of December, 1883, the Egyptian Government expressed a wish that Her Majesty's Government should negotiate with the Sultan the conditions under which the assistance of Turkish troops could be obtained in view of the state of affairs in the Soudan (Egypt, No. 1, 1884, p. 121), and on the following day Her Majesty's Government replied that they had no objection to the employment of Turkish troops if they were paid by the Turkish Government and employed exclusively for the Soudan. Her Majesty's Government were opposed to any operations except to secure the retreat of the garrisons (Egypt, No. 1, 1884, p. 131). In May last Her Majesty's Government proposed that the Sultan, as Sovereign of Egypt, should resume direct jurisdiction over the ports on the Egyptian Coast of the Red Sea, and should occupy them with his troops. Lord Granville has expressed his regret to Musurus Pasha that the Porte had not come to any decision on the subject. This proposal was made in the confidence that the Sultan would be ready to apply and observe, with regard to the territory so resumed, the provisions of the agreements between England and Turkey as to freedom of commerce, navigation, Customs, and the suppression of the Slave Trade. Her Majesty's Government have not invited the Sultan, since the fall of Khartoum, to send relief to Kassala.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, whether the conditions imposed on the Sultan as to the Soudan and Egypt were that he should pay the expenses of the abandonment of the Soudan, and should be limited to entry to the Soudan solely by way of Suakin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, if the hon. Member desired further information, it had been explained to him that the Papers relating to this subject were before the House.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the noble Lord had not fully answered his Question. He should put a Question on the subject to-morrow.

NATIONAL DEBT (CONVERSION OF STOCK) ACT, 1884.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table a Return of the several Funds under his control, or that of any Department of the Government, which were converted, under the Act of 1884, from 3 per cent. to 2½ or 2⅓ per cent. Stock, both as regards principal and interest, and the effect of the transaction on each particular Fund, so far as the trust for which it is held is concerned?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I have no objection to give the Return. I will lay it on the Table shortly.

PATENT MEDICINES ACT—LEGISLATION.

DR. CAMERON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has yet received from the Board of Inland Revenue those Reports on the Medicine Stamp Tax, which in the House of Commons on August 7th he undertook to "study with care;" and, if so, what action he proposes taking in the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I have considered the question of the Patent Medicines Act with the Board of Inland Revenue, and also with my noble Friend the President of the Council. We have under consideration a Bill or Bills dealing with the subject; but I cannot say now what action will be taken during this Session.

Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice

NAVY THE GREENWICH AGE PENSION

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government will reconsider the question of the Greenwich Age Pension, so as to give it to pensioners who retired from the service before the order of 1878?

MR. CAINE: The question referred to by the hon. Gentleman is now under the consideration of a Committee, over which His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh presides.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the important letter from The Times Correspondent with Sir Peter Lumaden's Mission in Afghanistan, which appeared in that paper on the 3rd March, and especially to the following extracts:—

"I have pointed out the great strategical importance of Pul-i-Khatun, a place which has always been considered Afghan, and beyond the pale of discussion. Another important position is Penjdeh, in the valley of the Murghab. Its inhabitants have always been subject to Afghanistan, and it is occupied by an Afghan garrison. Russia does not desire the definition of the Afghan frontier, for it will put an end to her successful system of stealthy encroachment.

Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Caspian were at Krasnovodsk and Chikishlar, 700 miles from Herat. Now they are at Pul-i-Khatun, only 150 miles from Herat. Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Oxus and Merv were at Katra Kurghat, say 600 miles from Herat; now they are at Tolatan, 140 miles from Herat. Nearly all this progress has been made by unopposed encroachments since we evacuated Kandahar."

whether it is true that the Russian troops have occupied Zulfagar, 40 miles south of Pul-i-Khatun, Ak-Kabat, and Penjdeh, all four places being on Afghan territory; whether any further advance has been recently made beyond these places, where Sir Peter Lumaden's force now is stationed; and, whether he can now, consistently with the public interest, state that Her Majesty's Ministers intend to protect the absolute integrity of all Afghan territory, including these important positions, from Russian occupation and influence, in accordance with their own pledges and those of the Czar's Government? The hon. Member intimated that he would not press for an answer if the right hon. Gentleman should not consider it consistent with the interests of the Public Service to give one. The Question had been on the Paper for 10 days; but he was quite willing to wait until it could be conveniently answered.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, he will, perhaps, also reply to a communication made to him by myself, in which I stated that I also intended to put a Question of a general character on this subject—namely, whether the Government have any information which they can properly communicate to the House? And I am anxious to take this opportunity of disabusing the minds of some persons of the impression that Her Majesty's Government take unusual steps to communicate with the Opposition on this subject.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to hear the words that have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, because I think he was quite right to remove any misapprehension that may prevail on the subject, though the rumour of which he speaks did not happen to have reached me, and I was not cognizant of it. I thank the hon. Gentleman the Member for Evesham for his disposition to wait, pending the course of proceedings in this extremely important matter, until the time shall be ripe for an answer. There is nothing I could communicate to the House at the present moment which would substantially improve the hon. Member's information. All I would beg of the hon. Gentleman and the House is to accept my assurances that the subject has the constant and unfailing attention of Her Majesty's Government.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—NOTICE OF MOTION SIR EDWARD J. REED

SIR EDWARD J. REED asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the anxiety which is felt respecting the present state of the Navy, he will afford me facilities for making the Motion which stands in my name, and for taking the sense of the House upon it?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to my hon. Friend, I may state that I think he is under a misapprehension as to the Rules with respect to Motions made in this House in the nature of Votes of Censure. It is certainly the established practice of the House—and I hope it will continue to be the established practice—that when Notice of a Vote of Censure is given in the House by some person who is entitled to express the opinion of some very large portion of the House, and is responsible for making himself the organ of that opinion—in such cases, undoubtedly, it is the established practice to put aside the course of Business for the purpose of entertaining such a Vote of Censure. I do not in the least mean to say that these are the only Votes of Censure that ought to be moved; but I only mean to say that there is no justification for interfering with the course of Business when the Vote of Censure proceeds from an individual Member on his own responsibility. At the present moment I could not do anything—independently of what I have just stated—in derogation of the precedence that has been given to the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill. But having thus far given an answer to my hon. Friend, I beg he will not suppose that I am desirous to see the discussion of his Motion postponed. I should be very glad to see it brought on speedily; and, by way of giving him some small assistance, I wish to refer him to the answer given the other day by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). When my hon. Friend behind me appealed to the hon. Member for Glasgow and requested him to give him precedence for his Motion, the hon. Member for Glasgow replied that probably my hon. Friend would be able to get precedence from me. Now, Sir, as I have had the opportunity of dispelling that idea on the part of the hon. Member for Glasgow, and as it is not in my power to give precedence to my hon. Friend, the hon. Member will now understand that the reason given for his refusal is entirely removed, and possibly he will now make way for my hon. Friend.

SIR EDWARD J. REED: Will the Prime Minister allow me to ask him another Question on this subject? The terms of my Motion are not in the form of a Vote of Censure on the Government, but only of a Vote of Censure on a Department of the Administration; and it seems to me that we have some claim to bring before the House the views which, after care and consideration, we hold on this subject. I should have thought — [Cries of "Order!" and "Hear, hear!"]—that the Admiralty itself would have been glad to have had this matter discussed. [Renewed cries of "Order!" and "Hear, hear!"] I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I shall ask the Prime Minister whether he will be prepared to give me an evening after Easter?

Mr. Gladstone

THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS—RECIPROCITY TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the offers of the Government of the United States to negotiate a Convention with the West India Islands have been rejected by Her Majesty's Government; and, if he will lay upon the Table the Despatch from the Government of the United States offering to open negotiations for a reciprocity Treaty, and the Correspondence which has since taken place on the subject between the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office, the Board of Trade, and the interests concerned?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have not been able to accept the draft of the Convention proposed by the late United States Government; and Lord Granville is now in communication with Her Majesty's Minister at Washington with respect to the publication of the Diplomatic Correspondence. The question of the publication of the Papers referred to by my hon. Friend must stand over until the course to be taken with regard to the Correspondence with the United States is settled.

NEW GUINEA—OCCUPATION OF NORTHERN COAST BY GERMANY.

SIR WILLIAM MARTIN asked the First of the Treasury, If the statement in The Pall Mall Gazette of Monday the 9th inst. is correct, viz.:—

"That Her Majesty's Government has surrendered Huon Bay in New Guinea to the German Government, and that the line of demarcation between England and Germany in New Guinea will be latitude 8 south of the equator?"

MR. GLADSTONE: The case stands thus:—There was a claim or desire on the part of the German Government to annex the whole of what is known as the North and North-Eastern Coast of New Guinea. Of course, I do not speak of the portion that is subject to the Dutch. On the 2nd of this month Her Majesty's Government repeated an offer, which they had previously made on the 7th of February, to settle in a friendly manner with Germany the best point on the North-Eastern Coast for fixing the boundary between the German Protectorate and that portion of the Coast the Protectorate of which was assumed by England. The negotiations on this subject have commenced, and have advanced in a satisfactory manner; but they have not reached the stage at which a positive statement can be made as to the details or the particular point at which the boundary is to be fixed. The House may rest assured that the aim of Her Majesty's Government is to secure, in addition to the South Coast, which has already been appropriated in a certain sense, a fair division of the Northern Coast of New Guinea.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked, whether this was the way in which Her Majesty's Government showed their appreciation of the recent offers of the Australian Colonies to send troops to the Sudan; and whether Her Majesty's Government had not conceded to Germany the right of annexing parts of New Guinea which the Queensland Colony and the other Australian Colonies had desired to annex?

MR. GLADSTONE asked for Notice.

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India a Question of which he had given private Notice—Whether the telegraphic information in The Times of this morning was correct, that the Bengal Tenancy Bill had passed without much alteration from the state in which it left the Select Committee; and, whether 250 Zemindars came to Calcutta to petition the Viceroy for delay, and that the delay had been refused?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Bill has passed. After the discussion that took place on the Motion of the hon. Baronet the other night for the adjournment of the House, I sent the following telegram to the Viceroy:—

"Statement telegraphed by Durbhunga, made in Parliament that you are pressing through Rent Bill without giving time for translation into vernacular. Reason given that you wish to go to Simla. What shall I answer?"

I have received this morning a telegram, of which the following is an abstract:—

"From Viceroy, March 11, 1895—Statement absolutely unfounded. Bill already twice translated into vernacular. Select Committee held 64 meetings. Of these 28 held in Calcutta within last few months. Maharajah attended only seven. Committee consisted of 11 Members, of whom only two go to Simla, and decided vernacular re-publication unnecessary, because almost all alterations were excisions favourable to Zemindars, and not new clauses. After Bill reported fortnight elapsed before considered by Legislative Council. First Motion in Council was for suspension by Zemindar Representative, which was lost by 18 to 2. Two Native Members, who do not go to Simla, had voted before Members of Executive Council were called on to vote. Members representing ryots' interests voted in majority. Bill passed to-day without division after seven days' debate."

I was not able to get the exact wording of the telegram which the hon. Baronet had quoted, as when I asked the hon. Baronet for it he had left it at home.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL explained that he was not asked for the telegram until after dinner, when he had changed his clothes and left the telegram at home.

SOUTH AFRICA—BECHUANALAND

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Artillery stationed at Natal has been telegraphed for by Sir Charles Warren to proceed at once to Bechuanaland; and, if this is so, whether they will be landed at Port Alfred and sent by rail to Hope Town, as being a cheaper and shorter route, by over 400 miles, than going round by Cape Town?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not aware of any such request on the part of Sir Charles Warren.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—QUESTIONS—STATE OF THE NOTICE PAPER

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister which arises out of the extraordinary condition of the Notice Paper to-day. I find that there are Notices of 77 Questions upon it, and I wish to know whether some arrangement may not be made by which Questions of merely local or personal interest should not be put verbally in the House, but printed, with the answers to them, on the Notice Paper, Mr. Speaker having authority to decide without appeal what Questions are or are not of this character?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can quite appreciate the intention with which the Question of the hon. Member has been put, and I think the suggestion he has made deserves consideration; but I do not think I can undertake to deal with the subject in answer to a Question.

Afterwards—

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said: In reference to the Question of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he is not prepared himself to move in the matter, and to get rid of this questioning evil; whether he will support a Motion for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the Rules which relate to the putting of Questions in this House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I doubt whether that course could be followed with advantage at the present moment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: In the event of the hon. Member for Hertford placing on the Paper a Notice in reference to the putting of Questions, relating to local and personal matters, in this House, I will ask the hon. Member whether, at the same time, he will not use his influence with Members of the Conservative Party to induce them to abstain from placing on the Paper delicate Questions affecting the Imperial policy in relation to foreign affairs at a moment when the issues of peace and war are trembling in the balance?

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)

MR. BOURKE said, some of the Supplementary Votes that were down for consideration that evening arose out of Egyptian finance; and he wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government could postpone those Votes until the Papers relating to Egyptian finance had been presented to Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: I should not like to make any further demands on the patience of the House; but, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, we must have our Supplementary Estimates completed before the 31st of March, and there is a chance that the Financial Agreement may not be signed by that date. At the earliest moment we can find after the conclusion of the Agreement it will be presented to Parliament. It would be impossible for us to discuss Egyptian finance without having the Agreement before us. We will not lose a moment in submitting the Agreement to Parliament.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that as they had been told very often by the Prime Minister that the Agreement would be signed in a short time, and as some weeks had passed since that announcement was first made, he wished to know what the right hon. Gentleman meant by a short time? Was it a few days, a week, a month, or two months? The House was very anxious to have that information.

MR. GLADSTONE said, they had been so often disappointed as to time in that matter—a burnt child dreaded the fire—that he did not like to speak too positively; but what appeared to be the reasonable expectation on the part of the Government was that the matter would be decided in the course of two or three days. It was only on account of some verbal questions that some delay had taken place at one or two Foreign Courts.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Could the right hon. Gentleman conveniently tell us in what form the question will be submitted to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that the form of the presentation of the question to Parliament will be one that will completely establish the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. It will be in the form of a preliminary Resolution on which to found a Bill for a guarantee.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE VOTE ON ACCOUNT.

MR. HEALY asked for an assurance from the Government that the Vote on Account would not be pressed forward that night, as it had been circulated only that morning?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, it was impossible to postpone the Vote on Account. The Monday and Thursday of next week must be devoted to the Army and Navy Estimates.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

In reply to Mr. W. H. SMITH.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDESS said, it was proposed to take the Supplemental Navy Estimates on Monday, and the Army Supplemental Estimates on Thursday.

Mr. GORST said, that under that arrangement there would be only one night for the discussion of the Navy Estimates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDESS replied, that it was necessary to take the first Vote in each branch next week.

PARLIAMENT ORDER—AMENDMENTS ON THE MOTION FOR GOING INTO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a point of Order to you with regard to the proceedings of this evening. The first Order of the Day is for Supply, and it is intended, I believe, that the Supplementary Civil Service Estimates should be taken. Now, I find by Standing Order No. 425A, passed on the 27th of November, 1882, that—

"Whenever the Committee of Supply stands as the First Order of the Day on Monday or Thursday Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any Question, unless on first going into Supply on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively, or on any Vote of Credit, an Amendment be moved or Question raised relating to the Estimates proposed to be taken in Supply."

The point I wish, Sir, to submit to you is this—the Vote on Account which the Government propose to take to-night is for the Civil Services and Revenue Departments Estimates, 1885-6, and does not refer to the present financial year, but to the new financial year commencing on the 1st of April, 1885. Therefore, if the Government are to take this Vote on Account to-night and bring it on after you have left the Chair, and Committee of Supply has been begun on the Estimates for the current year, I want to know whether private Members will be deprived of the opportunity, which would otherwise be afforded to them, of moving an Amendment to the Motion that you leave the Chair on the first occasion of going into Committee of Supply on the Civil Service Estimates for the next financial year?

Mr. SPEAKER: The opportunity for discussion, to which the hon. Member refers, will be given on the regular Civil Service Estimates of the year. That is a point which has already been settled by the Chair.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Are we, then, to understand that after the 1st of April, or on the next occasion, when the Civil Service Estimates for 1885-6 are down on the Paper for Committee of Supply, it will be open for any hon. Member to move an Amendment on the Motion that you leave the Chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes; that would be the case.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICES (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1884-5).

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.

1. £23,400, Public Education, Ireland.

Mr. SEXTON said, the sum now asked for by the Government on account of Public Education in Ireland was £23,400. He did not propose to call in question the amount of the Vote; but in looking into the details he found that £3,000 of the sum was to go towards the salaries of the principal and assistant teachers, and that a considerable portion of the remaining sum of £20,400 was for an increase in the payments for result fees to the Irish National school teachers. He need scarcely say that this was a Department in which he was glad to see an increased expenditure; and he was sure that the hon. Members with whom he had the honour to act would always be glad to see a satisfactory increment in the result fees. It was also satisfactory to find that there had not only been a larger number of pupils presented for examination, but that the rate of payment to the teachers for each pupil had been increased. Therefore he had no desire to contest the amount of the Vote; but he desired to take this opportunity of warning the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who was responsible for this Department, that upon the consideration of the Vote on Account, or else upon the regular Estimates for the year, the Irish Members would feel obliged to take a full view of the constitution and conduct of this important Department of the State in Ireland. In its constitution the Board of National Education in Ireland was, perhaps, the most objectionable of any Department connected with the Public Service. It was composed, with few exceptions, of men in official positions who approached their duties with an official bias, who had not sufficient time to devote to the duties of the Board, who enjoyed no share whatever of the public confidence, and who left the duties connected with the position to be discharged by a paid Commissioner, who had neither the confidence of the teachers, of the people, nor of the Irish Members in that House. He desired to ask the Chief Secretary, or the Secretary to the Treasury, what was the explanation of the course lately pursued by the Government towards gentlemen who held the position of Inspectors of the Board. He observed that these Inspectors recently met with a check from the Board of Commissioners, and a stinging rebuke from the Lord Lieutenant, for no better reason than that they had endeavoured to better their condition. Why should not Civil servants be allowed in Ireland the same freedom of representation and agitation to improve their lot as was allowed to Civil servants in England and Scotland? For these Inspectors the highest standard of education was required. They had to pass a difficult examination, and were called upon to discharge very onerous and difficult duties; and it was, therefore, with surprise and regret that he had noticed, in the attempt they had made to improve their condition, the check which the Board of Commissioners sitting in Marlborough Street had attempted to impose upon them. He could assure the Committee that if Sir Patrick Keenan in Marlborough Street, or Earl Spencer at Dublin Castle, took upon themselves to rebuke the School Inspectors for the only reason that they were desirous of getting better terms for themselves, the difficulties of the Irish Question would not be lessened, nor the discharge of duties by the public officials of Ireland rendered more easy or efficient. He certainly thought the policy pursued by the Board at Marlborough Street, in endeavouring to gag the National school teachers and to stifle their representations by terror, deserved the attention of Parliament. He had been present on the occasion when the course pursued by the teachers provoked the despotic action of the Commissioners, and had led to the issue of a Circular warning the National school teachers that if they admitted to their confidence persons outside their own body, so dangerous as Members of Parliament, and allowed them to be present at their conferences, the teachers themselves would be held individually and collectively responsible for the language used. He had never heard of any attempt to make English Civil servants responsible for the language used by Members of Parliament at any of their meetings; but the teachers in the National schools in Ireland were told, in the most arbitrary and tyrannical manner, that they must be prepared to lose their miserable situations or discountenance the attendance of Members of Parliament at their meetings and disavow their utterances. Last year his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and himself happened to attend a public congress of the teachers, and afterwards a public dinner in the City of Dublin. He was aware that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan and himself did not always use the kind of language which was acceptable to Her Majesty's Government. On that occasion the teachers drank the health of Her Majesty the Queen, but they did not drink the health of Earl Spencer, nor were they any more called upon to drink the health of Earl Spencer than that of the insubordinate usher who had been recently distinguishing himself in Dublin Castle. The teachers thought that to drink the health of Her Majesty the Queen was enough; and although the omission of the health of the Lord Lieutenant was not owing to any action of his hon. and learned Friend or himself, he confessed that if the health of Earl Spencer had been drunk by the teachers, both his hon. and learned Friend and himself would have been obliged to leave the hall. In consequence of the teachers having limited themselves in their loyalty to drinking the health of the Queen a Circular of the most despotic and cowardly character was issued, which would have the effect of bringing the influence of terror to bear upon the proceedings of the teachers. He wished to ask whether or not the teachers were to be allowed to communicate freely with their Parliamentary friends, and to hear their addresses when in public meeting assembled, without being threatened with the severe penalty of dismissal at the hands of the Commissioners? He wished also to refer to the conditions under which teachers were examined for promotion. The only communication made to the teacher by the Commissioners was the result of the examination; and that communication was made, not to the teacher himself, but to the manager. It was a simple intimation that the teacher had failed to pass the examination, and was not to be promoted on account of his answers to the questions put to him not having displayed sufficient merit. This was the vague and general communication made to the manager; and the Commissioners thus enjoyed the power of depriving the teacher of promotion, and rendering the results of his examination nugatory, upon no rule of reason or conceivable maxim of fair play. Many of the teachers who went up for examination with a view to promotion wished to know, for their own guidance, how they stood in relation to the subjects upon which they were examined—in how many they had passed, and in what they had failed. This information was certainly most essential for their future guidance, in the event of their desiring to present themselves for future examination. How was it possible that a man would ever be able to pass if he was not informed as to the particular subjects in which the examination had shown him to be defective? It was an act of unreasonable and wanton despotism to refuse to give him this information except through the manager. In a case which had been brought under his Mr Sexton's notice the teacher who went up for examination received nearly all the marks which would have entitled him to pass; the examination was very close indeed; but although he passed in 55 per cent of the subjects, the simple intimation he received from the Commissioners was that his answers were not of sufficient merit to entitle him to promotion. Although he was only an infinitesimal percentage under that which would have enabled him to pass, for all he knew from the Commissioners he might have failed to answer satisfactorily even 10 per cent of the questions. The rules adopted were absurd and ridiculous, and by the course pursued the Commissioners placed the most able teachers on a level with the most ignorant and stupid dullard in the whole Service. He contended that the teacher should be supplied with information as to the marks which he had received in every branch. This would be a means of enabling the teacher to qualify himself for the next trial. No intellectual teacher who presented himself for examination ought to be subjected to the ill opinion which would be engendered in the mind of the manager against him by a simple communication that he had failed. There was no rule of the Service which required a teacher to present himself for examination. And as he did so, simply as a volunteer, he was entitled to have the result of the examination supplied to him directly and confidentially. [Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made a gesture of dissent. Would the right Gentleman answer this plain question. How was the teacher, in the event of desiring to go up for a further examination, to qualify himself for success, if the examiners refused to tell him in what particular branches he had failed? That was a plain question, and he desired a plain answer. In all other examinations the result was communicated to the candidate. He should certainly press the right hon. Gentleman for a reply to this question, and he should ask for the withdrawal of the rule which now operated so injuriously upon candidates for promotion. He might, in conclusion, say that the time was approaching fast when the Irish Party would invite the attention of the House to the consideration of the whole subject, and endeavour to effect a thorough and radical remodelling of this Department, which was the most meddlesome and the most despotic in Ireland.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was accustomed to the use of strong language, and also to the statement of cases by what he did not wish to characterize more strongly than terms of exaggeration. If, however, the state of things in this case was as represented by the hon. Member—namely, that when a candidate went in for a voluntary examination in a number of subjects and did not pass, he certainly thought he was entitled, if he desired, to know the number of subjects in which he had passed, and the number of marks he had obtained. That he believed to be a very fair and reasonable request. He could not agree, however, with the hon. Member that the candidate was entitled to have that information directly without the knowledge of his manager; because he believed that the manager was perfectly entitled to know what was the nature of the examination, and in what manner the candidate had acquitted himself.

MR. SEXTON remarked, that that was not his contention. Let the managers know if they would; but let the teacher be informed of the number of marks he received in each subject.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, this was a mere matter of form. It was only reasonable that a teacher who wished to know how he had gone through an examination should receive the information; but it was necessary that he should apply to the manager, and that the information should go through the manager. That, he understood, was what actually took place now. The hon. Member had asked a good many questions in reference to the teachers, and had varied them with great ingenuity; but in spite of this ingenuity, and all the ingenuity which he could exercise, in his inquiries as to the Commissioners of the Board in Dublin, he could not find out that there was any reason for saying that a teacher was debarred from ascertaining the result of his examination. If it were so, he certainly would say that he would at once look into the matter with a strong disposition to apply a remedy; but he could not conceive that anything of that kind occurred. He differed from the hon. Member in the opinion that there should be direct communication with the teacher behind the back of the manager of the school. The hon. Member talked of the rules laid down by the Commissioners as being the exercise of unreasonable despotism; but so far as he was able to judge of the proceedings of the Board there was nothing arbitrary, harsh, or despotic in them at all. He did not understand the hon. Member to make a grievance of the case he had referred to, in which, owing to some infinitesimal percentage below the necessary standard, one particular teacher had failed to pass. With regard to the Circular to which the hon. Member had called attention, that was, no doubt, a very delicate subject; and he might say at once that he was not disposed to think that the issue of Circulars from the Education Department interfering with the discretion of the teachers in matters such as that to which this Circular had reference was very desirable. In his opinion, such things as those had better be left to the good taste and feeling of the teachers themselves; but, at the same time, he did think that in a country like Ireland, where political feeling ran so high, it was peculiarly undesirable that the teachers, who had under their charge the children of parents of all classes and denominations, should take a prominent and public character as violent partizans either on one side or the other. As he understood the matter, the Circular was issued simply with the desire to prevent the teachers assuming such an attitude in regard to politics as might have a tendency to do harm to the cause of education, a result which was not unlikely to follow if they were found associating themselves with the views of a particular Party, and thus causing a feeling of discontent. There was, he felt sure, no intention to prohibit the teachers from carrying out in the ordinary way their own views on political matters; but he thought the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) would agree with him that it was not a desirable thing, a priori, that a person in the position of a teacher should publicly identify himself with Party politics. Although the object of the Circular had been what he had just stated, he would not say whether it was the most judicious way of effecting that object; but it was certainly not issued with a desire to prevent the legitimate exercise of the teachers' rights as citizens. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the claims raised by the School Inspectors for additional pay, and in reply to the contention of the hon. Member he had to say that there was no objection to the servants of the Education Department putting forward a statement of their case, although there was a strong objection to the creation of an organized agitation in any Department, and it was in consequence of such an organization being undertaken by that class of employés under the Education Board that the step had been taken of which the hon. Gentleman complained. With regard to the Vote itself, he felt quite sure that the Committee generally, and the hon. Member himself, would agree with him that it indicated an exceedingly satisfactory state of things. It was considered that under the circumstances a very liberal estimate was made at this time last year as to the amount that would be required in Ireland, and it had turned out that that estimate had been more than justified. He was glad to say that there had been a far better attendance of the children in the schools, and that there was also evidence of increased prosperity in the country. The result was very satisfactory, especially as it added to the emoluments of that very hard-worked and deserving class of public servants, the school teachers of Ireland.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

COLONEL COLTHURST desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant if he could inform the Committee whether there was any prospect of dealing with the question of education in Ireland by means of a Government measure this Session? There could be no doubt that the teachers in Ireland did not get their due proportion of emolument, owing partly to the irregular attendance of the children, and partly to the failure of so many Unions—indeed, he might say, of almost all the Unions, to make the contributions which he, for one, thought they were bound in honesty and in honour to pay. Still, there was the fact that they did not do so, and the consequence was that the teachers, through no fault of their own, were mulct of a portion of the remuneration to which they were undoubtedly entitled, and which they ought to receive. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary would be enabled to hold out some hope that the measure, which he had every reason to believe had been drafted, and which was intended to deal with various pressing points in connection with the subject of Irish education, would be brought forward during the present Session, and that it would not, as was the case last year, be postponed in favour of some Sunday Closing Bill, or other measure, of not nearly so much importance. With regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) with respect to the composition of the National Board of Education, he felt quite sure that no one who might be called upon to constitute such a body on any future occasion would constitute it exactly as it was now. Still, that Board had had to deal for a number of years with the question of National Education; and it had, upon the whole, achieved a considerable amount of success, owing mainly to the action of Sir Alexander Macdonald and Sir Patrick Keenan, both of whom he believed possessed the confidence of the clergy and teachers generally throughout the country. He believed that although every individual act of theirs might not have commanded general approval, still that all interested in Education owed them a deep debt of gratitude.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had stated that he was accustomed to the violent language of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton); and in answer to that remark he (Mr. Healy) could only say that they on those Benches were accustomed to the foggiest of the replies of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had made, as far as he (Mr. Healy) could understand him, no defence as to the allegation of his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton), that the marks obtained by the teachers at the different examinations were not made known, and he had not stated that he would insist in future that they should be given. The reason was that the right hon. Gentleman dared not assume any independence in that House, either on this or on any other subject in connection with Ireland, the fact being that he had no more independence than the Mace at the Table; and on any question with reference to Irish education he would have to refer to Sir Patrick Keenan as to whether that gentleman thought this or that course desirable. If Sir Patrick Keenan said he thought such a course ought to be taken, the answer given was his, and not that of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He would inform the right hon. Gentleman, if he were not already aware of the fact, that in every other class of examination the marks obtained by the candidates were given. They were given in the case of all students in other public examinations; and even in the case of the cadets of the Royal Irish Constabulary the number of marks gained at an examination was made known. In England the number of marks in every examination was published, both in the case of the successful and unsuccessful candidates; but for the purpose of putting a stumbling block in the way of the Irish National teachers this small amount of information was refused, and the result was that the candidates were put to the unnecessary trouble of grinding up in the whole of the 13 subjects over and over again for want of knowing the particular elements in which they had failed. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary of a question he had put in connection with this subject on the 20th of June, 1884. He would read the Question and answer as reported in Hansard's Debates, vol. 289, page 991. He had asked—

“Whether it is a fact that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland conceal from the public the names of the examiners appointed by them to conduct the annual examination of teachers; whether, as a consequence, questions, or perhaps whole pages of questions, have frequently been given, outside the prescribed course, on the teachers' programme; whether the Commissioners of National Education will for the future, like the Universities, South Kensington Department, and the Intermediate Education Board, place upon each set of questions the name of the examiner on that subject; and, whether the names of the examiners appointed to conduct the next July examinations will be given; and, if not, would he explain the reason?”

To this the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) replied—

“The Commissioners of National Education inform me that there is no concealment whatever in the matter, and that it would be impossible to put the names of the examiners on the examination paper, as their preparation, as well as the examination of the candidates' answers, is a joint work, and not done exclusively by individuals. The Commissioners have furnished me with a memorandum of the system of examination adopted, which seems both efficient and fair. I should be glad to show it to any hon. Member who wishes to see it.”

He (Mr. Healy) asked—“Will it be laid on the Table?” and the right hon. Gentleman replied—“I have no objection to that.” And, of course, it was never laid on the Table, as far as he (Mr. Healy) was aware; and he might state that he had examined the Papers which had been presented in 1884-5, with the assistance of the Librarian, and could not ascertain that the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman had ever been complied with. He certainly thought that this was a matter on which even an Irish Chief Secretary might be supposed to have an opinion of his own, and in regard to which he might act without the aid of Sir Patrick Keenan, especially when he found that both in the Royal Irish Constabulary, and in England, in the case of all examinations for the Universities, for the Bar, and in other cases, the custom was that the number of marks should be published. Surely this ought to be sufficient for the Chief Secretary, if he really were a man of any independence, and he ought to be able to say that what was done elsewhere should be done also in Ireland. It certainly seemed to him that this, at least, was a matter in which the right hon. Gentleman might exercise a little personal judgment, without thinking it necessary to refer it to Sir Patrick Keenan. With regard to the Circular that had been issued to the teachers in Ireland by the Board of Education, there could be little doubt that it was intended to prohibit those men from attending National meetings, or from indulging themselves in any way with matters of a political character. The right hon. Gentleman had explained that its object was to prevent the teachers from taking an over-prominent part in politics; but he had not explained to the Committee that by the terms of that Circular the teachers were held directly responsible for any proceedings that might take place at meetings attended by them. The Circular was issued last August, and in it the teachers were informed that they would be held individually and collectively responsible for the opinions of any person who happened to address them. This was practically the substance of it; and if any hon. Gentleman opposite could refine upon the words used in the Circular he would give him the benefit of any distinction he might be able to draw. There could be little doubt, however, as to what was the real meaning and intention of the Circular. In his opinion, that Circular was distinctly drawn up to prevent any Representative of the National Party from attending the meetings of the National teachers. It might be said, and of course it would be said, that this was not the case; but he asked the Committee to consider what were the facts? The

Mr. Healy

Circular was issued immediately after the National teachers had been addressed by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton and himself Mr. Healy). At the dinner of that body they ventured to make remarks, some of which had reference to Sir Patrick Keenan. These speeches were reported, and immediately after the report had appeared this Circular was issued. What, he asked, was the effect of that Circular? It was evidently intended to debar the National teachers of Ireland from receiving any aid and assistance from the National Party. In it they were practically told that if their Representatives happened to use any language which Sir Patrick Keenan and Co. considered ought not to be used, or might think unjustifiable, unless the teachers present immediately got up and dissociated themselves from those who used that language, they would be held responsible for it. This was really not intended as a muzzle upon the teachers; it was rather a muzzle which the Government desired to put upon the Representatives of the National Party under the impression that they would not jeopardize the interests of the teachers by using language that might get them into a scrape. For his own part, he Mr. Healy need hardly say that, although the Speaker might put the censure on him in that House, Sir Patrick Keenan should never subject him to such a process. He had, however, yet to learn that the Government of Ireland would ever dare to call any teacher over the coals for not dissociating himself from any remarks he (Mr. Healy) might make. He extremely regretted his inability to attend the last meeting of the teachers in Ireland, his absence being due to his being in Glasgow. Had he been present, he should have made comments on the question in general, and Sir Patrick Keenan in particular, as would, he thought, have set the whole body of teachers in Ireland in revolt against that Board. As the matter now stood, either the obnoxious Circular must be withdrawn or discredited, or the National teachers, as a body, must be induced to set themselves against it. He repeated that the Government dared not carry out the threat the Circular contained. Even as had a Government as the Irish Government would not care in such a matter to put themselves so grievously in the wrong as to hold 16,000 educated men and women responsible for the language of the independent Representatives of the Irish people. For his own part, he cared about as much for the Government or Sir Patrick Keenan as he did for the Tycoon of Japan. With regard to another matter, he must take exception to the Circular issued by the National Board to the Inspectors of Schools, censuring them for seeking to improve their position by approaching the Government without the intervention of the Board. This was a proceeding which seemed to him to savour very much of bureaucratic tyranny. He must say that he could see no reason why the Inspectors of National Schools should be debarred, any more than Civil servants generally were, from seeking the aid and influence of Members of Parliament to help in redressing their grievances. As a matter of fact, there was no other body of men to whom they could look for redress. They had for years been pressing their case upon the School Department in Marlborough Street, and no attention had been paid to them; and he thought that to attempt to divorce these gentlemen from their Representatives now was nothing less than an act of the most high-handed character. [The hon. Gentleman here quoted from that part of the Circular addressed by the Education Department to the School Inspectors, expressing regret at the action they had taken.] The statement here made was a very vague one; and he should like to know what it was that the Government complained of in the conduct of the Inspectors of Schools? These gentlemen surely had as much right and title to endeavour, by any means in their power, to better their position, as had any other class of men; and he should like to know what was the construction the Government placed upon these rules? His experience was that the Government drew up very careful Minutes and instructions, which were so framed that they could put upon them any interpretation they thought proper. When the rules appeared to be most liberal, they interpreted them in the narrowest spirit; and when they were narrowly framed, they gave them the widest and most liberal interpretation as against the individuals with whom they dealt. Almost every incident was construed by some latitudinarian interpretation of the rules to be an act against the rules themselves. A rule might bear a very innocent look; but it would be found that the interpretation placed upon it by the Government was generally of such a character as to make it a tyrannical and arbitrary regulation. He would ask the Government when did they intend to bring in the Bill of which the House had heard for a considerable time, but which had hitherto been kept in the background? With regard to the Estimate before the Committee, it was one against which he had nothing to say, and which he thought the Committee would be very glad to vote. It was satisfactory, inasmuch as it provided for increased payments by results to the body of the Irish teachers. He was extremely glad that they had been able to deserve this, and to recognize the fact that the Government had introduced this Vote. It was but a few days ago that they had heard that the Government had a scheme for generally improving the position of teachers in Ireland, and they had promised to bring forward a Bill on the subject. Promises in regard to this had for some time been made by Sir Patrick Keenan; but up to the present moment they had nothing but vague hints on the matter. He supposed the Government intended, as usual, to try and put the Irish Representatives in a corner by the well-known device of promising a scheme for an improvement in the pay and pensions of the teachers, and perhaps in regard to their residences and some other matters, and that they meant to embody in the same measure other proposals that would not be acceptable. Considerable anxiety was felt on this subject, and the Bill ought to be introduced at the earliest possible moment, so that the Irish Representatives might know what it was the Government really intended to do. There was another matter also which the Government could not avoid discussing, and that was the Circular or Minute which had been drawn by Sir Patrick Keenan, a gentleman who appeared to favour the retention of the Maltese dialect in Malta. This Circular had reference to the education in Gaelic of Gaelic-speaking children; but this was a matter which he (Mr. Healy) should have something to say about at a later period, when he should take occasion to comment on the manner in which Sir Patrick Keenan was posturing in Malta as the patron of the Maltese dialect, while, apparently for professional purposes, he was doing everything he could in Ireland to extinguish the native language of the Irish people. Sir Patrick Keenan's apparent love of the Maltese dialect would seem to be due to the fact that there was a patois spoken in Malta which the English Government were anxious to favour at the expense of the Italian language, which most of the Maltese people preferred to the patois the English Government were trying to force upon them.

Mr. Healy

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the Bill about which questions had been put to him, and of which he had given Notice, would appear on the Paper for next Monday, when he should move for leave to introduce the measure if the Motion could be reached before too late an hour. He did not know, however, whether that would be the case as the Navy Estimates, had to be taken that evening, and would probably last until late; and if that were so, he should hold the Motion over until Tuesday.

COLONEL NOLAN expressed a hope that when the Bill that had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the Government was introduced, it would be found to be one in which whatever benefits it might propose to confer would not be wrapped up with conditions which would destroy their value. He hoped that care would be taken to prevent children being compelled to attend schools where the religion taught was contrary to that held by their parents. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor for the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan, had last year intimated, when the question was brought before the House, that he thought the power of obtaining sites for schools in Ireland was needed; and he further declared that probably sites for teachers' residences might in some cases be required. Although he made no distinct promise on the latter point, he had, however, spoken very strongly as to the necessity of sites for schools in certain parts of Ireland, particularly in the North. He hoped the Chief Secretary would be able to tell them that the Bill he had promised would deal with this subject. He (Colonel Nolan) had secured a day—next Tuesday week—for discussing this question.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member seems to be discussing the provisions of a Bill of which Notice has been given, but which is not at present before the Committee. It is not, therefore, in Order for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to discuss that matter in connection with the present Estimates.

Colonel NOLAN said, he would not, after the intimation he had received from the Chair, make further reference to the Bill. He might have put it in a rather more roundabout shape, which, however, would have come to the same thing. He might have congratulated the Chief Secretary on the fact that another £20,000 was to be given to the teachers in Ireland, and have pointed out that this was a fact reflected great credit on the teachers who had earned the money, but that, although the sum was considerable, it was quite inadequate to the wants of the teachers. And then he might have pointed out that, inasmuch as the teachers were in receipt of inadequate salaries, they could not afford to pay for improved residences.

Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY said, he did not think that anything could show more clearly the contrast between the way in which the people were treated in England and in Ireland than the facts which had been brought out in the course of the debate. If an Irish teacher or Inspector were to find fault with the Government, or if he happened to be present at a meeting at which an Irish Member of Parliament, who might be totally unknown to him, found fault with the Government, he would be held responsible for the utterances of that Member, and be liable to dismissal. Now, in this country there was a very eminent gentleman, famous in the world of letters—Mr. Matthew Arnold, who held the office of Inspector of Schools. Mr. Matthew Arnold, writing in The Nineteenth Century, and speaking of certain trials in Ireland, said that the government of Ireland, and especially the Castle system in the Metropolis of Ireland, was not only unnatural, but anti-natural. When an English Inspector made such a statement, no one ventured to rebuke him; but if an Irish National school teacher happened merely to listen to anything of the kind he became liable to censure from the authorities, and even to dismissal. He did not think there could be a more curious illustration of the difference between the treatment of people in this country and in Ireland. He was glad that something was now being done to improve the condition of the Irish National school teachers. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would introduce his Bill as soon as possible, and that when it was brought in it might be printed and circulated at once, so that the public might have an opportunity of forming an opinion upon it. He could assure the Government that they would not be content with any half-hearted measure.

Mr. PICTON said, he had no intention of occupying the time of the Committee; but he wished to express a word of sympathy with the Irish teachers. Hon. Members opposite had spoken of the threatening Circular which had been addressed to the teachers by the Board of Commissioners. Now, they all agreed with what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had stated as to the undesirability of elementary teachers, or any other school teachers, mixing Party politics up with the lessons it was their duty to give; but when a difficulty arose on that score, surely a kindly and polite intimation might have been addressed to the school managers, who would have known how to deal with the matter. A Circular, such as that which had been issued by the Department in Dublin, was only calculated to create irritation in the minds of the teachers, and to produce opposite results from those which were desired. He could only say that if the teachers of Ireland were treated in that way, it afforded a very marked contrast indeed to the enormous amount of liberty and latitude accorded to hon. Members from Ireland in that House.

Mr. MULLOY wished to know if he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary rightly that the marks obtained by the teachers were communicated to them through the manager?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes. The answer of the right hon. Gentleman afforded another example of the extraordinary replies received in that House by Irish Members who were interested in Irish affairs. As a matter of fact, nothing of the kind took place. He had it on the best authority that what took place was this. A school teacher went up for examination, and after the lapse of a certain time a communication was made to his manager to the effect that he had not passed his examination; but that was the total amount of information afforded. The point raised by his hon. Friends was, whether or not a teacher was entitled to such information as would enable him to know what were the subjects in which he had or had not passed. That was the information for which his hon. Friends asked; and it was certainly most desirable that every teacher should know how it was he had failed. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that, in his opinion, the school teacher was entitled to certain information; and would the right hon. Gentleman, as Chief Secretary, undertake that in future he got that information. If not, and it was a mere question of referring backwards and forwards to different Departments in Ireland, he, for one, was unable to see what the use of a Chief Secretary in that House was. They might just as well communicate, by means of an ordinary penny postage-stamp, with Dublin. He (Mr. Molloy) would not say that this grievance existed; but if it did exist, it ought to be remedied; and he asked the right hon. Gentleman if he would undertake that it should be remedied?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that he had answered various questions upon the subject during the last half-hour. What he had stated was that he quite agreed that the fullest information should be given in regard to the details of the examination, which was usually afforded in all such examinations. At the same time, he thought that it ought to be given through the managers, and not to the teachers direct. The claim was that there should be a direct communication between the teachers and the examiners upon the subject. [MR. SEXTON: No.] All the hon. Member could insist upon, and he thought it was quite fair, was that the communication should be made through the manager. He was not intimately acquainted with the rules which applied to other competitive examinations; but he believed that in regard to many of them the details given were very limited indeed. He was distinctly of opinion, however, that all the information usually given in such examinations should be afforded to candidates from among the school teachers through the managers of the schools with which they were connected.

Mr. Molloy

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had made himself very clear. For his part, although he had listened very attentively to the discussion since it commenced, he confessed that he was still in a state of uncertainty whether the right hon. Gentleman had given any undertaking that he would see that the complaint of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was remedied, and that this objectionable practice should be no longer allowed to prevail in Dublin. It would appear from the last few remarks of the right hon. Gentleman that he thought the information upon the subjects in which the teachers had failed to pass should be given to the school managers. [MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No.] He (Mr. William Redmond) had certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he was making an application for knowledge, as to the subjects on which the school teacher had not satisfied the requirements of the examination by the managers, the condition on which the information was conveyed to the school teacher himself.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No; I only stated that the information would not go direct, but would be conveyed to the teacher through the manager.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the information would only be given in case the manager applied for it; whereas, in many cases, the manager would have no personal interest in making the inquiry, although in all cases the teacher would be very much interested in obtaining the information. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to say plainly, "yes" or "no," whether he would give the information that was required to be given to the teacher on the teacher applying for it. That was what the Irish Members wanted to know; and to that question he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had, as yet, given a distinct answer, nor did he expect that they would succeed in getting a definite answer either. There was another point in reference to this matter which he should like to emphasize, and it was the insult which had been put upon the Irish National Members by the Circular issued by the Commissioners to the school teachers. He believed that before there was an Irish National Party in that House the school teachers often got the advice of the Irish Members, and constantly consulted with them as to the manner in which it would be best to forward their interests. Nor did he know that the Government had ever interfered with such consultations between the school teachers and the Irish Members. And why was that? It was because, at that time, the Irish Members, unfortunately for Ireland, were either all Whigs or all Tories. Things had very much changed since; and now the action of the Commissioners, who issued the Circular, amounted to this—that the school teachers were to understand that as long as they only consulted, in regard to their interests, with Whig or Tory Irish Members no fault would be found with them; but directly they showed a disposition to put their claims and their interests in the hands of the Irish National Party the Government would come down upon them at once and say—“No; that must not be done.” The Bishops of Ireland had considered that it was appropriate they should place the question of education in the hands of the Irish National Members; and in view of that action on the part of the Bishops he wanted to know why the Government should commit an act of gross insult to the Irish Members by issuing a Circular practically forbidding the Irish school teachers from consulting with them? He thought the conduct of the Government ought not to be allowed to pass without a strong protest. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had just entered the House, and he would ask him if he thought it was proper conduct on the part of the Commissioners to issue a Circular to the school teachers stating that they should not consult with the Irish Members of Parliament with reference to their interests? If they were not to consult with the Irish Members of Parliament, with whom were they to consult? Were they to consult with the English and Scotch Members? He was afraid, if they did, they would obtain very little satisfactory result from the consultation. If they were not to consult with the Irish Members, were they to go upon their knees to Earl Spencer, and his surroundings in Dublin Castle, and implore them to look into their case? It was simply infamous that such a body as the National school teachers of Ireland should be ordered by the Government not to hold communication with the Irish Members of Parliament. It was difficult to conceive how the Government could possibly consent to the issue of such a Circular. There was only one explanation to be given, and it was the same explanation that was given in regard to almost every act of the Irish Government—namely, that through the school teachers, and through every other channel, the primary wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and the Government generally in Ireland was to do everything in their power to weaken the hands of the Irish Party, led by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and to shake the confidence of the Irish people in that Party. He thought the Committee was entitled to know from the Chief Secretary why Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to prohibit the Irish National school teachers from soliciting the interference and support of the Irish Members in their case. He did not see of what use an Irish Member was, at all, to the people of the country he represented if they could not confide their interests to his hands for explanation in that House. It appeared to him to be the most natural thing in the world to expect that the school teachers, if they had a grievance—and Her Majesty's Government admitted that they had—to make that grievance known to Parliament through their elected Members. What they were told by the Government was that the school teachers must not make use of their elected Representatives at all. Did the Government require that the National school teachers should burn down houses, or shoot some landlord, or do some other desperate act before they could insure attention being paid to their wrongs? Did they wish to drive them into illegal courses, and, if not, why did they prohibit their making use of the Irish Members of Parliament unless the real reason was their desire to weaken the hands of the Irish Party? When the long-promised Bill was introduced, as it would be soon, the National school teachers would recognize that they owed it to the Irish Members generally in spite of the Circular issued by the Government prohibiting the Irish teachers from consulting with their Representatives. He thought that if hon. Members on the other side of the House, and especially below the Gangway, had the spirit which ought to exist in them, they would strongly protest against the action of the Government in directing the school teachers not to consult with their Members. Such an act was a gross infringement of the rights of the school teachers, and a gross insult to the Representatives of the people. Why should not the Irish Members do everything they could for the National school teachers? Why should they not communicate with them and give expression to their grievances on the floor of that House? There was no reason whatever for the prohibition, and there could be no explanation except that it was a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to discredit the Irish Members, and weaken the confidence of the Irish people in them. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to put an end to the difficulty, both in the House and in the country outside, by declaring distinctly what objections there could be to a consultation between the National school teachers and their Representatives, as to grievances. It was a simple question, and he thought he had a right to expect an answer to it.

An hon. MEMBER: The right hon. Gentleman will not answer.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: No; the right hon. Gentleman never answers anything.

MR. P. J. POWER desired to point out that the Poor Law Guardians of Ireland, as a body, were in favour of education; but they could not expect the Boards of Guardians to contribute largely out of the rates in order to assist the work of education so long as it was in the hands of a class of which they disapproved, and so long as the Irish people had no control over the system of education. He was satisfied that if Parliament would establish any system of education in Ireland that would be truly National, the different Unions would be delighted to become contributors to it; but so long as they had a Board which was in every sense anti-National they could not expect the Irish people to stultify themselves by approving of a system which they, as Irishmen, most strongly condemned. He would also point out to the Committee, in connection with this subject, that, as in many other instances, the information derived from Dublin Castle was altogether unreliable. Two years ago the Union which he had the honour to preside over was foolish enough to become a contributor to the educational expenses. They were told that if they became contributors the contributions they would be called upon to make would be about £255. With that understanding, the Union unfortunately consented to become a contributor, and then they received an order from the officials in Dublin Castle directing them to pay £500, or double the sum they were first told would be required from them. He wished to call attention to that fact as an example of the unreliability of the information which was received from Dublin Castle. If the Government would make the system truly National the Guardians would be found ready to support them.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, they very often in that House heard allusions made to Dublin Castle; but he presumed that as long as they had a Government there must be some centre from which that Government should act. Let it be called the "National Port" if they liked, and he would not differ from hon. Members as to the propriety of the nomenclature. He did not suppose, as sensible men, that they could comprehend the existence of a Government without some central place from which such Government would have to express its opinions and issue its instructions. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond), who had spoken with his usual animation and ability, had stated that the Government carried on the work of education in Ireland from Dublin Castle. The hon. Member was altogether in error in speaking of the National Board as a Government, seeing that it was simply a Department. He Sir Patrick O'Brien had been for years a Member of that House, and it had not been upon one occasion, but upon hundreds, that he had had communication with those hard-worked officials—the National school teachers. They were persons to whom the country owed a deep debt of gratitude; and, whoever was responsible for the recent arrangements, it was quite certain that an opportunity should be afforded to the school teachers for making their grievances known. He had never grudged the sums paid out of the public funds for educational purposes in Ireland. He believed they made many of their own grievances, and added many grievances unnecessarily to those which really existed. But the one point which it was desirable to keep in the foreground was how the people of Ireland were to be taught, and trained, and brought up in knowledge, not only literary, but moral. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to think that he ought to go a good deal further, and to use the word "National"—a word often heard in debates in that House. If he had the acute and logical intellect of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan Mr. Hooley, he was quite sure, if he could have the advantage of a conversation with the hon. and learned Member on the subject, so that he could derive from the hon. and learned Member the instruction which the hon. and learned Member was so well able to impart; if he could have that advantage, he would, no doubt, be told that a great deal in the use of the word "National" depended upon its definition. Assuming that to be correct, was he wrong in saying that the hon. Member for Wexford, Mr. W. Redmond, was begging the whole question. The meaning of the word "National" was this. It was generally associated with attempts on the part of a people who had been struggling under penal laws, persecution, and confiscation to make themselves free, their progenitors having been engaged in a similar undertaking before them. [A laugh.] This was no laughing matter. Of course, the modern Plutarch who wrote for The Freeman's Journal, and who said that he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was generally unintelligible—of course a modern Plutarch—might be say a £10 Plutarch—was far superior to the Greek Plutarch, and was bound to be correct.

Mr. William Redmond

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Baronet, whose speech, no doubt, was most interesting, was in Order in bringing Plutarch into the debate?

COLONEL NOLAN: Plutarch was an educational authority.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Baronet should address himself more directly to the Question before the Committee.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he knew that it was the desire of the Chairman to prevent any difference in that House, and there was no one more indisposed than he was, in the few observations that he proposed to make, to produce such a state of circumstances. If, for a moment, humble animal that he was, he were to take up the position of a lion, he would say that his jackal in that House would be the hon. Member for Wexford, Mr. W. Redmond, for the hon. Member always rose to a question of Order on every occasion when he Sir Patrick O'Brien ventured to address the House. The hon. Member was a philosopher by his manner, style, and mode of address.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must remind the hon. Baronet again that the subject now before the Committee is a Supplementary Vote of £23,400 for Education in Ireland.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he knew from experience that it was the Chairman's sense of fairness that induced him to treat him Sir Patrick O'Brien differently from hon. Members opposite, because he agreed with the hon. Gentleman in politics; but as they were talking on this question he had no desire to shrink from it. One word as to the question of the National school teachers. It had always been his opinion, during the long time he had sat in the House, that the teachers verbally communicated with Members; and he himself had frequently done for them what no hon. Member opposite had done, notwithstanding their "lip" sympathy. He was one of the few men in the House who had endeavoured to induce the Government to do justice to this important class, and to make use of the legislative power of Parliament in compelling the Boards of Guardians in Ireland to do their duty to the teachers. Hon. Members opposite might talk as much as they pleased; but why they did not make better use of their words and power his unintelligible intellect was unable to comprehend. The teachers, however, fully comprehended one thing. They knew that hon. Members opposite were repeatedly making declarations in their favour, and asserting their readiness to do justice to the teachers in every possible way. They were constantly vaunting all that the teachers and the country owed to them; but they invariably declined to put their precepts into practice, and never attempted to use legislative means for furthering the interest of the teachers and compelling the Boards of Guardians to do justice to them. He trusted that what he said now, if unintelligible to hon. Gentlemen opposite, would be intelligible to the people of Ireland, and that the Irish people would realize the difference between the "lip" sympathy of their professed friends and a determined effort to secure that their grievances should be remedied and full justice done to them. The statement of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Molloy) as to the treatment the teachers received from the Board of Commissioners he entirely confirmed. He could not understand why, when a man devoted his time and labour and the midnight oil to the advancement of himself in the world by hard study, and was then told that he had failed in his examination, that he should not be fully informed as to the cause of his failure. That was a legitimate matter for the consideration of the House, or of any other deliberative assembly. It was said they were not to be free to speak their minds openly, although they naturally desired to ventilate their grievances with their Representatives, if they had the opportunity. He maintained that it was for the House to declare what the conduct of the Board ought to be in this respect. It was an educational question, and he should have thought that with reference to such a question all Party politics might have been laid aside, and that the Orangemen, Moderate Liberals, Nationalists, and the still larger number who in Ireland were waiters upon Providence, wishing to see in what direction the wind would blow—whether it blew across the Atlantic as it did for nine months out of the 12 in Ireland—would all meet on a common ground. As to the wind, he warned hon. Members opposite that the day might come when they would find it blowing across the Atlantic in a way that would be anything but pleasant for them—for there were other things blown across the Atlantic besides steamers; and in his humble opinion the hesitating class in Ireland, men without the strong and grand vertebrae which used to be a characteristic of the Irish race, who regarded the whole political atmosphere of Great Britain as unwholesome, and would willingly accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) that they might with advantage be towed 2,000 miles away from the British Isles, who were not adventurers like Cromwell and Raleigh and the pirates of the old Spanish Main, not men who were ready to write one thing one day and another the next—not men who would praise people in a religious journal to-day and denounce them in a journal of free thought to-morrow—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must again ask the hon. Baronet to confine himself to the Question before the Committee, which is the Vote for Education in Ireland.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN apologized for having transgressed the ruling of the Chair. He should have confined himself to the Question from the first, were it not that the speeches he had heard had led him into a digression. He had come down to the House that day to support his hon. Colleague (Mr. Molloy), with whom he had never had a difference, except a political one. He had come there to say a few words upon a social Irish question; but he had found himself surrounded with an atmosphere of Nationalism, and he had to ask the pardon of the Chair if, when suffocated by it, he had used an expression he should apologize for. He knew hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he knew what was said of them in Ireland. In that country, if they had the mob with them, they said, "Go it, Jem," and if they had not the mob with them they said, "Laugh him down." There was nothing like laughing a man down when they were unable to answer him. But that was not the question. The question was whether there had been an improper interference with the National school teachers of Ireland. If there had been, no hon. Member in that House would be stronger in his denunciation of so abominable a principle than he would; and he had no doubt that he would receive the support of every hon. Gentleman sitting around him; but if it was not so, and the question was simply how these teachers were to have their grievances remedied, let them come to the point at once, and not spend their time in talk without arriving at a legislative remedy. He assumed that hon. Members opposite would give British power in Ireland some two or three years to last; and, assuming that that was so, were they to allow a deep sense of injustice to sink into the hearts of these men maltreated by the Government—maltreated by the Boards of Guardians, and maltreated by everyone in Ireland who had the right to interfere with them. If hon. Members were really anxious to do something for this class he would ask them, and especially the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) and the hon. Member for the County of Waterford (Mr. P. J. Power), to restrain their Nationalistic influences until they found themselves in the possession of full power. In the meantime, it was not desirable to allow these men to starve, or to exist in a state of semi-starvation; but by the action of the House of Commons, irrespective of the fact that there were elected Guardians, or ex-officio Guardians, the time had arrived for requiring the Poor Law Unions to act upon some compulsory system.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

Mr. DEASY said, he was sure the Committee would feel that the hon. Baronet need have made no apology for the speech which he had just delivered.

Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN: I made no apology, Sir.

Mr. DEASY said, he begged the hon. Baronet's pardon. Every one of them must be very much obliged to the hon. Baronet for his very learned speech; and they must feel indebted to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) for having afforded him an opportunity of making it. They had been told for some time that there was no prospect of the hon. Baronet ever being returned again for King's County; but, after the speech they had just listened to, he trusted that some of the Universities whose claim to representation was under discussion the other night would recognize the hon. Baronet's genius. If they would only do so, he did not think the House would any longer be charged with not having a fit Representative of learning among its Members. He now wished to put one or two questions to the Chief Secretary. The first had reference to a point which had been raised by the hon.

Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) in regard to the teachers who went up for examination not receiving from the Board of National Education any information as to the particular subjects in which they had failed. He was of opinion that, whether the managers applied for it or not, it ought to be readily supplied to the teachers who presented themselves for examination. He did not think that a more reasonable proposition could be made, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would accede to it. In many places the manager might have no curiosity to see such a Return; but whether he had or not, he did not see why the manager should be supplied with information as to the particular subject in which the teacher had failed. There was another point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan), which had not been answered, and it had reference to the compulsory provision of residences for the teachers at the schools. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, in any Bill he was about to introduce on the subject, would make it compulsory upon the owners of land to give a site for the teachers' dwellings. It was impossible for a teacher who had to walk three or four miles in the morning to the schoolhouse, after having spent the night in a wretched and miserable hovel, to give that attention to his duties which he would be able to give if he resided in a comfortable house beside the school. It was equally necessary that good schoolhouses should be provided for the children, because it could not be expected that children would attend to the instructions of their teachers, no matter how competent those teachers might be, if their schoolroom was uncomfortable, and not suitable for the purpose for which it was used. He was afraid it was impossible, unless some such provisions were made, for the children to obtain that complete advantage from the services of the teacher to which they were entitled.

Mr. KENNY said, there was another question of a somewhat similar nature which he would like to put to the right hon. Gentleman. Before putting it, he would say a word upon the teacher's grievance in being refused all information as to the subjects in which he had failed in his examination. He thought the refusal was somewhat unfair to the teacher. No similar system was carried out in England, or even in Ireland, in regard to any other public examination. The candidates in all the examinations he was aware of who passed in two or three subjects and failed in others were informed as to the subjects in which they passed; and if it became necessary to present themselves again they were not examined in those subjects. The question he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to was one which, some time ago, he brought under the notice of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), when Secretary to the Treasury—namely, the curious anomaly which existed in Ireland with regard to the cost of repairs of non-National schools. The Commissioners of National Education in Ireland were always repairing the schools vested in them at the public expense; but schools vested in local Trustees—who were generally the parish priests in the South of Ireland, although probably in the North they were Presbyterian ministers—had to be repaired either by local contributions or by the Trustees themselves. In the South of Ireland nearly all the Bishops set their faces against vesting the local schools in the Commissioners, but preferred to vest them in local Trustees, who had to repair them at their own expense. They were placed by that circumstance at an unfair disadvantage compared with the vested public schools. He was acquainted with instances in which the local Trustees had spent as much as £100—perhaps a small sum in itself, but a good deal for a small local parish in Ireland—in repairs, because, being a non-vested school, it must have fallen into disrepair if an expenditure had not been incurred. This was a grievance which was keenly felt in many parts of Ireland, especially in the Southern Provinces. If the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance that the subject would be taken into consideration, and steps taken to remedy what was an unquestionable grievance, it would be gladly accepted.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that he had on more than one occasion endeavoured to direct the attention of the Government to the character of the school books given out by the Board of Education. He had been kindly supplied with the latest edition of the books issued. He was sorry that he had not had time to examine them closely, and he was consequently unable to pronounce an opinion upon their literary or educational merits; but from a cursory examination they appeared to him to be very defective in one respect, inasmuch as they contained nothing whatever in connection with the National history. He thought the time was rapidly passing away when it would be considered good policy, even on the part of the Government, to deprive the children of the opportunity of knowing anything of the National history. If a fairly-educated Irishman who was accustomed to writing were asked to write the history of England, he would be able at once to obtain books which would enable him to write such a history; but if he were asked to write the history of Ireland, even if he were an Irishman of considerable education, it would take him at least six years before he could collect the history together.

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He wished to know whether, under the present Vote, which was confined to the salaries of school teachers, it was competent for the hon. Member to discuss the question of the books supplied to the National schools?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that hon. Members ought to address themselves directly to the items contained in the Vote; but he understood that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was about to put a question to the Chief Secretary with regard to the importance of affording to the school teachers certain information contained in certain books. If that was the object of the hon. Gentleman's question, he would not be out of Order.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the hon. Gentleman had stated with perfect accuracy the object he had in view; and he wished to make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with regard to the question. If the right hon. Gentleman were dealing with a Scotch question, he would, no doubt, see the utter absurdity of depriving the children of all means of studying Scotch history. By a parity of reasoning, it was absurd for the Government to deprive Irish children of the opportunity of reading and studying Irish history. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman had already laid down the doctrine that they ought, as far as the Imperial interests of the country would allow, to govern Ireland in accordance with Irish ideas; and the necessary corollary of that position was that the Irish people should be allowed an opportunity of learning Irish history. There had been a work recently published called The History of the Kingdom of Ireland. It was not written by an Irishman, nor even by an Irish Liberal, nor an English Liberal; but the name of the gentleman who was the author of it—Mr. Walpole—suggested at once that he was the son of a distinguished Conservative statesman. Therefore, he presumed that the work was written by an English Conservative. It gave, however, a readable account of Irish history, and it was certain that it was free from anything in the nature of Nationalist bias. It gave a very impartial and readable view of Irish history; and he thought it would be of great advantage indeed if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would distribute a few copies, as an experiment, among the Irish schools, or any other work that might commend itself to his own judgment. The great object was that the new generation of Irish people now growing up should not, like preceding generations, be left without any knowledge of the history of their own country, while they were supplied with that of every other country.

Mr. Kenny

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN confessed that it did appear to him somewhat extraordinary that the history of Ireland should be excluded; but, at the same time, they were all aware of the reason of that extraordinary anomaly. The difficulty was to obtain an impartial work upon a subject on which opinions were so greatly at variance. The hon. Member asked him whether in the Scotch schools the history of Scotland was not taught. He might tell the hon. Member that his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) had experienced great difficulty in regard to the school books used in the Scotch schools. It appeared that some of the school books in Scotland gave different versions of great historical facts. That was the sole reason for the absence of Irish history from Irish schools; but he might say that if any means could be invented for getting over the anomaly no one would be more delighted than himself. The hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) had put a question to him about the vested and non-vested schools. He was aware that there was a difficulty; but his attention had not been specially directed to the grievance, and he could only promise the hon. Member that he would look into it carefully. With regard to the question of sites, and various other subjects to be dealt with in the Bill about to be introduced by the Government, he thought it would hardly be in accord with the ordinary rules, nor would it be convenient, that he should forestall, by any declaration on the subject, the contents of that Bill. He would, therefore, prefer to say nothing at all upon the subject; but he would rather that the hon. Member should wait until next week until the Bill itself would be introduced.

MR. HEALY said, the late Chief Secretary Mr. Trevelyan had promised to introduce a Bill, and was asked to lay it upon the Table. He said that he had no objection to give a certain Return relating to it, but the undertaking had never, as yet, been redeemed, although the promise was given on the 20th of January, 1884.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN apprehended that, in the case referred to, the Return had not been moved for. When his right hon. Friend said he had no objection to give it, he probably expected that it would be moved for, although it subsequently happened that it was not. He would look into the matter and see if the Return could not be given. He thought there would be no objection to produce it. The only other point to which it was necessary he should allude had reference to a subject which had been brought before the Committee during the discussion of the Vote—namely, the question of the amount of information to be given to teachers who went up for examination as to their success or failure. He did not think that there was any practical difference between himself and hon. Members opposite. There was a difference at first sight, because the claim put forward was that the information should be furnished directly to the teachers, and not through the intervention of the managers. He had stated that that was objectionable, because the managers were entitled to know everything that related to the professional qualifications of the teachers, and it was desirable that the teachers should not be communicated with directly by the Board on such subjects. But he quite agreed with hon. Members, and he would go so far as to say that he would see that the information was given—that was to say, all the information as to the details of the examination which were usually given should be communicated to the teachers.

MR. SEXTON asked what the right hon. Gentleman meant by “usual information?”

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that he referred to what happened in connection with other examinations. He could not say that any particular detail, or all the details, would be supplied; but whatever details were usually communicated to those who passed an examination, or who failed to pass one, such information should be given to the managers of the National schools to be communicated to the teachers themselves.

MR. SEXTON said, the promise of the right hon. Gentleman held out some prospect of improvement; but he did not know what the information was that was usually given. At any rate, any information was better than no information at all. He admitted that if the manager desired information he ought to get it; but, on the other hand, if the teacher communicated direct to the Board, he ought to receive a reply direct; and, whether the teacher or the manager applied, the information ought not to be withheld. At a future time they would bring before the House the whole question of the constitution of the Board; and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would by that time have inquired into the matter, and made up his mind.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he had only a few words to address to the Committee in regard to the subject referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). In the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had made a very important statement—a statement which Irish Members would recollect. He believed it was the first time that the right hon. Gentleman had had the courage to make a statement of the kind, which was to the effect that he was surprised, and that it was not right, that Irish history should be excluded from the schools in Ireland.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I said it was an extraordinary circumstance that it should be excluded.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, but for one circumstance, Irish history would be taught in the schools, and that was, because it was difficult to get a history setting forth facts in a sufficiently impartial manner. Certainly, that was the tenour of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. And they had to consider this. The only reason, according to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, why Irish history was not taught was, that there was no sufficiently impartial history; he would pledge himself that there was not to be found a sufficiently impartial history. But hon. Members on those Benches wished the people of Ireland to have a knowledge of the history of their country. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the rising generation ought to be taught Irish history; he appeared to be sorry that they were not taught Irish history; and he (Mr. W. Redmond) thought that, under the circumstances, he should cause a proper history of Ireland to be written for the use of the National schools. A very impartial history might be written setting forth material facts; but Irish Members would not ask the right hon. Gentleman for a history setting forth very fairly the atrocities committed by the English Government in Ireland. The broader facts might be taught, and Irish Members would keep to themselves the duty of teaching the rising generation in certain respects what the history of Ireland had been—that was to say, the Government might teach them the broader outlines of history, and Irish Members would teach them the rest, such as the massacres at Wexford and other places.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.

(2.) £14,750, Diplomatic Services.

MR. GORST remarked, that this Vote included a sum for the West African Conference at Berlin. He did not wish to call the attention of the Committee to what he might call the abnormal proceedings at Berlin, but he desired to refer to some conversations which had taken place between Mr. Moade, Dr. Busch, and Prince Bismarck. Those conversations had appeared to Her Majesty's Government of such great importance that they had laid them before Parliament in a Blue Book, called "Memorandum of Conversations at Berlin on Colonial Matters, between Mr. Moade, Prince Bismarck, and Dr. Busch." Now, it was true that those conversations appeared, in the first instance, to have been of a friendly and confidential character; but there was no doubt that the Government had adopted and acted upon the views of the Colonial Office negotiator, and therefore he did not think they could in any way throw the responsibility for what was said and done upon the shoulders of their official, but he thought that the Government must be held responsible for the course taken. He looked upon the Blue Book as a very remarkable one, and one which deserved a great deal more public attention than he was sorry to say it had yet received. The conversations took place at the time when the German Chancellor was in no very good humour with the English Government. In the month of May last, Prince Bismarck had addressed to the German Ambassador in London a despatch which probably hon. Members would never see, but which had been read by one or two of our officials, and had been called by them a very remarkable despatch. It was a despatch which he understood that Earl Granville said he had never received, and although it had been communicated subsequently to Sir Edward Malet at Berlin and Earl Granville in Downing Street, and although it was one which he was sure the whole world would like to see, it would probably never be published. However that might be, it had been described by Sir Edward Malet as a very remarkable despatch. Sir Edward Malet said that this despatch pointed out that, in the commencement of German Colonial enterprise, England might render signal services to Germany; and it said that, for such services, Germany would use her best endeavours in England's behalf on questions affecting her interests nearer home. The despatch pressed these considerations with arguments to show the mutual results which such understanding would produce, and Prince Bismarck instructed Count Munster to say that if it could not be effected, the result would be that Germany would seek from France the assistance she had sought from England, and would draw closer to her on the same lines. That was undoubtedly a remarkable despatch, and it appeared that not only did Prince Bismarck communicate that despatch to the German Ambassador in London, but that he also sent his own son to impress these considerations on Her Majesty's Government. He failed, however, not only to obtain their assent to his proposal, but to make them even understand the inducements which were held out. The effect of that was that Prince Bismarck, to say the least of it, was out of humour with the English Government, and that in all the Colonial policy of Germany from that date forward, she contrived to keep open a sore between the two great countries in almost every quarter of the world. If he were asked to state precisely what was the character of the conversations which took place between the Colonial Office negotiator and Dr. Busch in Berlin, he should describe it as an attempt to establish a "raw" in every part of the world in which a raw could be established with this country. Now, the first subject touched upon in this conversation was the Cameroons, as to which Prince Bismarck had certainly forestalled this country. The Government had had the offer of the Sovereignty from King Bau, but not having been able to make up their minds in two years whether they would take the country or not, Prince Bismarck stepped in and hoisted the German flag. There was no doubt that our Consul and the English officials there, to use the language of the German Admiral, "had not kept quite away from a lively sympathy with rebellious negroes." That state of affairs was frankly admitted by our negotiator. Then as to Samoa. With regard to this Island, it was notorious that there was a desire on the part of the Government of New Zealand to annex it, and that they had only been stopped from annexing it by the prohibition of Her Majesty's Government. On the 4th of December, the Government, through their Ambassador, made an offer to the German Government that they would give an assurance with respect to the independence of Samoa, provided that a reciprocal assurance was given by Germany. Now, that reciprocal assurance had never been received up to the present day. One of the subjects touched upon in these conversations was the complaint of Earl Granville that he had not received any reply to his letter, in which he had offered the assurance to respect the independence of Samoa if Prince Bismarck would give a reciprocal assurance. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had said, in answering a Question put to him on the subject, that there was not in existence any document which bound the German Government not to annex Samoa. [Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I said no Treaty existed.] He (Mr. Gorst) said that there was no document signed by Prince Bismarck, or by any German authority, which would prevent Germany annexing Samoa to-morrow. He said that without fear of contradiction, and if the noble Lord thought he was wrong, he should be glad if he would produce such document. The noble Lord could, no doubt, produce despatches from Sir Edward Malet, showing what his own Government had said; he could produce a despatch from Count Münster, showing what the German Government had said, but he did not suppose the German Government would be bound by that, unless there was also a document signed by some official of their own. But what he complained of chiefly was the scoffing manner in which the opinions and views of Colonial Ministers were spoken of. He was bound to say that he thought a Minister of this country, addressing a Foreign Minister on the subject of the Colonies, ought not to express to him the contempt which was expressed on this occasion in respect of Colonial opinions and Colonial views. Mr. Meade pointed out to Prince Bismarck that the Colonial Governments could not undertake annexation, and that in the case of Samoa, Her Majesty's Government were guiltless of that which, by implication, New Zealand was guilty. Then they spoke of the necessity of soothing the susceptibilities of Australia and New Zealand, and pointed out to the Prince that it was easy to set their minds at rest. In fact, the conversation was practically an invitation to Prince Bismarck to enter into a conspiracy with the Government of Great Britain to carry out Imperial policy at the expense of Colonial policy by soothing the susceptibilities of the Colonists and setting their minds at rest. Having thus dealt with the Island of Samoa, the Government proceeded to deal in the most imprudent and most reckless manner with the Islands of the New Hebrides, which lay between New Caledonia and Fiji. Those Islands actually at one time formed part of the British Dominions; they were included in the Commission of the Governors of New Zealand, and they were so continued down to the time of Governor Brown in 1859, who was the first Governor who had not the New Hebrides included in his Commission. Therefore, they were at one time part of the Dominions of Great Britain. Well, in 1879, something in the nature of a Diplomatic Convention was made with the French Government, by which both countries bound themselves to respect the independence of the New Hebrides. That arrangement, which might be more properly described as a diplomatic understanding, was made without any communication with the Governments of Australia and New Zealand; it was made behind their backs without their knowledge, and it only came to their knowledge several years afterwards. The result of that was that since that date all British purchases of land and all British settlements in the New Hebrides had come to an end; but the French had gone on year after year purchasing land and occupying a position there, and paving the way for the occupation of those Islands by France. It was notorious that the Government of France desired to get possession of the New Hebrides for the purpose of turning them into a penal settlement, because they were unable to develop their penal settlement in New Caledonia. In the face of that, he said it was a monstrous piece of imprudence on the part of the British Government for such a statement to be made to Prince Bismarck that France was to be allowed to take the New Hebrides group, which would naturally fall into the New Caledonian system. To make a statement of that kind, and then to publish it to the whole world, including the Government of France, was, he said, one of the most reckless and one of the most imprudent acts of which a Government could be guilty; and the Colonial Office, as well as the Government, seemed to have had some misgivings about the proceedings in this matter, because it appeared from the documents that an attempt was made afterwards to explain away these statements. It was admitted that the circumstance had given rise to some not unnatural expressions of opinion in the Colonies. As to why the statement was made, the only reason given was that it was intended to show Prince Bismarck that there was another Power in the Pacific Ocean besides England and Germany. He Mr. Gort said did not think it likely that Prince Bismarck was ignorant of the fact that there was another Power in the Pacific besides Great Britain and Germany. But in order to show that this was the case, was it necessary to make this suggestion—which was sure to be taken advantage of by the French Government, who, at some future time when their flag was hoisted in the New Hebrides, would use the words to which he had called the attention of the Committee—namely, that these Islands would naturally fall into the New Caledonian system? He did not think that anything was said at that time about soothing the susceptibilities of the Australian people, or about setting the mind of the Australian Government easy, but he could assure the noble Lord that this was a subject under which the Australasian Colonies were extremely susceptible, and unless he could give to them and to the Committee the most distinct pledge on the part of Her Majesty's Government that he would not, under any circumstances whatever, allow these Islands to be turned by France into a penal settlement, he imagined that this was not the last that he would hear of the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. He wished now to call the attention of the Committee to the case of Angra Pequena, because the gentleman who visited Prince Bismarck seemed to have had instructions to try and induce Prince Bismarck to accept some Islands lying off Angra Pequena as a sufficient reason for changing his Colonial policy and allowing great Britain to have her way in every other part of the Southern Hemisphere. Prince Bismarck was rather sore about Angra Pequena, not only because we had taken these wretched little guano Islands and rocks near the coast, but because he thought we were going to cramp his energies inland. Indeed, he seemed to have been suspicious of the Bechuanaland Expedition, because he thought it might be intended for the purpose of occupying some territories on the West of Angra Pequena, and so cramp Germany in. And he complained that our maps represented as a desert some parts of the country that were unannexed by Great Britain; he said that those parts were not deserts at all, that he believed there were elephants, trees, and grass there, and that he wanted "elephants, trees, and grass." The only offer made to him by our Government was that of these wretched little guano Islands. Prince Bismarck was told that there was a waterless tract of land extending for 30 miles near Angra Pequena, and that if he crossed that desert he might annex South Africa up to the 20th degree of longitude; and the negotiator actually went on to point out the 20th meridian of longitude on Prince Bismarck's map as if he could not see it himself. And that was the way we had endeavoured to cramp the action of this great man who had formed a large scheme of Colonization. It seemed that Her Majesty's Government wanted to force these Islands upon him; and their action in that respect reminded one of a money lender who forced pictures and articles of virtue on his borrower. Prince Bismarck said he did not care about the Islands; that the guano on them would soon be exhausted. Then he asked this pertinent question—"Will you give me Walvisch Bay;" and the answer was—"No, we will not give you Walvisch Bay, but you shall have the wretched little Islands we have been speaking about." After a vain endeavour to tempt this great Prince by the offer of these guano Islands at the Equator, they went on to speak of the New Guinea question, with respect to which there was, he believed, a very serious row as to the boundaries of the British and German territories. Now there, again, was an extraordinary instance of the obliviousness of the English authorities; because it appeared, according to the statement of Prince Bismarck, that an intimation that a German Expedition was going to the North Coast of New Guinea, was given to the Foreign Office; and not only that, but an Aide Mémoire was left at the Foreign Office in order that the circumstance might not be forgotten. It was extraordinary that no one at the Foreign Office appreciated that information, and the Aide Mémoire, he believed, was nowhere to be found. The English Government were willing to give a pledge on their part that they would not go beyond the South Coast of New Guinea, which left it perfectly open to the Germans to annex such of the North Coast as they liked; and the consequence was that the German Government annexed a portion of the North Coast of New Guinea, and we annexed the rest of it. We were very anxious to get rid of the Germans by persuading them to give up their position on the mainland. Prince Bismarck, however, said humourously that he preferred a group of Islands all to himself to being mixed up with other people on the mainland; but he would not give up his tract of country on the mainland, and, speaking of the great Possessions of Great Britain, he said she grudged Germany a little Possession of this kind. He pointed out that we were asking him to give up some advantages which they had obtained, in exchange for nothing at all. Then he believed the negotiator played his last card; he took a telegram from his pocket and read it. It was a telegram which had appeared in many English newspapers respecting the irritation and soreness of the Colony of Victoria on receiving the news of the annexation of New Guinea. That telegram was produced to Prince Bismarck, and then the whole of the negotiations ended by Prince Bismarck saying—

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Mr. Gorst

“ You practically offer me nothing but these wretched guano Islands: how, therefore, can I alter my Colonial policy all over the world to meet the wishes of Great Britain? ”

That was what they were asked partly to vote this money for. The sum now under consideration was to pay, amongst other things, for this wretched, abortive attempt to mend matters with Germany, which seemed to him to have only made matters worse. He was sorry to have to detain the Committee, and should not have done so if he could have foreseen another opportunity that Session of being able to call the attention of the people of the country to the unfortunate irritation kept up apparently without any cause whatever between this country and Germany. He thought it was desirable that that matter should be brought under the attention of the people of the country; not that he was in the least afraid of anything like a war, for it was impossible that there ever could be anything like a serious quarrel between this country and Germany, the interests of the two nations being so identical. The temper of the German people and their way of looking at political affairs were like ours, and both nations were anxious for peace and the progress of commerce. As a matter of fact, he did not believe that the ingenuity of the most reckless and foolish Government on the one side or on the other could by any possibility bring the two countries into a state of collision. The two countries ought to be friends. As he had said, our interests were identical with those of Germany, and the extension of the Colonial enterprize of that nation was really of the greatest possible advantage to us. Why we should snarl, grumble, and growl, as the British Government had been snarling and grumbling, at Germany during the last nine months, he did not know. It would have been much better to have accepted the original proposal of Prince Bismarck; and in regard to their new Colonial enterprize, Germany should not merely have had the passive good-will of England, but their active and most benevolent assistance. They ought to have given every help they possibly could give to the Colonizing schemes of that country. Even if they could not get a quid pro quo, the opportunity of securing the support of Germany in matters near at home in regard to which Her Majesty's Government stood in most need of assistance, ought to have guided them. Even if it had only been a matter of Colonial policy by itself, it was distinctly the policy of this country to have gone hand-in-hand with Germany, and to have given her every assistance in their power in the carrying out of her schemes. He was aware that, owing to speeches made “ elsewhere,” it was believed that a better frame of mind now existed, and that the foolish policy of the past six or nine months was not to be continued. He believed it was generally understood that an official statement to that effect had been made, that they were now good friends with Germany, and that it was unnecessary to make the protest which he had ventured to make on this Vote. But if there was any root of bitterness still remaining between the Governments of the two countries with regard to Colonial policy, he ventured to say that there was hardly any sacrifice which the British Government could make for the purchase of the warm sympathy and friendship of Germany in the Colonies which it would not be prudent and judicious to make. He was certain that there was no occasion in this matter to in any way infringe upon the rights or susceptibilities of the Australian Colonies. He could not quite get rid of the idea that there was at one time on the part of the Government a disposition to enter into a conspiracy, as he had said, with Prince Bismarck for the furtherance of certain Imperial objects in the Pacific Ocean, without much respect or regard for Colonial opinion. They did not want that. What was wanted in Australia or New Zealand was that the Government should do nothing behind the backs of the Colonies. The time might come when their Colonies might demand to have a voice in our foreign policy. That point, however, had not yet been reached. Their demand at the present moment was much less. What they demanded was information—that they should know what it was intended to do before any steps were taken. If Her Majesty's Government would only at the present time give information to the Governments of the Australian Colonies and New Zealand as to the policy it was intended to pursue in the Pacific, he did not think there would be any difficulty with these Colonies; but, in his opinion, the interests of Australia, New Zealand, and Great Britain would alike be served by the closest and warmest friendship being kept up with Germany in regard to the course to be pursued in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Gorst

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he felt bound to congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) upon his very able and interesting speech, in which he had brought before the Committee and the country matters of the highest and most vital importance to the interests of themselves and their Colonies. The Committee would not be surprised when he stated that he cordially concurred in every word of the concluding part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech with regard to the necessity for close and intimate friendship with the German Power. During the past four years, he, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, had in every possible way endeavoured to bring before the House and the Members of Her Majesty's Government, who had always shown a remarkable reluctance to realize its importance, the necessity—the absolute necessity for the interests of this country of a friendly and close alliance with Germany. The German Power, as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) had said, was the natural ally of this country. Their interests were more or less identical with those of Germany, and they clashed with those of Germany less than with those of any other European State. They had common enemies in Europe, and both Powers were threatened from the same quarter; and in this matter Austria was in a similar position. They were all three not only natural allies, but their interests were menaced by common foes—by foes whom he might describe as the perpetual disturbers of European peace—in the extreme West and extreme East of the Continent of Europe. It was an unfortunate fact that the policy of Her Majesty's Government for the past five years had been based upon a directly contrary principle. They had sought to lean upon France and Russia, while they had turned the cold shoulder to Germany. They had refrained from the expression of any of those warm and kindly sentiments with which they had been overbounding towards the French Republic in regard to their foreign policy. They had a most interesting official in this country—the gentleman who had been sent to Berlin on the important mission with which the Committee was familiar. This gentleman had repudiated all direct responsibility; but it was perfectly certain that he could not have made the suggestions he had made without having had a general outline of the policy sketched out to him, at any rate in conversation, by the Foreign Secretary. There could be no doubt that Mr. Meade's action had been based upon instructions received from the Foreign Secretary. It was not difficult to imagine that, before he started, Mr. Meade had been empowered to offer Prince Bismarck concessions which turned out to be absolutely worthless, and which that Statesman rejected with that sang froid so characteristic of him. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) had gone into some of the important points of the Memorandum which was in the hands of hon. Members. Mr. Meade had tried to settle some general policy, and to place their Colonial relations with Germany on a better footing; and it was obvious, from the wide character of his offers, embracing, as they did, an offer to make concessions in New Guinea, Angra Pequena, the New Hebrides, the Cameroons, and other places, that Mr. Meade was empowered to enter into negotiations of a most important character covering the whole sphere of their Imperial relations with Germany. Now, before going into the Memorandum, he should like to call the attention of the Committee to a most astonishing circumstance which took place the other day, one which illustrated better, perhaps, than any number of minor incidents, the general character of the Colonial policy of the Government. A short time ago Prince Bismarck delivered a speech upon the relations between England and Germany of the utmost European importance—a speech which had rung throughout Europe, which had been fully reported in all the London newspapers, and which he would venture to say had been read by every Member of the Committee—with one great exception—no matter how slight his interest in these questions. In that speech Prince Bismarck, whilst censuring strongly the conduct of the Foreign Office towards the German Government, expressed the warmest friendship for the English people. Prince Bismarck had really gone out of his way to express friendship for England, and to mention the valuable advice which he had throughout these matters offered to Her Majesty's Government. Well, would it be believed that five days after that speech appeared in all their public journals the Prime Minister of this country was able, in his place in the House of Commons, to state that he had never seen it? After that, what could they expect from the present Government—what could they expect from a Government, the Head of which did not take the trouble to read the speeches of the greatest master of statecraft in Europe on questions of most vital interest to this country? He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) thought hon. Members might give up the whole question of the Foreign Policy of the present Government as a hopeless case. Well, he trusted, however, that they had now reached a turning point in the unfortunate relations—he would say in the unfortunate reversal of the friendly relations with Germany established by the late Government. It had been his fortune on various occasions within the past four years to ask for information on this point, and to have been invariably met by a studied denial that the relations between Germany and England were in the slightest degree in danger or even changed. He must confess, however, that this denial on the part of the Government had been much less emphatic under the present Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs than it had been under his Predecessor. It had always been denied that there was any misunderstanding with Germany, although the documentary evidence plainly showed first a change of feeling, then a coolness, and ultimately an alienation which at one time almost amounted to a breach between the two countries. He hoped that the cycle of alienation, which began with the famous insult to Austria, and went on to the publication of the confidential Memorandum between Sir Edward Malet and Prince Bismarck, had come to an end. With regard to the publication of that confidential despatch, the point was one upon which the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) should give the Committee some information presently. He should like to know, for instance, whether Sir Edward Malet was consulted by the Foreign Office before the publication of that confidential communication of November 4, or of some date between November 4 and November 10? The Government had made an impotent and ridiculous attempt to base their policy on an alliance with France and Russia; but the attempt had, happily, been relinquished, and by the stern course of events Her Majesty's Government had been compelled to realize that their only true policy lay in a firm friendship and intimate alliance with Berlin and Vienna. That alliance effected, they might hope that the constant disasters and humiliations which had fallen upon England in regard to her foreign relations would come to an end at last. Now, he wished to tell the Committee a little episode which happened to him the other day, which showed the absolute ignorance of Her Majesty's Government with regard to these matters. He had been in conversation with a Gentleman of considerable position in Her Majesty's Government—he would not state who he was, and Her Majesty's Ministers could, therefore, take the statement he was about to make for what it was worth. Their conversation had turned upon their relations with Prince Bismarck and Germany. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had ventured to make the suggestion he was now offering—namely, that it was of the utmost importance that cordial relations should be established between the two countries. Upon that the Gentleman with whom he was conversing, said—“What do you mean? Why should we trouble ourselves—how can Prince Bismarck hurt us?” He must confess that this reply staggered him. That was the opinion of a Gentleman who might be taken as of the general average of the intelligence of the Government and of the Liberal Party, and it had so surprised him that he hardly knew for the moment how to answer. At last, however, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) said—“Germany cannot invade England with her legions, it is true; but suppose you alienate her to such an extent that Prince Bismarck advises Russia to advance on India, and tells Turkey to render our position intolerable in Egypt, what would our position be?” This came in the nature of a revelation to the Member of the Government to whom he was speaking. Well, the sole and only reason for the long alienation from Germany was, he was afraid, a factious desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to reverse everything that the Earl of Beaconsfield had done. The Committee must have a vivid recollection of what the Earl of Beaconsfield had effected, particularly in regard to that greatest feat of modern statesmanship, whereby, on the strength of the German alliance he had gained in 1878, he was enabled at the Berlin Conference to deprive Russia of more than half of the spoils of her victorious Campaign against Turkey. So long as the alliances effected by the Earl of Beaconsfield had been maintained, their position in Europe was secure, as also was the peace of Europe. Their alliance with Germany was practically a great peace union. Germany, Austria, and England were peaceful States, and contented with what they had—in Europe, at all events—and it was to their interests to maintain the peace of Europe, whereas the interests of France and Russia were constantly to break that peace. Here he might say that he had omitted to do what he ought to have done earlier—that was to call the attention of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) to two statements which had been given in the short Memorandum in the hands of hon. Members. They showed the German feeling towards the present Government. If the noble Lord would turn to page 4 of the Memorandum, he would see that Mr. Meade stated that he had seen there was a strong feeling in Germany against England, and that only a short time before he had noticed fresh proofs of it. This came at a time when Ministers were most free in their denial of the fact that there was any coldness between Germany and England. On page 11 it would be found that Prince Bismarck was reported to have stated that up to two years ago he had done everything he could to facilitate English policy in Egypt and elsewhere, but that he had been treated in a manner which showed that the actions of the British Government did not come up to their professions. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) took it that if it had not been for the real friendship of Germany towards England, the policy of Her Majesty's Government would long ago have led to a rupture between the two countries, because in every respect during the last four years they had either neglected or absolutely gone against the advice Germany had offered. Hon. Members, on reading the advice of the German Chancellor, would find how statesmanlike and beneficial to them it had been. Prince Bismarck had told them to increase their interest over Egypt as much as they could by friendly arrangements with its Sovereign, the Sultan of Turkey. That was what the Conservative Party had been endeavouring to impress upon Her Majesty's Government during the last four years—they had sought to impress upon them that as long as Turkey was a powerful State, and remained the Sovereign Power of Egypt, they could act in that country by the assistance of Turkish influence; and that if Turkey were broken up, they could then remain in Egypt as her residuary legatee. He was afraid that the remarkable phrase which occurred on page 10 of the Memorandum would only too probably come about. Mr. Meade had told Prince Bismarck that his hoisting of the German flag in New Guinea would have a most "deplorable effect on Australia;" and he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) ventured to think that there was something else which would have a deplorable effect on Australia—a more deplorable effect than the hoisting of the German flag in New Guinea—that was to say, the effect of the defence of the interests of the Colonies by Her Majesty's Ministers. It was impossible to exaggerate the utter absurdity and impotence of the conduct of negotiations by Her Majesty's Government, as illustrated by their own Memoranda. A telegram had been received which contained a protest, in the name of Australia, against the British Government for not saving her from danger and disgrace, so far as New Guinea was concerned, and declaring that the bitterness of feeling which had been engendered would not die out for generations. The Committee knew also that Resolutions had been carried in Australia, urging the retirement of the present Colonial Minister from his position, and he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was strongly of opinion that such a course was most desirable. Hon. Members heard a great deal about Tory legacies; but it seemed to him that the only Tory legacy the Government or the Liberal Party had a right to complain of was the present Head of the Colonial Office (the Earl of Derby). Hon. Members would probably agree with him in that view. When they remembered how easy it would have been for Her Majesty's Government to have forestalled Germany in the matter of New Guinea, and that without raising the slightest ill-feeling in Germany, because Germany was a Power which always recognized faits accomplis. If Her Majesty's Government had taken possession of unoccupied land two years ago, and if the Earl of Derby had not deliberately quashed the annexation by Australia, without any apparent reason, the whole difficulty with regard to New Guinea would have fallen to the ground. The Australian Colonies would have got what they wanted, and we should not have been placed in our present position. He found the strongest evidence in the Papers that Her Majesty's Government had only to raise their little finger to secure the possession of New Guinea for Australia, and that it would have been as easy to have obtained it as it would have been by a simple telegraphic message to have saved the life of Hicks Pasha. Mr. Meade, in one of his despatches, stated that Her Majesty's Government, if they had cared to, could have accomplished the thing in a few hours. It was evident that Her Majesty's Government had incurred the danger of falling between two stools—namely, Prince Bismarck and the Colonies. As to the interpretation put upon Mr. Scott's despatch, the document was clearly a very important one. Her Majesty's Government had declared their policy with regard to New Guinea—a subject which was of vital interest to the Australian Colonies; but it was clear that that despatch was so indistinctly written that Her Majesty's Government and Prince Bismarck found themselves able to place perfectly contrary interpretations upon it. What could the Committee think of a Government which wrote such despatches as that? That the Government were practised in writing despatches they knew from the statement of Prince Bismarck the other day. He had said that within the past six or eight months he had received from the British Foreign Office no fewer than 128 despatches. He had said that owing to some fault, not his own, Her Majesty's Ministers had, since July last year, written him 128 despatches, which was more than he had received from all the other Powers put together in six years. That showed the way in which the business of this country was conducted. The greatest distinctness was necessary in despatches. Yet it was to be feared that many others of these documents were as indistinct in their meaning as the one referred to. Prince Bismarck had gone further than charging our Ministry with indistinctness, and had said that we had full warning of what was coming. If Prince Bismarck's statement was correct, it placed Her Majesty's Government in a very awkward position indeed, because it made them responsible for statements which were directly in the face of the facts as viewed by the German Government. Prince Bismarck said that Count Munster had been ordered to tell them that this German Expedition to New Guinea was about to be sent. He Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett had not come down prepared for this debate that night, otherwise he should have had with him all the replies of Ministers during the Autumn Session, which, he thought, were in contradiction to the statement of Prince Bismarck that they had full warning of the German Expedition. That was a point upon which there could be very little doubt indeed. Either Count Munster did tell them that this Expedition was going to New Guinea in July, or he did not. As to the apology which had been offered to Germany in "another place," he desired to say this—that he did not wish to criticize it in an unfavourable spirit, because, in view of their policy all over the world, and in view of the necessity of their making friends, that statement had a good deal of statesmanship in it. His respect for Earl Granville had been increased by the frankness with which he had made the apology. But he did not believe that Earl Granville was as responsible for the state of things which had rendered that apology necessary as the Prime Minister. He believed it had been hopeless perversity on the part of the Prime Minister which had driven them further and further away from Germany, and had prevented their Foreign Office from carrying out any manly policy, and had put the unfortunate Foreign Minister in the position of offering himself up as a scapegoat on the altar of the Prime Minister's remarkable blundering in connection with all their foreign relations. Though he regretted that an English Foreign Minister should be obliged to apologize to any Foreign Power, yet, as he had said, he could not criticize Earl Granville's apology in any unfriendly spirit. He would call attention to only two points in connection with their relations with Germany on this Colonial question. As to Angra Pequena, the whole case might be put into a nutshell. The despatches extended over more than two years. They began with a proposition from Germany that we should be responsible for the protection of German subjects in a certain portion of South-West Africa; they went on to a repudiation on the part of Her Majesty's Government of Her Majesty's Sovereignty over that district, or the right of interference there; they went on to a statement that if Germany ventured to interfere to protect her own subjects in a place where we had repudiated responsibility, it would be an unfriendly act on the part of Germany; and had concluded with the humiliating quale that England, who had refused to protect German subjects in Angra Pequena, begged Germany to protect British subjects there. So with regard to Fiji. They repudiated and refused to recognize the German claims in the first place, and in the end finished by accepting them—by doing the very thing which at the outset they refused to do. The case of New Guinea was equally bad. They had an opportunity, two years ago, of endorsing the statesmanlike action of the Colonies. They neglected to do it, and not only that, but squashed the annexation, and they now found themselves obliged to make an apology to retain the friendship of Germany, which was perfectly secure when the present Government came into power and which Her Majesty's Government might have retained with ease, but had lost by a series of unparalleled blunders. That was the position. He shared the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that the great concessions which he understood were being made to Germany, in order to undo the long course of blundering which Her Majesty's Government had gone through, were not excessive in view of the critical position in which they now stood in Europe and Asia. To maintain the vital interests of this country in preserving the German alliance they were sacrificing a certain strip of territory on the Western Coast of Africa. He hoped those sacrifices would be as small as possible. He was not estimating them at a large amount in order to complain of them, so much as to enumerate what they were, and to show that the friendship of Germany was really worth something. They were making these concessions on the West Coast of Africa and in New Guinea, and the latter would raise a bitter feeling in their Australian Colonies. It should ever be remembered that they owed their

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

Australian Colonies the deepest debt of gratitude for the patriotic and noble way in which they had come forward to support the interests of the Empire in a great crisis. The recent offers of military aid on the part of the Australian and North American Colonies was in striking contrast with the cold, neglectful, snubbing, and disintegrating policy which had been pursued by the Liberal Party during the last 20 years and longer, and especially by the present Government. The action of the Colonies had struck a warm and grateful chord in the hearts of Englishmen; and it was very hard, when all felt how close the bonds of the union between the Home Country and the Colonies were being drawn, and when everyone wished that those bonds should be drawn more close and intimate and permanent, that owing to the impotence of the present Government, the Colonies should be obliged to recall the fact that considerable interests of theirs were injuriously affected by the irritation between Her Majesty's Government and Germany. But he sincerely trusted that Colonial feeling on this matter would be as moderate as possible, and would be directed not against Germany and the Home Country, but against Her Majesty's Ministers, who were responsible for the difficulties of the present position. He hoped that the Colonies would be satisfied with making a protest against Her Majesty's Ministers in this respect, and not allow these misfortunes, which were deeply deplored, which the Conservative Party conceived to be wholly unnecessary, and which could have been easily avoided by foresight and courage, to alienate Colonial good feeling from them. It would be far better to sacrifice a Secretary of State for the Colonies, or half-a-dozen Ministers for the Colonies, than that Colonial feeling should have cause to be permanently irritated against the Home Country. He thanked the Committee for the indulgence it had shown him in allowing him to make these remarks. He had frequently endeavoured to impress upon Her Majesty's Government the great importance of preserving not merely an external appearance of cordiality with Germany—because it might be easy to smooth over the wrinkles produced in this matter in course of time—but of going at this question in a root-and-branch spirit. He agreed that they must establish more cordial relations with Germany if they wished to succeed in Egypt or anywhere else. They must sacrifice the rooted ideas of the Prime Minister and other Members of the Cabinet as to Russia and France, and make up their minds that Germany was their ally, and that their policy must be based upon an alliance with Germany. They must give up from the bottom to the top all this hopeless attempt to purchase a worthless alliance with the unstable Republic of France by concession after concession, for which no compensation or return whatever was obtained. Such folly only alienated from them the stable Monarchies of Austria and Germany, and threatened the interests of England in the Mediterranean and elsewhere. If he were assured that Her Majesty's Government realized the vital importance of the German alliance, and were determined to base their policy for the future upon that alliance, he should not be dissatisfied with the concessions which had been made to Germany. If it should turn out in the result that there was still no settled policy on the part of this Government to bring about a union and alliance with Germany, but merely a temporary attempt to buy off German hostility in certain parts of the world, then they would have to complain that Her Majesty's Government had sacrificed in vain not only the interests of the Colonies, but also of their own country.

MR. ONSLOW said, he thought the Committee must have been satisfied and pleased with the two speeches which had been made on this subject from this side of the Committee, and the more so because both of the speeches were very moderate indeed in their tone. He hoped that whatever he might have to say on this subject would be characterized, at all events for the present, by the same moderation which was observable in the remarks of his hon. Friends. His hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had ever since 1880 been persistently bringing before the notice of the House this question of the friendly alliance between this country and Germany. Nearly every time that the hon. Gentleman had had an opportunity of bringing forward the question he had been met by jeers from hon Gentlemen occupying seats below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House; but he thought that, judging from what had transpired in the past, and from what was transpiring now, the Committee and the country would agree that his hon. Friend had been persistently right in that portion of his foreign policy. "Oh, oh!" The hon Member who cried "Oh, oh!" had been one of the most persistent jeerers of the hon Member for Evesham ever since that hon. Gentleman had occupied a seat in the House. He Mr. Onslow was sure of this—that his hon. Friend's desire to obtain a friendly and stronger alliance with Germany had been perfectly consistent throughout, and had been justified by the facts which were now before them. Well, now, what were they to say about the Papers which were now the subject of discussion by the Committee? The hon. Gentlemen

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

Mr. Forster and Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett had so thoroughly exhausted the subject dealt with by those Papers that he need not make any quotations from them; but what he would say was this — that there was no man who had ever been at the head of affairs in any European country who had, judging from his despatches, both public and quasi-private, so persistently endeavoured to be friendly with England as Prince Bismarck. Every despatch contained in the Blue Book just issued showed that Prince Bismarck's primary wish had been to be on the most friendly terms with this country, and it had only been by the persistent stubbornness of Her Majesty's Government that the friendly relations between the two countries had been at all estranged — stubbornness, the one result of which was the great fiasco displayed in the apologies of Earl Granville in the other House, a fiasco which, in his Mr. Onslow's opinion, did not redound to the credit and honour of this country. He hoped things were now changed; he hoped that by-gones would be by-gones, and that nothing had been done that would permanently estrange Prince Bismarck or the German people from this country, because if they were to hold their own in Europe, and maintain their Empire intact, it was utter madness for them to think they could do so without the assistance, or at least the cordial friendship, of Germany. As to the noble Earl, the Earl of Derby, who was now the Head of the Colonial Office, he Mr. Onslow was sure there were many who would like to use strong words. He did not think the noble Earl, when he was Foreign Secretary under a previous Government, did the country much good, and he did not think that the noble Earl had done this Liberal Government much good as Colonial Secretary. All he Mr. Onslow could say was, reading history as he did, and knowing a little of the Colonial and Foreign policy of this country, that if they had had such men in the past as in the present, they never could have made the Empire what it was. "Oh, oh!" Of course, he was not speaking of the Earl of Derby privately, but concerning his political character, and he maintained that if they were to have many more of such men, be they Liberal or Conservative, they would never be able to hold or maintain their Empire. He could not understand how the noble Earl could retain Office after the snubbing he had received on all sides from Australia—

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Gentleman mean to connect his observations with the West African Conference, because I must remind him that that is the subject before the Committee?

MR. ONSLOW said, he did propose to connect his observations with the subject before the Committee—namely, the German annexations in New Guinea, and he thought he was perfectly within Order in doing so. He would not say more about the policy of the Earl of Derby than this—that it seemed to be utterly inconsistent that one who had been so treated by Germany and by our own Colonies could possibly remain a moment longer in any Government. But that, however, was a matter for the Earl of Derby himself. He was sure no one who loved the Empire as he hoped all hon. Members did—would wish the Colonial Office henceforth to be filled by a noble Earl or a right hon. Gentleman of the calibre of the Earl of Derby. There was an item in the Vote to which he wished to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government. It was the item of £2,500 set down for the Earl of Northbrook's Mission to Egypt. Now, he was one of those who did not care how much they spent on missions of that kind, if such missions were only successful, but when they came to think that all this money had been spent on a mission that was utterly abortive, which had led to no good result whatever, he thought they should have some explanation from the Government, especially as the Report of the Earl of Northbrook was not before the House or the country; he thought they had a right to some explanation from the Government how it was so large a sum was spent by the Earl of Northbrook in so short a time, and, as it appeared, to no advantage. It might be said that the Earl of Northbrook's was a very difficult mission. He recollected that, at the time it was announced that the Earl of Northbrook was to be sent to Egypt, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said he was to be sent with the full authority of the Cabinet; that they could send no one better, as the Earl of Northbrook was a Cabinet Minister, and thoroughly understood the views of his Colleagues. It was a very remarkable thing that, if the noble Earl did understand the views of the Cabinet, the Report he drew up upon his return had not yet been brought to light; even at the present time it was not certain whether the Government intended to publish the Report or not; they had given no definite assurance that they would do so. It was only due to the country that one or other of Her Majesty's Ministers should tell Parliament whether they had got a quid pro quo for the expenditure of the sum now asked for. The Earl of Northbrook was away for a very short time—two months or three at the outside; even if he were away for the outside period mentioned, he (Mr. Onslow) would like to know how it was that so large a sum as £2,500 was expended? They knew, of course, that the Earl of Northbrook travelled a great deal; they knew that he had Private Secretaries with him, and that, of course, there would sure to be many incidental expenses, and he was certain that no one would grudge a halfpenny of the money—in fact, that they would not have grudged £5,000, or even £10,000—if the Earl of Northbrook's visit had led to a successful solution of the Egyptian difficulty; but, in his opinion, the effect of the Earl of Northbrook going to Egypt had only tended to embitter the feeling of the Egyptians against us; it had only tended to alienate still further the common people of Egypt from the ruling power, which was practically this country. Now, he wished to address a few words to the Committee upon what had become, he must admit, a very delicate subject. He had taken, as, no doubt, many hon. Gentlemen knew, the deepest interest in Sir Peter Lumsden's mission to Afghanistan. He put last Session several Questions which he thought to the point on the subject—first to his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. J. K. Cross), and then when he, in common with others, thought the replies of the hon. Gentleman were not very satisfactory, or did not elucidate matters, he thought it desirable to put Questions to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister admitted, in answer, that the matter was of great importance. It had turned out, everyone would admit, a matter of the gravest importance, and he (Mr. Onslow) did not intend to go into the minutiae of the mission of Sir Peter Lumsden; he did not wish to discuss what was the present policy of Her Majesty's Government; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would not think he was going too far when he asked how it was that Sir Peter Lumsden undertook so important a mission without all the details being arranged beforehand; how it was that when he arrived upon the Afghan Frontier, the Russian Commissioner was not there to meet him, but was somewhere, it was believed, in Russia? The country had a right to know how it was that it was not arranged that the Russian Commissioner should meet General Lumsden, not exactly on the very day he arrived on the Frontier, but, at all events, within a reasonable time of his arrival. He assured the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that there were many people in England who considered the conduct of Russia to amount to a gross insult to this country; not only that, but he assured the Prime Minister that the conduct of Russia had been considered by the people of India to be a great insult. He did not wish to go into the policy of masterly inactivity with regard to Afghan affairs which had been adopted by Liberal Governments; but he did wish to point out to the Government that there were many of them sitting on the Conservative Benches who looked with the gravest suspicion on the mission of General Lumsden. He did not wish at all to embarrass the Government in any way; but he asserted that the Committee ought to know somewhat definitely what were the instructions given to General Lumelen, and how it was that the Russians, who they were told had promised to meet General Lumelen on the borders of Afghanistan, were now Heaven knew where. It was of very serious moment indeed to the people of England that General Lumelen should have been sent on a fool's errand. The question of the advance of Russia and of General Lumelen's mission was now the talk of every bazaar throughout the length and breadth of India, and the Natives of India were asking themselves why the Queen's Government, at the present time, were allowing General Lumelen and his Mission to eat their heads off, as it were, on the borders of Afghanistan, and the Russians had not come out to meet them according to arrangement? It had been said that this question might be settled by a Conference of the Powers. He had seen that hinted; but he hoped that that was not to be the policy of Her Majesty's Government. This question had nothing whatever to do with the other European Powers; it was a question entirely between England and India and Russia. For the moment he would put India aside, and say that it was a matter entirely between England and Russia; it was a matter on which they had no right to ask Germany, or France, or Italy to interfere; they ought to undertake the responsibility—the very grave responsibility—upon their own shoulders; and he trusted Her Majesty's Government did not intend to relegate their duties to any other Foreign Potentate, or to a Conference of the European Powers. He was the last person in the world to endeavour to embarrass Her Majesty's Government in a difficult matter of this kind, and the Questions he had put on the Paper he had simply asked with the intention of getting some information from Her Majesty's Government. His simple wish was that the Government should take the Committee and the country into their confidence. He, in common with others in the House and in the country, was pleased when he heard the Prime Minister say that this was a National policy; he only hoped and trusted that the Prime Minister's idea of a National policy, as regarded Russia and India, was the same as his (Mr. Onslow's) own. He trusted that the Government of this country would put its foot down at the present time as firmly as possible, because it was of paramount importance to the interests of England and of India that they should do so. He trusted also that when the time came for a settlement of these grave questions, Her Majesty's Government would, as far as laid in their power, see that the settlement was a permanent one. It was no use patching up a matter for a time, by some means or other, and he thought it was quite possible that those means could be found. The Russian Government should be led to understand that whatever Treaty was made, if there was to be a Treaty, it should be final and definite. He hoped he would not be considered as travelling beyond the limits of the question at issue when he said that the people of this country rejoiced to hear that the Ameer of Afghanistan was to meet the Viceroy in India. He thought that that might be—he hoped it would be—an augury of peace for the future. At the same time, he was not quite sure that it was safe for the Ameer to leave his country at the present state of affairs. He sincerely hoped there would be some definite, some final conclusion of this unhappy state of things, which had been worrying India for many years past, and which had been worrying successive English Governments for many years past. He, for one, had always been opposed to what was called a policy of masterly inactivity. For such a policy the day had long gone by; and he hoped that for the future they would show the people of India and the people of Russia that they would not allow Russia to invade one atom of Afghan territory. While upon this subject, he would like to renew a Question he put to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice) not long ago. It was whether India was to pay the whole cost of Sir Peter Lumelen's mission? He had understood from the noble Lord that India was so to do; but in this Vote he noticed an item of £1,650 was set down for the Afghan Boundary Commission. He would like to know how such a sum came into this Vote? He was not at all sure that it was politic to allow India to pay anything at all towards the expenses of this mission; but, of course, there were things to be said on both sides of the question. In conclusion, he could only once more say most emphatically that, notwithstanding the Votes the Committee were now asked to pass were somewhat high, he would not grudge one halfpenny of them if there was to be any success; if the payment of this money was to insure their rights in India, and to insure their rule over Egypt. The Government ought not to ask the country to fritter away its money upon missions which, up to date, had turned out purely abortive.

Mr. Onslow

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the discussion which has been raised has travelled over a very great number of points. I, of course, make no complaint against the hon. Gentlemen who have raised this discussion, although, no doubt, they felt that a discussion of a particular Vote in Committee of Supply was hardly the most convenient opportunity for raising some of the questions which they wished to bring forward. They stated they would not have done so if they had had any other opportunity. At the same time, Sir, the discussion, because we are in Committee of Supply, has been, to a great extent, one of detail. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who opened the debate, mentioned a great number of points connected with various questions common to both the Colonial and Foreign Offices which have for the last few months attracted a considerable amount of attention. The hon. Member (Mr. Onslow) who has just sat down devoted most of his speech to the subject of Afghanistan; while the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) touched very nearly upon every conceivable subject which it is possible to mention in a speech relating to Foreign or Colonial affairs. He commenced his speech by an account of a discussion which he had with a Gentleman outside this House, who, he said, was a distinguished Member of the Liberal Party, and he treated us to such an alarming and lamentable picture of the condition to which that Gentleman was reduced after the discussion with him, that I really feel myself in a state of trepidation in following the hon. Gentleman. Notwithstanding, I shall attempt to touch upon some of the points which the hon. Gentleman raised. Now, with regard to nearly all of those points, there was one common and general proposition. The whole of the points brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) were all urged with the view of showing that there had been, according to them, a lamentable indifference on the part of Her Majesty's Government to securing the friendship and goodwill of Germany. Now, on many occasions last year I had to contend in this House against these assertions of the hon. Member for Eye and other hon. Members with regard to our relations with Germany. They have asserted, over and over again, that Her Majesty's Government has shown, not merely indifference to the friendship of Germany, but almost a positive desire to incur the enmity of that great country. I have denied that on previous occasions, and I deny it again; and I assert that no proof has ever been adduced, either on previous occasions or on this occasion, that Her Majesty's Government has shown itself insensible of the importance of the friendship of that country. There would, no doubt, be a certain temptation to follow out the various lines of argument which were indicated by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), and to show, with regard to these different questions—the questions of Angra Pequena and New Guinea—that the allegations of the hon. Gentlemen were not justified by facts. But it seems to me, that at a moment when, to the great satisfaction of all parties—to the House and to the country in general—an announcement was made to-day in Parliament, showing that whatever slight misunderstanding may have arisen between the two countries in the past, that misunderstanding has now been happily settled, would not be the most favourable to go back upon these questions, and to open up the discussions which have now been brought to a happy and successful termination, and thereby accomplish what, it occurred to me, was the object of the speech of the hon. Member for Eye—namely, to widen again whatever unfortunate difference may have existed between the two countries. On certain points the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). I think, gave a very remarkable proof of how entirely animated he is on these questions by Party; because, having devoted nearly the whole of his speech to an elaborate argument to show the importance of the friendship and goodwill of Germany, he, towards the end of his speech, alluded to the statements that have recently been made to Parliament with regard to the removal of this unfortunate misunderstanding, and in connection with that he alluded to the question of the Cameroons and the settlement which has been reported in certain newspapers on the authority of a telegram from Berlin. When he came to the question of the Cameroons, and the reported settlement, he turned round and began to accuse the Government of a surrender of valuable British interests to the Germans, although he had immediately before been telling us that we had committed the very greatest folly on the Coast of Africa in not doing everything we could to welcome German extension and German Colonization. What struck me also as inconsistent in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) was, that he said that anybody reading these Papers would be led to suppose we had almost entered into a conspiracy with Prince Bismarck, he having previously been showing how lamentably indifferent we had been to the friendship and goodwill of Prince Bismarck. I do not understand how, at one and the same time, you can enter into a conspiracy with Prince Bismarck, directed, as the hon. and learned Gentleman Mr. Gorst thought, against our own Colonies, and also show complete indifference to the friendship and goodwill with the person with whom you are entering into a conspiracy. That appeared to me to be a great inconsistency on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham. Then, again, he touched upon the question of the despatch of the 5th of May, and also of the Memorandum which was said to have been delivered to Earl Granville at an early date last year; and he really appeared to me to trench rather closely upon what may be called the courtesies of debate which exist, not only among Members of this House, but between Members of this House and those who sit in "another place;" because I may remind the Committee that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) has quite recently made a very clear statement in regard to these questions, which has been accepted by persons of all Parties in this country and in foreign lands. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Gorst) appeared to me, by the manner in which he chose his words, rather to impute, or cast some doubt upon, the accuracy of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs' statement.

Mr. Onslow

MR. GORST: I am sure the noble Lord will allow me to say that, whatever my manner may have been, it was very far indeed from my intention to cast any doubt upon a statement of Earl Granville.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I, of course, accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's disclaimer; but my hon. and learned Friend was certainly understood by many in the House to be aiming his argument to the statement made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and if he was not, I really do not understand what the point of his observations was, because, if he accepted the statement recorded in this Blue Book, and repeated in "another place" by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and by myself in this House, he must know that the despatch of the 5th of May was never received at the Foreign Office, and that the Memorandum was never given to Earl Granville by Count Munster. If he accepts that statement, I do not understand what the aim of the exordium of his speech was. The hon. and learned Member also alluded to the question of Angra Pequena, and the question of the Cameroons. I really do not understand whether he desires to re-open the question of Angra Pequena; at one moment I thought he did. He alluded to an assertion, an entirely unfounded one, that we had desired to shut up the Germans within a narrow strip of land along the coast; and then he proceeded from that to point to the Cameroons, and he said we had proceeded there on an ungenerous policy with regard to the Germans; that we had desired to hem them in; and in that manner had excited the ill will of the German Government. I may state that such an idea, if it exists in the mind of my hon. and learned Friend, is an entirely mistaken one. The Government have had no wish whatever to shut the Germans in to a narrow strip of land along the coast; on the contrary, the Government were perfectly willing that, in the future, the German Colonists should be free to penetrate into the interior, and no doubt, as time goes on, they will do so; and if in those regions, which no doubt are inhospitable, German Colonization develops a thriving civilization, as it has in other parts of the world, no one will rejoice more than Her Majesty's Government. I repeat the words of the Prime Minister in Scotland—I quote from memory—"There is plenty of room in this great world for English Colonists and German Colonists." It is a matter of fact known to everybody who has given any attention to the history of Colonization, almost everywhere in the world, and especially in America, where English and German Colonists have found themselves neighbours, that they have been on the most friendly terms. But, Sir, with regard to the Cameroons. I was astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman, considering the many minute points he raised in the course of his speech, did not notice, in the Blue Book presented in regard to the Cameroons, that there was a despatch that clearly showed the goodwill of Her Majesty's Government to the German Colonists in that part of the world. It is the Despatch, No. 57, of the 23rd of October, in which it is recorded that Her Majesty's Government would be glad to see an extension of the German Settlement in the South until they touched the Northern limits of the French Settlements in the direction of the Gaboon. If Her Majesty's Government had been so anxious to hem in the Germans, certainly that despatch would never have been sent; that despatch is in itself a proof of the goodwill of Her Majesty's Government to the German Colonists; and if since then we have found it advisable, and I may say, speaking generally, we have found it advisable, to carry that principle further, and to recognize that the Germans are quite within their rights in extending themselves, I assert that in this case we are simply giving further proof of what is already on record in this Blue Book. Then, Sir, the hon. and learned Member alluded to the question of Samoa, and he returned to a charge in regard to a matter which he asked me some Questions about the other day, and as to which I had hoped to find I had satisfied him. I referred him then to the Colonial Office Blue Books on the subject, Blue Books which were issued some time ago, and which contained many Foreign Office despatches as well as Colonial Office despatches. Notwithstanding the explanation which I then gave him, the hon. and learned Gentleman again asserted to-night that there was nothing binding on the German Government in regard to the pledges given, or asserted by me to have been given, in reference to the respect to be shown by both Governments—the English and German Governments—as to the independence of Samoa. [Mr. Gosset: I said there was no document.] I explained the other day there was no Treaty or Convention; I used both words advisedly, because I was quite aware there was no Treaty or Convention. There are two Treaties in existence, one between Great Britain and Samoa, and the other between Germany and Samoa; but there is no Treaty or Convention drawn up between England and Germany with respect to Samoa. There is, however, in the Blue Book, on page 145, a note of Count Münster to Earl Granville, and the reply, which is to be found on page 163, under date February 16th. There are on record, therefore, these two Papers, and in the despatch of Count Münster, on page 145, there is a clear recognition by the Germans of the independence of Samoa. Referring to the Treaty which was reported to have been concluded by a certain German official with the King of Samoa, Count Münster speaks as follows:—

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

"This Treaty will not be ratified so far as the stipulations do not harmonize with the explanations previously exchanged between Germany and England with regard to the maintenance of the independence of Samoa."

And then Count Münster goes on to say—

"While the undersigned has the honour of inclosing for the information of Her Majesty's Government the annexed German translation of the agreement, he expresses the hope of his Government that the Royal British Government will be convinced that the points agreed upon are within the limits of the German Treaty with Samoa, and encroach neither on the independence of this group of Islands nor on the rights acquired there by other nations."

When the Ambassador of a friendly country speaks, as Count Munster in his note does, of the maintenance of the independence of Samoa as being recognized by both Governments no one can say, although there is no Treaty or Convention, that there is no document between the two Governments in which the independence of the Islands was recognized. I am persuaded that the hon. and learned Gentleman Mr. Gorst has not observed that despatch in the Blue Book. The hon. Member who addressed the Committee a few minutes ago—the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow— touched briefly upon Colonial questions also, and I may say, in reply to him and to the other hon. Members who wanted to know why we had published the conversations of Mr. Meade, it is well known to the House that the German White Book gave an account of the conversation. I am not going to make any attack upon the German White Book; but it contained a certain account of the conversations, and we thought it was desirable, and I am sure the Committee will feel we were right, that this country should have our record of the conversation also; that Mr. Meade should be allowed to tell his own story; and that hon. Members should have an opportunity of judging, from an account in his own language, of what was said and done, and not merely in the shape in which it appeared in the German White Book. But, Sir, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) only touched very briefly upon Colonial questions; he rose to dwell upon those topics with which he is specially familiar, and on which his Indian experience naturally gives him a right to address the House. He again appealed to us to say something about the question of Afghanistan. Well, I am very sorry indeed to have to refuse information; it is always a very disagreeable thing to have to do so; but it is very often a melancholy duty. There are moments when we cannot make statements; and the Prime Minister has stated—and I think the country has fully endorsed his view—that this moment is not a proper one for making any declaration with regard to what is going on on the Afghan Frontier.

MR. ONSLOW: What I asked the noble Lord was, how it was that Sir Peter Lumaden's Mission had been sent to Afghanistan, and that no Russian Commissioner was there to meet him; how it was that all the details of the matter were not arranged before our Commissioners went out?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I enter no complaint to the question; it is perfectly natural for an hon. Gentleman who desires information on the point to put such a question; but the reply I would have to give would relate to the whole transaction; and I must, therefore, ask the Committee to curb their impatience, and allow us, when we make our statement, to make a full statement of the transactions from the very beginning. I believe that, from a British point of view, our statement with regard to the point raised by the hon. Member will be considered satisfactory. I must decline, however, at present to go into details. The hon. Gentleman raised a point with regard to the expenses of Sir Peter Lumaden's Mission. He asked me how the expenses are going to be borne. I have only to reply that this is an Indian charge, but that Mr. Stephen and his Secretary are in the employ of the Foreign Office, and therefore their expenses are put down as part of this Vote. That is the exception to my answer which proves the rule—namely, as I said the other day, that the expenses of this Commission are to be borne by India. Then the hon. Member also made a point with regard to the Earl of Northbrook's Mission, and wanted to know what quid pro quo there was for the expenses of the noble Earl's Mission. All I can say is that when the documents are published with reference to the Egyptian financial proposals, it will be found that they contain large extracts, as I informed the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) the other day, from the Report of the Earl of Northbrook, and it will also be found that many of the financial proposals made to the European Powers were made partly in consequence of his recommendations. At the same time, I may add that the Earl of Northbrook's inquiries, and his subsequent advice and counsel to the Government, were most valuable; and we believe that the expenses which were incurred by the noble Earl during his Mission have been fully met by the advantage of that advice and that counsel. These are the principal considerations which I have to lay before the Committee upon this Vote. My hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) no doubt will enter more fully into those parts of the questions relating to Angra Pequena and the South Sea Islands, and the relations between the Mother Country and the Colonies which are involved. I can only say that in my opinion these Blue Books and Parliamentary Papers show that Her Majesty's Government have been actuated by an earnest desire to consult the wishes of the Colonies. It is in every sense one of the most gratifying experiences of the age in which we live that there is a good feeling between the Mother Country and the Colonies; and Her Majesty's Government are fully sensible of the importance of strengthening in every direction the ties which spring from that good feeling. I deny that the Blue Books show that there has been any neglect on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I may remind the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that, in proof of what I am just now saying, it was the desire of the Colonial Office to consult the Cape Colony which to a great extent led to the unfortunate misunderstanding which arose with Germany about Angra Pequena. The charge made by the German Government against our Government was based upon the delay which occurred. The reply of Her Majesty's Government was and is that that delay simply represented the time during which the Colonial Office and the Cape Government were communicating with one another. If we had hurried the Cape Government in the matter it is very probable we would have been exposed to the opposite attack; we should no doubt have been told that we had been trying to force the hand of the Colonial Government, and that we had not given them proper time in which to reply. The Colony at that time was undergoing a change of Ministry, and there was an unavoidable delay. Her Majesty's Government were fully sensible that it would have ill become them to have attempted to compel the Colonial Government to give a reply before it was in a position to do so. I am fully justified, I think, in quoting that to show that in all these matters Her Majesty's Government have been most anxious to consult the Colonies. Sir, I have simply, with these observations, to recommend this Vote to the Committee, and to assure them once more that there is on the part of Her Majesty's Government a full knowledge of the great importance of the friendship of Germany to this country, and that we believe that whatever misunderstanding may have arisen during the past few months it was a misunderstanding only. On the part of Her Majesty's Government there is nothing except an anxious desire to meet the views of the German Government, and we fully believe that our good feeling is reciprocated by the Government of that great Empire.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the reply of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was scanty and unsatisfactory. The noble Lord had said that it was not a convenient opportunity to bring up questions of this kind on a Vote of Supply; but when the Committee recollected that the private Member's nights had been entirely appropriated by the Government he was persuaded the Committee would feel that hon. Members were justified in seizing any opportunity which presented itself of bringing forward questions upon which they took a deep interest. The noble Lord was very severe upon the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). The noble Lord's sarcasm, however, was not of a high order; and he was persuaded that if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had been present he would not have suffered much pain from the comments of the noble Lord. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was happy to find that the noble Lord denied all indifference to the good feeling of Germany. The dissensions he said between this country and Germany had entirely passed away, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was actuated by Party feeling in bringing them up again. There were, however, one or two points upon which the noble Lord had been very deficient in his explanations. He, of course, accepted implicitly everything that was stated by the noble Lord, or by his Chief in "another place" (Lord Granville); but, at the same time, although Lord Granville disavowed having received the Memorandum or despatch of the 5th of May there was no doubt that Prince Bismarck was under the impression that the contents of those documents had been communicated to Earl Granville. He, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, could not help thinking that if the documents were communicated to Lord Granville the noble Earl had failed to appreciate their language. The noble Lord said that no Memorandum or despatch was communicated to Lord Granville; but Prince Bismarck said that they were communicated to him.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

MR. GLADSTONE: That has nothing to do with the question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The right hon. Gentleman was very impatient of interruption himself, and he thought he might have some little consideration when others were speaking. It had a great deal to do with the question, because a great deal of the difference between Germany and this country was owing to that circumstance. He thought it could not be denied that the despatches were communicated to Lord Granville; but the noble Earl seemed to have shown a great deal of obtuseness in this matter, which was not usual in him. The noble Lord, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice, said that nothing was communicated; but did he deny that Lord Granville had communications with the diplomatists at Berlin? What did Sir Edward Malet write? On the 24th of January, 1885, writing to Earl Granville, he said that Prince Bismarck had shown him a despatch of the 5th of May last, which he had addressed to Count Munster, and which was a very remarkable one. It stated the great importance which the Prince attached to the Colonial question, and also to the friendship of Germany and England. Sir Edward Malet stated that the despatch was a long one, and that the Prince read it to him in German. It contained a passage to the effect that Prince Bismarck had instructed Count Munster to say that if the arrangement could not be effected the result would be that Germany would seek from France what she failed to get from England. And Prince Bismarck went on to say that not being satisfied with the result, and attributing it in part to the Ambassador not having stated the points with precision, he had sent his son, Count Herbert Bismarck, to England, in the hope that he might succeed where Count Munster had failed, but that he only succeeded in obtaining general friendly assurances of goodwill, which were of little value in the face of subsequent occurrences. It appeared, therefore, that it was distinctly stated by Prince Bismarck that Count Munster had given the gist of the despatch to Lord Granville. That was a distinct statement on the part of Prince Bismarck. LORD EDMUND FITZMAURICE: No, no. If the noble Lord wanted him to read it again he would do so; he would read the whole despatch if he liked. The hon. Member again read from the despatch of Sir Edward Malet, and said that the Prime Minister, after hearing it, had the face to contradict him.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is rather a strong measure to say that I have the face to contradict in a matter where I did not contradict or interfere in the slightest degree.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he, of course, accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and regretted that he had used the expression to which he had taken exception. He desired now to refer to another question. It appeared to him that the whole communication between Mr. Meade and Prince Bismarck was of a most extraordinary character, and perfectly unprecedented in diplomatic history. This country had a Minister at Berlin, and there was a German Ambassador in England. Mr. Meade, a gentleman of whom he could only speak in the highest terms, had gone to Berlin as a delegate on the Congo Conference. As hon. Members were all aware, Mr. Meade had been for a long time in intimate communication with Lord Granville and with the Colonial Office; and Mr. Meade, on his own hook, so to speak, went to the German Foreign Office and made a distribution of the countries of the world. Mr. Meade, overlooking the Ambassadors, without, as he said, instructions from the Foreign Office, went first to Dr. Busch, and from him to Prince Bismarck, and others, and of his own initiative presented to Prince Bismarck a project under which England, France, and Germany were to divide amongst themselves the unoccupied territories of the Pacific. This was a most extraordinary proceeding on the part of Mr. Meade, because he offered not only territory to Germany, but to France, territories which England had entered into an arrangement should not be given to France. Mr. Meade showed the greatest inconsistencies in his statements. Writing from the Hotel Royal, Berlin, on the 10th of February, he said—

“There seems to be some not unnatural misapprehension in England, and consequently, I fear, in the Colonies, as to my observations in regard to the New Hebrides; and I should like to explain that my reference to those Islands was solely intended to show that Germany and England are not the only Powers interested in the South Seas. The questions between England and France respecting this particular group were our own concern; and I, therefore, merely mentioned the subject, without going into the details of what we should require from France as an equivalent for the withdrawal of the understanding as to the independence of the New Hebrides.”

Now, what was it Mr. Meade really said? In order to carry out his explanation he gave his original words. Mr. Meade, in a letter to Lord Granville, dated December 13, wrote—

“I pointed out that this would give Germany perfect freedom to develop their commercial enterprise in Samoa should the German Parliament make the necessary appropriation. France to be allowed to take the New Hebrides group, which lie away from the others, and would naturally fall into the New Caledonian system.”

The New Caledonian system! What was that system? It was a system of penal servitude; it was a system of depredation by convicts in those parts which had given rise to angry Correspondence between this country and France. Entirely ignoring the horror which the British Colonies had of any penal settlement being near them, Mr. Meade had actually proposed that, on certain conditions, the New Hebrides group should be handed over to France, by whom they would be made into a penal Colony. He should like the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies to give an explanation of this matter; because what was the meaning of the phrase, “falling naturally into the New Caledonian system,” if the New Hebrides were not to be supplementary to New Caledonia? The noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had in a very innocent way disposed of the allegations of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the hon. Member for Guilford (Mr. Onslow). But was there no public document with regard to the partitioning of these unoccupied Islands? There was no despatch to Mr. Meade; there was no communication either with him or with Prince Bismarck with regard to the offer to the German Government; and, instead of disavowing the proposal of Mr. Meade, all that the Government did was to decorate him. By decorating him at that moment, the only result would be that, both in the Colonies and Germany, the act would be taken in this sense—that the Government had not repudiated the proposals, and that, although they had not sanctioned them, they did not consider them impossible. There was another point upon which the noble Lord had laboured a great deal, but without success, and that was with regard to Samoa. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had asked the Government on several occasions whether they had any assurance in writing from the German Government that they did not intend to interfere with the independence of Samoa. The only answer which had hitherto been given by the noble Lord had been references to despatches written by Lord Granville to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin referring to reports of conversations; and now the noble Lord came forward with a document. The noble Lord since he had occupied the position which he then filled had obtained a considerable amount of self-complacency; and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) did not think there was any more signal instance of that than in the quotation of this particular document. The noble Lord said there were Conventions between Germany, and England, and Samoa, but that there was no direct Convention between England and Germany. He did not want to convict the noble Lord of an inaccuracy; but there was nothing about explanations having been previously exchanged in the despatch from Count Münster to Lord Granville, in which he talked about the maintenance of the independence of Samoa. The sentence in the letter written by Count Münster was as follows:—

“The note which the Royal British Ambassador at Berlin addressed on the 17th instant to the Imperial Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to New Guinea concludes with the information that the British Government has recently received Reports concerning the conclusion of a Treaty between the Representatives of Germany and the Chief of Samoa, and pre-supposes that this Treaty will not be ratified so far as the stipulations do not harm-

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

nise with the explanations previously exchanged between Germany and England with regard to the maintenance of the independence of Samoa."

Where did they see anything about explanations previously exchanged? There was not one word about them from Germany; the only explanations were furnished by our own officials. The only paragraph in which the word "independence" occurred was in a German despatch from Count Munster to Lord Granville, which said—

"While the undersigned has the honour of inclosing for the information of Her Majesty's Government the annexed German translation of this agreement, he expresses the hope of his Government that the Royal British Government will be convinced that the points agreed upon are within the limits of the German Treaty with Samoa, and encroach neither on the independence of this group of islands nor on the rights acquired there by other nations."

There was not one word about encroaching on Samoa, and when Lord Granville answered Count Munster he said—

"He did not take that as any guarantee of the independence of Samoa."

but he went on to say in the despatch to Count Munster of the 16th of February—

"It will not be possible for Her Majesty's Government to accept a position of less influence and consideration than is given to Germany by the agreement under discussion. If, therefore, it should be ratified by the Imperial Government in all its essential points, it may become necessary for Her Majesty's Government to call on the Samoa Government to enter into a precisely similar agreement for the benefit of British subjects, in order to secure the most favoured nation treatment, guaranteed to this country by Article 3 of the British Treaty with Samoa of August 29, 1879."

There was, therefore, no guarantee of the independence of Samoa. All they had got from Germany was a copy of an agreement which gave Germany certain powers; and so little did they look upon that as any guarantee of the independence of Samoa from Germany that they said they must obtain from Samoa the same guarantee for themselves. He challenged the noble Lord to produce any document in which the independence of Samoa was guaranteed by the German Government. Having touched on these points he was quite ready to go to a division; and if the hon. Gentleman opposite Mr. Buchanan would tell him on what they were to divide he should be very much obliged to him. He merely wished to point out that Mr. Meade's communications with the German Government were of the most unheard of and dangerous character, and they seemed to have sprung altogether from that spirit of concealment and reticence which the Government had on all occasions shown in the House. In the case of Egypt, it was that concealment and reticence which had drifted them into the terrible position in which they were at that moment, and which he hoped might not drift the country into similar complications with Russia. But, at the same time, he protested against an official being allowed to go to Berlin, and without authority, in the most liberal spirit, to dispose of territory in different parts of the world to Germany or any other Power; and he trusted the Committee would receive from a Member of the Government some repudiation of the proposals made by Mr. Meade, and especially with regard to the point of the occupation by France of the New Hebrides as a penal settlement.

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that in all that had fallen from hon. Members opposite on this Vote he thought there were only two points which concerned the Colonial Office on which he was bound to speak. The first was the last question raised by the hon. Member who had just sat down, with regard to Mr. Meade's communications, and the publication of the Correspondence, with regard to which he must say that these Papers were laid upon the Table of the House simply because of the publication in a German White Book of some portion of the Correspondence. Mr. Meade went to Berlin to attend the Conference there, and being a gentleman of very large acquaintance with Colonial matters—geographical and political—and having made the acquaintance of Dr. Busch, came into communication with him on these questions in an unofficial manner. What was their astonishment to see the bulk of that conversation published in a German White Book. Upon this it became necessary to publish the whole story as an antidote for what had been so published. The hon. Gentleman laid hold of the passage in which Mr. Meade proposed in certain contingencies that the New Hebrides should fall to France, and in which he said they would naturally come into the New Caledonian system. He could hardly believe his hon. Friend had really misunderstood the meaning of that term; he rather thought he intended to make a pun on the words. As a matter of fact, the words were used in the same sense as one would use them when he spoke of the planetary, railway, or any other system. Of course, what was meant was that geographically the New Hebrides belonged to the system of Islands of which New Caledonia was the principal, and stood in the same relation to them as Tahiti did to the Society Islands. And when Mr. Meade spoke in that way of the New Hebrides, he knew perfectly well that no such proposition as that which the hon. Member had supposed would be entertained, without consultation with the Australian Colonies, and without conditions absolutely satisfactory to their Governments were secured. Without dwelling on freedom of trade, and matters of that kind, he need not say that this country would never be a party to the handing over of the New Hebrides to France, unless there was absolute security against their being made into a penal settlement. This also was the answer of the Government to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) upon the same subject. And that brought him to the only other point upon which he had to speak—namely, the observation which fell from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham that Her Majesty's Government withheld information from the Colonies. If he were to allow that to pass without notice, it might be supposed that the Government had been guilty of withholding information from them. During the whole time he had been at the Colonial Office, and during the whole course of the transactions about New Guinea, the Government had never kept back any information from the Colonies. The Agents General of the Colonies were in constant communication with the Secretary of State. The Government could not always do what they were asked to do; but they certainly gave them all the information they possessed. Last October, when he was asked whether there was any arrangement that Germany should take possession of the Northern part of New Guinea, he answered "No," and that was the result of the whole information possessed by the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office at the time. Finally, he wished to repeat his assertion most positively that they assisted the Colonies by giving them all the information they possessed—there was no system of keeping back from them the terms of any arrangement they proposed to make or any information whatever.

MR. TOMLINSON said, there was a point which he thought properly arose on this Vote. He did not propose to go into the question of the Congo Treaty itself, but only to refer to some points in the negotiations which had taken place at Berlin. It was not the time then to go into the general question, because the whole of the Papers had not yet been laid on the Table of the House. The question he desired to raise was this—"How far had Her Majesty's Government kept the promises made to the House before these negotiations commenced?" It would be in the memory of most hon. Members that on the 3rd of April, 1883, the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) called attention to the apprehension he entertained that negotiations might be entered upon by Her Majesty's Government detrimental to the interests of this country, and that the discussion was closed by the Prime Minister, who said—

"I am quite ready, under the circumstances of the case, to engage . . . that if we should make a Treaty that Treaty should be made known to Parliament before ratification in such a way, and with the intervention of such an interval, that Parliament shall be enabled to exercise an independent judgment upon it."—(3 Hansard, [277] 1325.)

And then he said further on—

"I need not explain what the effect is of an intervention of a deliberative Chamber upon an unratified Treaty. We have experienced it in very important cases ourselves from other States, the effect of which is to prevent the instrument ever taking legal effect as a portion of International Law."—[Ibid. 1326.]

Upon that statement of the right hon. Gentleman the hon. Member for Manchester withdrew his Resolution, as he said, relying on the promise that the Treaty would not be ratified until the House had ample opportunity for discussion. Some further discussion took place on this; and his hon. Friend the Member for Guildford, not deeming the assurance on that point quite sufficient, drew a further statement from the Prime Minister, who said that the pledge

Mr. Evelyn Ashley

he had given was well understood; and that if the Government availed themselves of the crowded state of Business for the purpose of escaping discussion they would be guilty of violating that pledge. Well, the Treaty was signed on the 26th of February, 1884. He wished to observe in passing that the Treaty did not contain anything in itself about the consent of the Parliament, either of this country or of Portugal, being required before its ratification. Lord ELWOOD FITZGERALD: It was to be ratified. He was perfectly aware of that. He thought the noble Lord would see the cogency of his point when he came to it, which he would do as quickly as he could. The Treaty in terms required no confirmation by Parliament, or by the Cortes of Portugal, before it was ratified. But it concluded with a clause that it should be submitted for ratification as soon as possible. Time after time Questions had been asked in that House as to when it was to be submitted to the House; and it was not an unfair observation to say that if the Government had wished to have the Treaty discussed, they might have availed themselves of an opportunity afforded by a Motion put down by one of their constant supporters, because if it had been carried it would have supported the Government in the contentions they raised in the negotiations. But in answer to these Questions they only reiterated the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister during the previous Session. He came now to the point to which he wished to draw the attention of the Committee. Notwithstanding their avoidance of a discussion of the Treaty in Parliament, the Government, in their negotiations with the other Powers in Europe, endeavoured to obtain their consent to the views they had embodied in this Treaty. And in the despatch of Earl Granville to Baron Ampthill, dated the 26th of May Africa, No. 7, 1884, the necessity for the approval of the Portuguese Cortes was put forward, while the rights of the British Parliament were ignored. This was shown by the following passage:—

"Your Excellency is aware that the Treaty with Portugal, which was signed on the 26th of February last, has not yet been ratified, and that the election of a new Cortes is now necessary, before which the Treaty will have to be placed for ratification."

And Earl Granville, in the despatch of the 30th of June to Baron Ampthill, argued in favour of extending the territorial jurisdiction of Portugal in the manner proposed by the Treaty. He said—

"I have to point out to His Highness that, but for the persistent opposition of the British Government unsupported by any other Power, Portugal would, in all probability, have long since established herself in the Congo district."

The despatch went on to endeavour to induce the German Government to adopt the Treaty made between Portugal and this country. And the negotiations were further continued on this footing. In the instructions given by Earl Granville to Sir Edward Malet Africa, No. 8, 1884, he found the following—

"As Portugal, after having obtained the conditional assent of Great Britain to the recognition of her claims to the Coast from Ambri to the 5° 12' S. latitude"

He had therefore the fullest justification for saying that the Government, having promised to bring this Treaty for discussion before the House, sent their Representatives to the Conference at Berlin with their hands tied by the statement that Great Britain had given "conditional assent" to this Treaty. It was true that the House did not yet know what the results of the Conference at Berlin were; but it was clear from the Papers from which he had quoted that, but for the intervention of Prince Bismarck, this country would have been saddled with this Treaty with Portugal, which had never received the sanction of the House. It was hardly possible to acquit the Government of having committed a breach of faith with the House. The Government were in the dilemma of either having entered into negotiations with Foreign Powers, and of having tried to induce them to enter into a Treaty which they had promised to submit to the House, but had not so submitted, or of having concealed from foreign countries the fact that they had given that pledge to the House of Commons.

MR GLADSTONE: The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Tomlinson) is entirely mistaken in reference to the charge which he has thought fit to bring against the Government. It seems to be the impression of the hon. Member that Her Majesty's Government has given some unconditional pledge to lay this Congo Treaty before the House before it was entered into. No such pledge was ever asked for, or has ever been given. What was asked, and what was given, was a pledge, if it was a pledge, that before the ratification of the Treaty, if the ratification were contemplated, it would be brought before this House. The progress of investigation convinced the Government that the Treaty ought not to be ratified, and, consequently, the whole matter fell to the ground; and I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) and other Gentlemen who took a great interest in the question were better pleased with the total disappearance of the Treaty from the region of existence into the region of nonentity than they would have been by a lengthened discussion in this House for no end or purpose whatever. Therefore, Sir, with regard to the supposition that the Government were induced to conceal that pledge from a Foreign Power, which is one of the horns of his dilemma, I think the hon. Member will see that as the pledge was made openly in this House, and is recorded in our Records, reported in our debates, and printed all over the world—I leave the hon. Gentleman to judge in his own mind whether there is any force whatever in that charge. Now, Sir, I can assure the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that there was no intention on the part of my noble Friend (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) to censure him for having taken advantage of this opportunity. All my noble Friend stated was, that it was obvious that the discussion could not be entered into with perfect convenience. That, I think, is quite plain, if for no other reason, on account of the discontinuity in the attendance. I have seen the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) in his place sit out with great virtue and constancy this discussion from beginning to end; and he, with the official Gentlemen who occupy this Bench, are nearly the sole links between the beginning and the end of the debate. [Mr. WARRON: No, no!] I beg pardon. I am not going to impeach the hon. and learned Member for Bridport sedet æternumque sedebit. The hon. and learned Member is perfectly immaculate in the matter of attendance. I only spoke of those who contributed to the discussion; and I say that almost every contributor to the discussion, excepting the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, having made his contribution, has made his disappearance from the House. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) said one or two things that I cannot entirely allow to pass. In the first place, he has discovered that the Earl of Derby is a person of the most insignificant capacity, and that no such gentleman ought to be entrusted with the management of a Department of public affairs. Well, Sir, I may say that I recollect how for 20 years in this House I heard the Earl of Derby extolled to the skies for everything he did, and everything he did not do, by the other side of the House; and when I recollect that the Earl of Derby was never adversely criticized when he was a political opponent from this side of the House, I do not think that censure of this kind, coming so late in the day, will greatly affect the high character and reputation of the noble Earl. The hon. Member referred to the Report of the Earl of Northbrook, and I think he said there was a sum of £2,500 for his mission, and that the result of it was dear at the money. Well, what I would say is, let it remain until we have had our discussion on Egyptian Finance, and then we will be better able to judge whether or not that is fair criticism. The Colleagues of the Earl of Northbrook know very well the great benefit they have derived from the authoritative judgments which the Earl of Northbrook, from his visit to Egypt, has been able to form on many points of a difficult and complicated subject. I only ask the Committee to suspend its judgment until the discussion on these matters, and I think they will find that there is no ground for such criticism. I do not dwell on the case of Mr. Meade, further than to say that it is very gratifying to us to notice the just acknowledgment which the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) paid Mr. Meade for his public services. But I may observe that, if the slight mark of honour conferred upon him had been connected specially with this particular conversation at Berlin, of course it would have been conferred at the time of that conversation. That conversation took place three months ago. It is an acknowledgment of Mr. Meade's public services, but it has no relation to any particular act, and certainly not to an act which was entirely unofficial. I need not quote the passages which mark it as unofficial. The hon. Member for Portsmouth says—"Why has it not been repudiated?" But it is not necessary to repudiate a conversation which has no official character, and which is embodied in a document which declares, both in the first paragraph and the last, that it has no official character whatever, and it appears in this book, inasmuch as it is deemed worthy of reference in a White Book published in a foreign country. Well, Sir, with regard to Germany much has been said; and there has been a good deal of censure and a good deal of controversial matter imported into the debate, which I think, upon the whole, there is no advantage in going back upon—as to how the case stands with regard to the despatch of the 5th of May. How does the case stand in regard to that despatch? There is no doubt about it—it is perfectly well known, and has been placed on official record—that Prince Bismarck was under a mistake in his belief that the despatch had been communicated to Her Majesty's Government. For my own part, I will not depend upon my own memory, for it betrays me from time to time into error; but I remember that, upon hearing of that despatch, I immediately said to Earl Granville I could not believe my memory had so entirely and absolutely gone that I should not recollect such a despatch. Earl Granville said—"I am in the same position; I have no recollection of it." It is no wonder, because we have been in communication with the Representative of Germany on the subject, and it appears that it had never been communicated. I regret it, for at least I will say that, if it had been communicated to this country, it would have attracted all the attention, and it would have drawn all the friendly attention, which it would well have deserved. Now, Sir, with respect to the friendship with Germany, I stand behind no man in the value I attach to it. I said "no man," but I am not sure whether I ought not to make a single exception, and say that I am a little behind the hon. Gentleman the Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), because he laid down deliberately this doctrine—that it was vain for this country to think of maintaining its position in Europe or the world without the friendship of Germany. I must say that I think the generous enthusiasm of the hon. Gentleman betrayed him into an error when he laid down such a proposition as that. Perhaps the statement slipped from him inadvertently. I am not prepared to admit that the friendship of any country in the world is necessary, or ever has been necessary, to enable our country to maintain its position. I will go to the fullest length with him in the value he attached to the friendship of Germany. I would say one word as to the particular subject which has led to that variety of correspondence which, I feel convinced, never would have taken place at all if only there had been that general introduction to the question of the desire of Germany to become a Colonizing Power, which Prince Bismarck evidently thought he had secured by the sending of this despatch, for there is no doubt he did believe that that despatch had been communicated to us, although it never was. With respect to the colonizing of Germany, there are two limitations which ought to be placed on all Colonization. One of them, of course, is that it should conform to the Law of Nations, avoiding all nominal and fictitious claims, and be of a bona fide character; then it must have regard to the prior rights acquired by other countries. Another limitation is dictated, not by the Law of Nations, but by the law of morality and justice, and that is, that it should be conducted with a full and due regard to the interests and rights of all aboriginal inhabitants. In our case, there is, I may say, another consideration, because we are bound to see that fair justice is done to the reasonable claims of our own Colonists already established in those regions, having been there for generations, and having founded communities which, it is not too much to say, will eventually be the dominant communities in time to come. But, subject to these limitations, what I hold is this—that it is for Germany to say how far it is her interest to become a Colonizing Power. With that we have nothing whatever to do; but, so far as we are concerned, we ought to meet her in no grudging spirit. We ought not to enter into the discussion of the question of the occupation of this or that spot by Germany, as if it were to be conducted in a huckstering temper, with a disposition to withhold everything that it is possible to withhold. In my opinion, it is the grossest error on our part in policy and in principle to allow any such humour to prevail. If Germany becomes a Colonizing Power, all I can say is "God speed her." She becomes our ally and partner in the execution of a great purpose of Providence for the benefit of mankind, and I hail her entrance upon that operation, and gladly shall I hope that she will become associated with us in carrying the light of civilization, and the blessings that depend thereon, among the more backward and, as yet, less significant regions of the world. Now, Sir, under all these circumstances, and in all places, that is the spirit in which, irrespective of this despatch or that, irrespective of this correspondence or that—that is the spirit in which we regard the tendency and the efforts of Germany towards establishing herself as a Colonizing Power, and towards sending forth her intelligent citizens, who have proved themselves in the United States to be among the very best emigrants in the world. In that work she will have our best and heartiest wishes, and every encouragement in our power.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR remarked, that the concluding words of the speech of the Prime Minister would meet with the hearty concurrence of Members in every part of the House. He only wished the Colonial Office had been animated by such a generous spirit in its dealings with Germany during the past year. The Prime Minister appeared to think that this was a very inconvenient occasion on which to bring forward these matters; but this was likely to be the only opportunity that the House would have during the whole Session of adequately discussing the Colonial policy of the Government. He must congratulate the Government on having got off so cheaply that night. No one would assert that the Colonial policy of the Government during the last eight months had been a glorious one for this country. It had been marked by all the vacillation and indecision, and more than the ordinary ridicule, that had attached to the policy of the Government in other parts of the world. Many hon. Members and right hon. Gentlemen had been absent that evening; and it was certainly to be regretted, not alone in the interest of the Conservative Party, that those who might have spoken the mind of the Party with authority had not been present. He hoped it was not too late even now for some contribution from the Front Opposition Bench. This debate had been most useful in this, if in no other respect—it had drawn from the Under Secretary an assurance that an adequate arrangement would be made to prevent the New Hebrides being turned into a penal settlement by the French.

MR. WARTON asked for some explanation of the item of £9,000 for outfits "Payable through the changes consequent on the death of Lord Ampthill, the appointment of the Earl of Dufferin as the Viceroy of India, and the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Mexico."

A sum so large as £9,000 ought to have some explanation, and the more so that some time ago on a Diplomatic Vote the Committee received four or five different accounts from the Treasury Bench as to what had been done with regard to the Embassy House at Berlin. It was quite plain that under the lump sum paid in respect of the Berlin Embassy House there were some thousands of pounds concealed which ought to have been disclosed, and he was afraid there was something of the same sort being done in the matter of this £9,000. It was a perfect farce to have ridiculously small sums paraded while large sums were concealed. He should like to hear what sum had been spent through the changes consequent on the death of Lord Ampthill, what was spent on the appointment of the Earl of Dufferin as Viceroy, and what the re-establishment of diplomatic relations with Mexico had cost?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he only wished to make one observation, and it had reference to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley). The hon. Gentleman gave the Committee to understand that communications which passed between Mr. Malet and Prince Bismarck and Dr. Busch were of a strictly private and confidential nature. Particular stress was laid on the fact that they were of a private and confidential nature, and had no official character whatever. Referring to despatch No. 2, which was very properly called "Extract from a private letter from Mr. Meade to Earl Granville," he found a remarkable paragraph. The writer stated he had not had time to make a copy of a Memorandum, and asked for the loan of Earl Granville's copy. That appeared to him to be the most remarkable specimen of a private communication that had ever been laid before the House of Commons. He hoped that before this conversation ended the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies would be able to explain the very peculiar nature of this public-private-official communication.

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he did not understand his hon. Friend's point. Mr. Meade's communications would naturally be sent to his Colleague.

Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, there was one question he had to ask; and it was whether the Government absolutely repudiated any intention of offering the New Hebrides to France?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE rose to reply to the question put by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport Mr. Warton; the question was a very natural one indeed, and one which he fully expected would be asked in the course of the discussion. He had before now had occasion to explain to the Committee, on the ordinary Estimates for the Foreign Office, that the sum for outfits varied from year to year, and that, notwithstanding every effort that was made—he assured the Committee he had made every effort during the time he had been at the Foreign Office not to ask for Supplementary Votes—it was impossible, when the ordinary Estimates of the year were prepared, to foresee the exact sum which would be necessary for outfits. The present charge for outfits was almost entirely owing to the diplomatic changes consequent on the death of Lord Ampthill. The principal item was that of £2,500 for Sir Edward Malet. He did not think the Committee would wish him to read the list of items; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman Mr. Warton desired to see the list, he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) would be glad to furnish him with a copy. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, asked what part of the item was due to the re-establishment of relations with Mexico. The sum charged under that head was £340. To show how the charge for outfits varied from time to time, perhaps he might point out that, in 1881, the charge was only £290; but that, in the following year, when there were several changes in the Diplomatic Service, it was £13,261. In the ordinary Estimates of the year, which were already in the hands of hon. Members, he had taken the average; but, owing to this large sum for the present year, probably next year the amount expended would be small. He hoped his explanation would be satisfactory to the hon. and learned Gentleman Mr. Warton.

Vote agreed to.

3. £2,050, Colonies, Grants in Aid.

4. £6,200, South Africa and St. Helena

Class VI—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES.

5. £17,000, Superannuations and Retired Allowances.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked how it came to pass that so large a sum as £6,000 was wanted in the Supplementary Estimates in connection with "Superannuations and Allowances, Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice." For a single Department the amount was so large that one was puzzled to imagine how the authorities could be so far out in their Estimates. It could only be excused on the ground that something unforeseen had occurred in the year, or that some great re-organization had taken place.

Mr. HIBBERT explained that the charge was entirely owing to the re-organization in the Pay Office.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, there was a tendency to increase, which certainly ought to be repressed by those who were responsible for the Department. He noticed that in 20 years the Vote for Superannuations and Retired Allowances had grown from £183,000 to £463,000. That was, in his opinion, a very extravagant increase.

Mr. SELATER-BROUTH said, that perhaps his hon. Friend (Mr. Hibbert) would be good enough to explain the large item for Diplomatic Services—how it was that so large a sum as £4,000 could not have been foreseen in the Estimates which were voted last year?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the sum included the retiring allowances made to Sir Charles White,

Sir Henry Layard, and Mr. Harrison. There had been some uncertainty as to the sums to be paid, and a legal point was raised, especially in the case of Sir Henry Layard, and therefore it was not possible to foresee what would be paid. He could only repeat that he had made every effort to keep down the Supplementary Estimates of his Department.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought there should be some sort of examination into the law which at present governed diplomatic pensions. The noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had just told them that one of the payments under this Vote was to Sir Henry Layard. It was perfectly true that for one or two years, a great many years ago, Sir Henry Layard was in the Diplomatic Service as an attaché to an Ambassador. For a long while he was a distinguished Member of the House of Commons, and because he had been an attaché and a Member of the House and an Under Secretary of State he was sent as Minister to Spain. Subsequently he was sent to Constantinople. Now, the law with regard to diplomatic pensions was that a person could only receive a pension after 15 years' service, and during 10 of those years he must have held a diplomatic position abroad. When Sir Henry Layard ceased to be Ambassador at Constantinople he had only served 10 years and three months, and he had to wait some years doing nothing, receiving no pension, until 15 years had elapsed from the time of his admission to the Diplomatic Service—that was when he first went to Spain. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not think pensions were intended for that sort of service—for paid service in the Diplomatic Corps. It might be said that diplomacy was a profession, and that the pensions were intended for those who had passed the greater part of their lives in it. Sir Henry Layard was to receive £1,700 per annum for having served as Ambassador for 10 years. Right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench served their country for much longer than 10 years without receiving, when they retired, a pension of £1,700 a-year. He did not think Sir Henry Layard was to blame, because, perhaps, anyone in the House would take a pension if he got the chance. Legally, Sir Henry Layard was entitled to take a pension, and he (Mr. Labouchere) never blamed anyone for taking what he was entitled to take. But he thought that an alteration should be made in the system, and that pensions should be limited to those who had devoted their lives to the Diplomatic Service, and not given to gentlemen who were pitchforked from the House of Commons into a diplomatic position for a few years only.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) objected to Sir Henry Layard having a pension, on the ground that that gentleman had not devoted the whole of his life to the Diplomatic Service; or, in other words, on the ground that, having been in the Diplomatic Service, and having then come into the House of Commons, he was put into an Embassy because he made himself disagreeable to the Government Department to which he belonged. The hon. Gentleman should recollect that some day he might find himself in the same position. It was, therefore, quite possible that if the hon. Gentleman opposed this Vote he might be cutting his own throat.

MR. W. H. SMITH wished to say a very few words in reference to the Chancery allowances which were included in the Vote. He understood his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) to say there had been a reorganization of the Paymaster's Office. He did not doubt that the re-organization was prompted by a sincere desire to promote the best interests of the Public Service; but he had had some experience of re-organizations, and he was bound to say they frequently disappointed the expectations of the persons who had made them. He trusted the Government and the Treasury would be extremely cautious how they entered into re-organizations which did not immediately effect a very considerable economy in the Service. No doubt there might be occasions when it was necessary to get rid of certain officers who stood in the way of great practical improvements; but there was a great deal to be said on both sides of the question. He was bound to say that re-organizations were not satisfactory which made considerable increases to the Pension Vote, and only temporary reductions of the Votes for the Effective Services. The Effective Votes had a tendency to increase in the proportion in which it was assumed the efficiency of the Service was promoted, while the Pension Vote decreased very gradually indeed. He made no opposition to this Vote as it stood; but it did seem to him that reorganization was a proceeding which required the greatest possible caution on the part of the Treasury.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) had not given any explanation of the last item of the Vote—namely, “grants made to certain Colonies.”

Mr. HIBBERT said, the item referred to by the hon. Gentleman represented a pension granted to a late Governor, the Marquess of Normanby, on the ground of advancing age.

Vote agreed to.

6. Motion made, and Question proposed.

“That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £800, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, in aid of the Local Cost of Maintenance of Pauper Lunatics in Ireland.”

Mr. W. J. CORBET noticed that this Vote was—

“To meet the case of a greater increase in the number of patients during the year than had been anticipated and provided for.”

He would like to know whether the increase of insanity was real or not. The hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), when he was Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, stated his opinion that the increase of insanity was real; but since then he (Mr. Corbet) found that the Commissioners had in their Report repeated the statement that had been made for so many years that the increase was only apparent resulting from the accumulation of chronic cases. He would like to draw the attention of the Committee to the figures. He found that in 1862 the number of insane persons in the United Kingdom was 55,527, and that in 1872 it was 77,013, and that in 1882 it was 98,871. He found that in 1884 the number had again increased to 103,660, an increase in two years of 4,589. The ratio of insane per 1,000 of the population, was, in 1862, 1.81; in 1872,

2.41; and in 1882, 2.84. Now, it was a very remarkable thing that the Commissioners of Lunacy should try and make it appear from their Report that insanity was not on the increase in the face of figures such as he had quoted. He did not desire to make any attack upon the public lunatic asylum system in Ireland; indeed, he only wished that there were none but public lunatic asylums, for he believed that the insane population were very much better provided for in those asylums than they were in private asylums. Owing to the vicious principle of deriving profit that pervaded the private lunatic asylum system, patients did not receive the same treatment or reap the same advantages as patients in public asylums. He would not enter further into the matter on that occasion; but he hoped to have some expression of opinion as to whether or not the increase which was minimized and made light of by the Commissioners was real or not.

Mr. HIBBERT said, the Vote was one which belonged to the Department of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman); but as his hon. Friend (Mr. Corbet) had referred to him, and to a speech he made on this question, he must say that he held the opinion he expressed last year—namely, that there had been a considerable increase in lunacy in the United Kingdom, though some part of it might be accounted for in England by the fact that lunatics were now sent to county asylums from workhouses and other places. He did not think that there was the same ground for the increase in the other parts of the United Kingdom. The whole matter, however, could be discussed when the Bill, which was now being prepared, and which would shortly be introduced in the House of Lords, came before the House.

COLONEL COLTHURST desired to put a question to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) with respect to the position of pauper lunatics in the county of Cork. Insane persons arriving in Cork were sent to the asylum there, and they became for ever a charge on the rates of the county and City of Cork. In such cases in England, he understood, there would be the power to send the persons to the Union or county to which they belonged, so

MR. SMALL wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had considered the question of the pay and superannuation of the lunacy attendants, and whether any improvement could be made in the position of those officers?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that he would look into that matter.

MR. DEASY said, he thought that after the observations which had been made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for County Cork (Colonel Colthurst) with reference to the existing state of the law affecting lunatics in Ireland, it was clear that the law as it stood was very unjust to the people who contributed the bulk of the money for the maintenance of those lunatics. Every pauper lunatic in Cork Harbour or on any part of the coast of the County Cork, or that district, or of the district of the Cork Asylum, no matter where, was at once transferred to the Cork District Asylum, and charged on the rates of that district. He believed that a great part of the money which was now about to be voted went for the maintenance of such individuals. He trusted that the Government would soon introduce their Irish Bill, and would take into account the fact that both the ratepayers and the Government contributed largely to these lunatic asylums in Ireland, and that the present system of administering the money paid by the ratepayers and voted by Parliament was defective in many respects. There was another matter to which he wished to call attention. He believed that a considerable portion of this money was mis-spent very often, owing to the manner in which the Boards of Governors were constituted; and that was attributable, to a great extent, to the manner in which the Lord Lieutenant and his advisers had made the appointments to these Boards. A Governing Board had been created in Cork which met with the disapproval of everybody in that county and city. He should like to draw attention to some of the recent appointments. Some years ago an application was made to the then Lord Lieutenant asking that four or five members of the Cork Town Council should be appointed Governors of the district lunatic asylum. The Lord Lieutenant, in reply, wrote, asking them to nominate three gentlemen, and saying that he should be glad to appoint them. They nominated three gentlemen, one Conservative, one from the Whig Party in the Council, and one Representative of the Nationalists. These gentlemen were appointed, and about four months afterwards the Council unanimously decided on nominating another gentleman — Mr. Alderman Nagle—who had been a considerable time Chief Magistrate of the city, and who was one of the most experienced and able members of the Council. The then Lord Lieutenant refused to appoint this gentleman; but six or eight months after that the Council again determined to nominate him for the same position, and threatened that if he were not appointed they would refuse to present for the amount required by the Governors to carry on the institution. Under the influence of that threat His Excellency wrote a very conciliatory letter, and promised that he was very likely to see his way to meet their views. Ultimately he was appointed under that threat. When another vacancy occurred last summer another gentleman, who happened to be an Orangeman, a Conservative, and a Freemason, was nominated, and by return of post the Corporation received a letter from the Lord Lieutenant approving of his nomination, and assenting to it. That gentleman did not long enjoy the office, and another vacancy very soon occurred on the Board, and a Mr. John O'Brien was nominated by the Corporation from their own body. About three months ago his name was sent to Dublin Castle; but the Lord Lieutenant did not see his way to appoint him, because he differed from him in political matters. Mr. O'Brien was again nominated; but a second time the Lord Lieutenant refused to appoint him. And he (Mr. Deasy) was happy to say that the Corporation were now about to have recourse to the same tactics which they used before, and that they intended to refuse the supplies unless this very reasonable demand of theirs was complied with. The Lord Lieutenant pleaded in extenuation of his conduct that there were no vacancies on the Board; whereas, as a matter of fact, there were three, because two gentlemen had left the county and resigned their positions, and another was dead. There was a special reason why Mr. O'Brien should be appointed, because the ratepayers had strong grounds for believing that jobs had been carried by the Board for the benefit of the political friends of the majority of the Board. It had come under the notice of the Town Council that within the last six or eight months a considerable sum had been thrown away on one contract alone—the woollen contract; and Mr. O'Brien, who was largely in the woollen trade, had a special knowledge of that particular branch of business, and it was believed that he would be able to put an end to such things as had been going on for very many years. He (Mr. Deasy) trusted that some explanation would be given of the course which had been taken by His Excellency in the case of Mr. O'Brien. Whenever a gentleman representing the opposite political views to those of Mr. O'Brien had been nominated, the Lord Lieutenant had never hesitated for a moment about assenting to the appointment; but the moment a gentleman like Mr. O'Brien was named, His Excellency put down his foot and refused to allow the appointment to be made. He (Mr. Deasy) did not think that such a power was rightly exercised by persons like Earl Spencer, and he maintained that the ratepayers should be permitted to have a voice in the management of these establishments for the future. It was a deplorable state of things that gentlemen of Mr. O'Brien's position in Cork, a Town Councillor, representing a very large constituency, and being one of the leading men of the city, should be denied the right to sit on such a Board, because the Lord Lieutenant for the time being did not agree with their political opinions. He did not think that such a line of action would at all tend—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not think the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant has anything to do with the Vote for the increase of these lunatics in Ireland. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to go on for some time, because I thought he was going to connect his comments with the increase in the number of lunatics.

MR. SEXTON: May I submit to you, Sir, that the remarks of my hon. Friend are pertinent to the administration by the Boards of Governors of the money intrusted to them?

THE CHAIRMAN: In my opinion, the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant has nothing whatever to do with the Vote now before us. If the hon. Member wishes to raise any question of that kind, the proper time to do it will be when the main Vote comes under consideration. The present Vote is only for an increased cost, owing to the increased number of lunatics. It is certainly not in Order to complain of the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant on this particular Vote.

MR. DEASY would, of course, bow to the ruling of the Chair; but he had intended to show that part of the sum which they were now called upon to vote would be misapplied, owing to the fact that the proper men were not appointed upon the Governing Boards, to see the money properly administered. But as the Chairman had ruled him out of Order, he would not, of course, pursue this line of argument any further. As to one of the questions raised by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst), there could be no doubt that if a proper classification were carried out in Ireland, Parliament would not be called upon to provide so large a sum annually as was now asked for on this account. Owing to the want of proper accommodation in the workhouses of Ireland, and to the fact that a great number of paupers who were really not dangerous lunatics, and for whom lunatic asylums were never intended, had to be accommodated in them, the sum asked for was much in excess of what it ought to be, and the county cess was burdened to an unfair and unjust extent. That was a state of things which should be promptly remedied. On the other hand if those poor people now in lunatic wards in workhouses could be treated differently, there might be some hope for them; but as matters stood at present, it was impossible for any of them to recover their reason, on account of their surroundings and to the want of proper provision being made for them. In fact, it was impossible for their mental condition to improve so long as they were confined to the narrow ill-ventilated and unhealthy wards of workhouses.

MR. KENNY wished to say a few words upon the Vote which was now before the Committee, and to call the attention of the Committee to certain features in the management of the Cork Asylum and of the Clare Asylum. It was no wonder that the cost of maintaining asylums in Ireland greatly increased under the system of management adopted by the Boards of Governors, who seemed to take so much interest in the duties imposed upon them that he found, in the case of the Cork Asylum, that three or four of the Governors placed upon the Board had not condescended to attend even a single meeting of the Board in the course of a year. In fact, it was quite clear that the only popular person who had a seat upon the Board was the Mayor of Cork, and he was about the most regular attendant at the meetings. Among the names of the Governors was that of the Earl of Mount Cashel, who had not found it convenient to attend a single meeting, and that of the Earl of Bantry, who was in the same position, and that of Sir C. D. O. J. Norreys, who also had not attended a meeting. In fact, if he read out the whole list of names it would be found that, with the exception of one or two, none of them had attended to the duties with which they were charged. The only conclusion that could be arrived at from the registers of the Boards of Governors, was that the management of the lunatic asylums would become so defective that the cost which appeared in the Estimates would naturally become greater and greater every year. Looking at the case of the County Clare, he found that the number of meetings attended by the various members of the Boards of Governors was even less than in the case of Cork. He found that these self-nominated gentlemen, although they were not very great guns like those he had just named—there was no Earl of Bantry or Earl of Mount Cashel; they were only plain gentlemen, J.P.'s, and so on, or at the outside Deputy Lieutenants—were nearly all resident in the county, and yet they did not find it convenient to attend. He thought the system of intrusting the management of the lunatic asylums in Ireland to a body of irresponsible men who virtually took no interest whatsoever in the matters in which they were supposed to be concerned, was very scandalous, when one considered what ought to be the system of local government and local management. He found that recently the Board of Governors of the Ennis Asylum had under their attention the appointment of a resident medical superintendent. There were a great many candidates for that position, and amongst them were certain extremely well-qualified local candidates. The majority of the Board were in favour of a local candidate; but it appeared that the appointment of a resident medical superintendent to the Ennis Asylum rested with the Lord Lieutenant; and the consequence was, that in spite of the local feeling and of the feeling even of the Governors, a gentleman was brought from County Cork with no special claims. That gentleman had had some service in a lunatic asylum previously, but certainly no superior claims which would entitle him to a position among strangers upon whom he had no local claims whatever. This system of foisting candidates upon persons who did not require their services was a most objectionable one. Certainly, he did not envy the gentlemen who were appointed, because they were very likely to become lunatics themselves in the course of a few years. That had been the fate of a previous occupant of the office in the Ennis Asylum, and he did not envy the success of the present official in any way. However, if these appointments were to be made at all, they should be made in a spirit of fair play, and those who had local claims and personal qualifications which were undoubted, ought to be elected wherever they could be found. The gentleman who ought to have been selected for the Ennis Asylum had for two years at least been locum tenens for the previous holder of the office, owing to an attack of temporary insanity, which afterwards turned out to be permanent, with which that previous holder was afflicted. The gentleman he referred to discharged the duties while acting as locum tenens with entire satisfaction, and was a man of high character and of great ability; but he had been thrown over for a third or fourth rate man, who had been brought from a distance of 100 miles away and placed over an asylum which he knew nothing about and had no connection with. He hoped that the Chief Secretary, who was responsible, would be able to give some explanation of the matter, as to whether there was any good reason why a local gentleman of superior claims was passed over by the Lord

Mr. Kenny

Lieutenant of Ireland, and a stranger foisted upon the people of the locality.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, it was true that the local candidate had a great deal of local support, and he had not one word to say against him. No doubt, he was possessed of high qualities. As a matter of fact, the gentleman in question was dispensing officer for two months, and he served as assistant resident medical superintendent temporarily since May 1883, and he believed that was the whole of his experience in this respect. The hon. Member had said something about the appointment of these officers being left at the mercy of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; but he would point out that that was a duty imposed upon the Lord Lieutenant by Statute. He could assure the Committee that no one would be more delighted than the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he were relieved of the responsibility of appointing persons to these important positions. The Lord Lieutenant, however, was responsible to the Government. With regard to the case of the Fins Lunatic Asylum, the hon. Member seemed to think that the officer who had been appointed was a second or third rate man; but out of the almost innumerable candidates, Dr. Jocelyn was placed unhesitatingly first on the very long list of applicants for the post by the Medical Inspector of Lunatic Asylums; he was considered to be one of the first among assistant superintendents throughout Ireland. His experience was that he had been assistant resident medical officer for 14 years; whereas the experience of the other gentleman extended over about as many months, and he had not been in the regular service. Then he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) asked what would be thought of the conduct of a Government who, when a vacancy occurred, failed to give promotion to men who were perfectly well qualified? He could assure hon. Members that he had gone through the whole of the papers and seen the applications of the candidates, with the result that he believed no reasonable person could come to any other conclusion than that Dr. Jocelyn was the very best man for the position. It would have been, no doubt, a graceful act to have appointed the local candidate, against whom he had nothing to say; but, unfortunately, his testimonials, which related principally to knowledge of his personal qualities, could not be set against the experience and long service in the other case. That was the history of the appointment, which had been made after a long and careful consideration, and he believed that appointment had received the approbation of the existing Lunacy Administration in Ireland.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought that this Vote was one which could not but be regarded with dissatisfaction by anyone interested in the administration of the insane law in Ireland. What did he find? The Government asked for £890 for the maintenance of pauper lunatics in Ireland. It was for the maintenance of a greater number of lunatics than had been provided for in the original Estimate. He thought it was a serious matter when the Government found themselves compelled to apply for more money than was originally asked for. Hon. Members should bear in mind that this increase in the expenditure on account of pauper lunatics in Ireland was an increase which went on year by year, and it was not the first occasion upon which Irish Members had observed this increase. He had not been able to look to the figures for the last two or three years; but he believed he was justified in saying—indeed, he challenged contradiction—that the increase was steadily growing. Not only was the amount paid from the Imperial Treasury increasing, but it was also the case with the amount paid by the ratepayers of the country. He found that the total for the present year was £93,390; for 1883 it was £82,866. That was a very considerable difference, and one which well deserved the attention of the Committee. What made the increase more extraordinary was that it took place in a country in which the population was steadily decreasing; they had a decreasing population on the one hand, and an increasing expenditure for pauper lunatics on the other. That, he said, was a most alarming circumstance, and deserved the serious attention of the Committee, as well as a much more complete answer than had been given by the Chief Secretary. For his own part, he believed that the reason of this increase was bad management. They would not have been called upon for the £890 asked for if these lunatic asylums were properly managed; and he submitted that the Chief Secretary was called upon to give some answer to the various points raised. He spoke with the authority of a person as familiar with the management of lunatic asylums as anyone in that House when he said that these Governing Bodies were almost entirely self-elected. A certain number of gentlemen, all belonging to a particular class of the population, when a vacancy occurred, sent to the Lord Lieutenant a recommendation of some person for the appointment. It was a system of Local Option, tempered with the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant. Would the right hon. Gentleman stand up in that House and justify this principle of self-elected Guardians, which largely accounted for the extraordinary increase of expenditure for the maintenance of pauper lunatics in the midst of a diminishing population? He wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he thought it becoming, in reference to this gross mismanagement by self-elected Governors, on the part of the Lord Lieutenant or himself, to bring his influence to bear to prevent anything like a mixture of the popular element with the body of self-elected Governors—was it decent on the part of himself or the Lord Lieutenant? ["Order!"] He did not wish to offend the Chief Secretary by any language of his own; but was it seemly on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who bore his share of the responsibility for these transactions, to interfere and prevent a popular Body from having one of its most trusted representatives serving as one of the Governing Body of the asylum? He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that this was a question on which the ratepayers of Ireland would make themselves heard before long. In 1883 the entire sum paid on account of Lunatic Asylums was £219,516 for pauper lunatics, and although £98,566 was paid from the Imperial Exchequer, the ratepayers paid £123,702 of the amount. That being so, he thought that the ratepayers had some reason to exercise very stringent control over an institution which cost them such an enormous sum of money. But what did he find now? He had not the exact figures in his possession; but he understood from an hon. Friend below him, who was intimately acquainted with the subject, that the ratepayers of Ireland, this year, in place of paying the enormous sum of £126,702, which was the amount in 1883, were now paying something like £130,000 for pauper lunatics. It was no wonder that they should be called upon to vote an additional sum like the present, when they saw increased expenditure going on at this gigantic rate. He asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to explain whether, in any legislation he might hereafter bring forward, he would include a radical and revolutionary change in the government of these asylums? There was evidently some such reform required in the government of these institutions, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could stand up and justify the action of the Body which had refused to sanction the appointment of Mr. O'Brien? Was it to be tolerated that a body of representatives of the ratepayers at Cork should not have the right of appointing to the Governing Body of the lunatic asylum of the district a man accepted by them as a worthy mouthpiece? He was satisfied that any attempt in London or Edinburgh, or in any other part of the country of England or Scotland, to interfere in this way with the rights of the ratepayers, would not be tolerated for one moment.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he had called Order during the speech of the hon. Member for Galway; but he begged to say that he had merely endeavoured to awaken a few hon. Members while the hon. Gentleman was addressing the Committee.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) expressed his surprise and indignation at the increase of the Vote for Pauper Lunatics, and he said that the Government and the Irish Administration had so mismanaged this Vote that they had now to ask for a large supplementary sum. He would point out, however, that the sum asked for was less than 1 per cent on the amount of the original Estimate. The Committee would be aware that in preparing the Estimates the actual number of inmates of lunatic asylums could only be guessed, and he did not think that the increase of 1 per cent was a charge with respect to which hon. Members need be tempted to use such strong language. The hon. Member said that the whole of the increase was due to the mismanagement of the authorities; but the reason why the Vote had increased was that the number of lunatics had increased. It was a melancholy fact that there were many insane persons who were not registered as lunatics, and although the population of Ireland was diminishing, the number of lunatics in the asylums was on the increase. In 1875 the average number of persons in the asylums was 7,750, and the gross amount required under this Vote was £80,000; in 1882, the last year for which he had a Return, the average daily number was 9,170, and the amount required £95,868. The Committee would observe that there had been a steady increase in the number of lunatics, and although it was extraordinary, as the hon. Gentleman said, that there should be an increased charge with a diminishing population, that increased charge was due, nevertheless, to the increase of lunacy in the population; it was purely due to the increase of lunatics in the asylums. The hon. Member, in referring to the appointment to the governing body of Cork Lunatic Asylum, had spoken of the advantage of self-government. So far as that matter was concerned, he was entirely with the hon. Member; he wished that by some system of local self-government duties such as these could be thrown on the localities, and he trusted that it would not be long before some such system was introduced. In the meantime, however, they had to deal with things as they found them, and the duty was thrown by law on the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of appointing Governors to these asylums. It had been said that the Lord Lieutenant had refused to appoint the gentleman referred to because he had refused to dine with him. If the hon. Member opposite thought that was the case, all he could say was that he should disabuse his mind of that idea. The truth was that the Corporation of Cork had by custom, but not by right, been in the habit of recommending Governors to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for appointment. These persons had sometimes been accepted and sometimes not; but lately the Corporation had assumed a somewhat different attitude, and had claimed, not only the privilege of recommending according to the practice which had been followed hitherto, but they claimed the actual right of nomination. Now, the Lord Lieutenant was responsible under Statute, and he could not divest himself of his responsibility for the appointments. When Mr. O'Brien was recommended, after a good deal of discussion, certain men were sent up from Cork Town Council in connection with a vacancy which had occurred, and Earl Spencer came to the conclusion that there was a sufficient number of Governors already, and that, therefore, there was no necessity of filling the vacant place. Then it was said that the city interest was left imperfectly represented on the Board of Governors; but, according to the numbers, he found in the documents before him the city interest already preponderated on the Board. He thought that was an important point. In 1884, the County of Cork paid £7,953 towards the maintenance of asylums, and was represented by 15 Governors; and in the same year the City of Cork paid £2,695, and was represented by 22 Governors. He begged to assure the Committee that there had been no intention whatever to put any slight upon the Corporation; and there would be no desire, when it was necessary to appoint a Governor, not to take into the fullest consideration the expressed wishes of that Body.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Mr. DEASY said, as a matter of fact, the Corporation had only two representatives on the Board.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR said, this question with regard to pauper lunatics in Ireland was of great interest to the people. His hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Colthurst), who had laid this question before the Committee, had emphasized the fact that the Corporation of the City of Cork had taken into very serious account the manner of the administration of funds at the disposal of the Board; and he thought that, notwithstanding the statement of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, it had been clearly shown that the citizens of Cork had no fair representation upon that Board. So much had that been brought home to the people of Cork that investigations were instituted by the Corporation, which resulted in the discovery that a great deal of expense had been incurred by the acceptance of bad contracts, and that in this way the funds had been improperly administered. In that state of things the Corporation of the City of Cork selected a certain man who was an expert in some articles dealt with by the Lunatic Board of the district asylum, and they had their suspicions that the Lord Lieutenant would not appoint him in consequence of his political opinions. The person selected was a man remarkable for his business capacity, and he had already served upon public Boards to the advantage of his fellow-citizens. The Lord Lieutenant did not appoint him. And why? Because he had lain for four months on a plank bed; because he had protested against laws which he believed to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Hon. Members on those Benches were entitled to ask on what grounds this man had been rejected. For the information of the Committee, he begged to state that the constant refusal of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to appoint men to public Boards in Ireland in cases of this kind only increased the discontent which existed with regard to the administration of these funds; that this discontent was extending itself upwards amongst business men in the country, and it was high time that the Government should take this matter into consideration with a view to remedy the evils complained of.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the Committee would appreciate the way in which the Chief Secretary had given information to the Committee with regard to this Vote. They had a distinct conflict of evidence upon this point. The junior Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Deasy) said that the city had only two representatives on the Board. The right hon. Gentleman said there were 22. [MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I said on the Corporation.] Their point was that when a member of the Board appointed by the Corporation died, the Corporation claimed the right to nominate. Who were the persons who represented the City of Cork on the Lunacy Board—who were the safeguarders of the money of the ratepayers? Why, here was one, the Earl of Mount Cashel, a gentleman of 90 years of age, who never thought of attending to the duties of the post. The Earl of Bantry was another—a gentleman at present engaged in hunting the kangaroo in Australia; and there were many others—J. P's and so on—not one of whom not only would not be appointed by the Corporation, but would not be appointed to the meanest office in the Municipality by anyone who had the interest of the Municipality at heart. The fact of the matter was this—that formerly, when a death or vacancy occurred amongst the Governors of the lunatic asylum, although there were more Governors than there were at the present time, the Lord Lieutenant nominated a new one. Now, however, when a vacancy occurred, and when the Town Council of Cork for the first time for years proposed to exercise its right to nominate a Governor, the Lord Lieutenant made the flimsy excuse that there were too many Governors already. The Lord Lieutenant and the Government, who were responsible for this, were the people who would extend the franchise, who wished for popular representation, and who desired that the people should express their opinions. A Member of the Government that night had declared that the Government wished for some system of local self-government, and yet Her Majesty's Government would not allow the people of Cork so much local self-government as would consist in allowing the Town Council of Cork to nominate a Governor to the Cork Lunatic Asylum. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) said—"We have been anxious for years to give you a system of local self-government." Well, the Irish Members would put his sincerity to the test, and would say—"Give us as much local self-government as will enable us to nominate a Governor for a lunatic asylum and to secure his appointment—give us the power we have hitherto exercised." They were told that the Lord Lieutenant considered they were too full on the Board, and that they had enough Governors. Well, he presumed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had a desire to obtain some amount of credit in his Office, although he was a Scotch official. The right hon. Gentleman must have some desire to please the masses of the people he was amongst. If he were sent to India, at any rate he would have that feeling with regard to the Hindoos. How could he tell them, without the most protence, that he was anxious to give them local self-government, when he refused to allow them the small privilege they were now asking for? Now, the Irish Members knew very well the reason of the right hon. Gentleman's reluctance to agree to the present just demand. This reason was that Mr. J. O'Brien had got four months' imprisonment—that when the Government officials in Ireland were looking about for meurais sujets and village ruffians, they had put this man, who was a Councillor of the city, and one of the most honest citizens of Cork, in gaol, and had given him four months' confinement for making a speech. They had punished this man for making a speech which was not by any means as violent as speeches they heard every day in that House. He (Mr. Healy) wished he could have a sovereign for every speech of a stronger character he had made in the House. The Government not being satisfied with having plank-bedded this gentleman, with having shaved his head and shaved his beard, and kept him on skilley for four months—this not being enough for them, they now refused to allow him to be appointed a Governor of a lunatic asylum. Before he (Mr. Healy) passed from this case, he would say that the best way for the Corporations of Ireland to bring the Lord Lieutenant and all Lord Lieutenants to their senses, was just to give them a taste of the quality of the Limerick Corporation. The Corporation of Cork paid thousands of pounds a-year for the keeping up of its lunatic asylum. Let them pay no more. If Earl Spencer, whilst pretending to desire to make the people loyal, insisted upon excluding them from the management of local institutions—

Mr. John O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that we are not engaged in a discussion as to the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant. The Vote is to provide for an increase of pauper lunatics, and this is not an occasion for reviewing the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant on this subject. If that matter is discussed at all, it must be discussed on the Main Question. This Vote is for an increase of pauper lunatics, and I cannot allow the debate to wander off into an attack upon the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. HEALY said, he had been misled into irrelevancy by imitating the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, to whom he had been replying. He should like to ask whether this asylum was the one with which Dr. Eames was connected? He had been intending to bring the case of that doctor forward. Dr. Eames was one of the gentlemen brought up to Dublin by the Government to give a professional Report upon the condition of Mr. James Ellis French. He had given a bogus Report, declaring that Mr. James Ellis French was weak in the understanding, weak in the hips, weak in the legs, and weak in every way, and that he was perfectly incompetent—that was to say, he was so incompetent that he was unable to plead to an indictment. This gentleman, together with Dr. Curtis and Dr. Gordon, had been brought in to declare that Mr. James Ellis French, now undergoing two years' imprisonment in Her Majesty's prison, was absolutely ruined in his faculties. If any of his (Mr. Healy's) hon. Friends were anxious to know how bad Mr. James Ellis French was in the opinion of this Dr. Eames, who was the doctor of the lunatic asylum in question, and a man through whose hands lunatic patients passed, they would find on inquiry that his view was that Mr. French was an idiot. That in itself was enough to show how this man Eames was fitted to be intrusted with the doctorship of a lunatic asylum. But there was another case connected with Dr. Eames, which was still more remarkable. The first case was that of a man who was said to be incapable of pleading, but who was afterwards found able to plead, had pleaded, had been found guilty, and was now undergoing two years' imprisonment. The other case had formed the subject of an action. It appeared that a man had been delivering milk to the asylum, and through some extraordinary hallucination Dr. Eames had shown himself to be not only a doctor in connection with the asylum, but a person to provide the asylum with inmates, for he had seized upon this unfortunate milkman, put him into a straight-jacket, and flung him into a dark cell, on the ground that he was mad. Dr. Eames had got out of this difficulty by paying £5 to the unfortunate man, who had brought an action against him for false imprisonment. Well, he (Mr. Healy) put it to the Committee whether this Dr. Eames was a man whom they ought to have at the head of a great lunatic asylum? On the one hand, he declared Mr. James Ellis French to be mad after it was shown that he was not so; and, on the other hand, he seized an unfortunate milkman, whom he found on his rounds, and put him into a dark cell, on the ground that he was a lunatic. The sooner they had a fresh medium for the appointment of such men as these the better. He should have thought such a scandal as this would have at once attracted the attention of the Government. Unless they had a proper system of supervision over these institutions they would continue to have doctors of this kind. If the Cork Corporation were able to send to the Governing Body of the asylum Governors of proper calibre, who would see that the doctors they employed discharged their duties properly, scandals of this kind would be avoided; but so long as the Governing Body consisted of deadheads, such as the Earl of Mount Cashel, who never went near the place at all, they would have such officials as Dr. Eames. What worse scandal could there be than that of putting an innocent milkman in a straight-jacket and in a dark cell for hours, under the pretence that he was a lunatic, when, as a matter of fact, there was nothing the matter with him? With regard to James Ellis French's case, this was Dr. Eames's certificate, dated from the asylum—

"Lunatic Asylum, 20th April, 1884.—We, the undersigned, having been appointed by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant to examine and certify, for His Excellency's information, our opinion as to the present state of health of County Inspector James Ellis French, R.I.C., beg to report that, having visited that officer, we are of opinion that he is suffering from mental disease, softening of the brain, and great nervous debility, with impairment of bodily health; that from this infirmity of mind and body he is incapable of discharging the duties of his situation, and that such infirmity is likely to be permanent."

This Report was signed by Dr. Eames and by the other two doctors he had mentioned, and he contended that the man who said that this ruffianly County Inspector, who was now picking oakum and doing hard labour in Richmond Convict Prison, was of unsound mind, was the man in charge of the lunatics in Cork Asylum. The Lord Lieutenant did not want on Boards of Governors persons of an inquiring turn of mind. He would rather have Mount Cashels, aged 90, who never went down at all to see whether Alexander Eames was properly discharging his functions, or to see how the place was getting on. He and some other of the Irish Members had had, in their short experience, a course of three Chief Secretaries, and all of them in succession seemed to be determined to learn nothing from their Predecessors. The Irish Members had addressed many grievances to them, and had requested that they should give attention to these grievances; but, though they were appealed to in this way day after day and week after week, they never obtained redress. Did the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary think the Irish Members moved in these matters for their own amusement? If he did, he was sadly mistaken. The Irish Members could enjoy themselves much better elsewhere than by going through this process. But, be that as it might, the Irish Members had to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give attention to these grievances, which were very galling and very grievous to them. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary meant to carry out his functions in an effective and thorough manner, he (Mr. Healy) would ask him not to be swayed by the information he got over from the Castle as to the Cork Lunatic Asylum having a sufficient number of Governors upon it. He would ask him to treat the matter in an impartial spirit, and to give due weight to what he heard from the Irish Members in the Committee. If he continued to act as his Predecessors had done, and to go from pitfall to pitfall, and from failure to failure, he would, at the end of his tenure of Office, whenever that might be, go out of it a wiser but a sadder man.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he thought that this matter was one of far greater importance than English and Scotch Members, from a general inception of it, might think. In this matter, which the Irish Members had brought up that night, was involved the question of self or local government. Her Majesty's Government, and he believed the Prime Minister himself, and he knew the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, had declared themselves in favour of local self-government in Ireland. Well, he believed that that would be doing a great deal towards satisfying the people of Ireland, and allaying the discontent which existed there, if they could be brought seriously to believe that the Government were in earnest in their protestations in favour of this local self-government. Up to this, however, the Irish Members had absolutely nothing before them in support of the statement of the Government that they were in favour of local self-government except mere words. If the Irish Members could believe that the Government intended in the future to introduce some measure which would give to popular representatives complete control over all such institutions as lunatic asylums, they would gladly refrain from these criticisms. But they could not believe that Her Majesty's Government really did intend to do anything towards extending the power of the people of Ireland, unless they had something besides words before them. Here was a case in which the Government might, if they had liked, by a little fair and judicious action, have given to the people of Ireland abundant proof of the fact that they were desirous of extending local self-government to the Irish people, and how could the Irish Members be supposed to credit sentiments such as they had heard that night from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the effect that he was anxious to see the power of the people extended, and to see local self-government instituted in the country, when in the very same breath the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues refused to give proof of the earnestness which prompted them to make that statement? He knew that the discussion of matters like this must be very trying to hon. Members who represented English and Scotch constituencies. They knew very well that in bringing forward questions of this kind they laid themselves open to be viewed by a very considerable degree of prejudice by the people of this country and the Members of that House who represented English and Scotch constituencies; but when it was remembered that the Irish Members had absolutely no method of expressing grievances such as that with which they were now dealing, except by speaking on the floor of that House, he thought that even the most prejudiced amongst the English and Scotch Members would admit that they had some little right and were deserving at least of some consideration in bringing these matters forward. Of course, at that hour of the morning—1.25 A.M.—hon. Members would be glad to see such a discussion as this postponed; but if the Irish Members did not ventilate their grievances in connection with the treatment of these lunatic paupers that night, the Committee knew very well that they might not in this Parliament be able to secure another opportunity of doing it. Somebody or other had once said that an opportunity only came once in a lifetime. Well, it might be said that an opportunity only came once in the lifetime of a Session. The present was the opportunity of the Irish Members for expressing the particular grievance in connection with the lunatic asylums of Ireland, and the Irish Members would not be true to the interests of the people they represented if they did not avail themselves of that opportunity to its fullest extent. Hon. Members might feel uncomfortable at being kept up so late; but he would remind them that those who were presenting the case had to consider, besides their own comfort, and that of their Colleagues, the treatment of the unfortunate lunatics who looked to them, and to them alone, to ameliorate their condition. It would be hard for him to present the case which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) in a new light. Several of his Colleagues had emphasized the case, setting forth the injustice imposed on the City of Cork by the refusal of His Excellency to appoint to a position of trust an eminent citizen who had won for himself the respect and the confidence of his fellow-citizens; but even at the risk of being considered guilty of tedious repetition, he Mr. W. Redmond was bound to say, seriously and honestly, that he did not remember for many and many a day having heard such a flagrant instance of the violation of the rights of the people by the Government in Ireland than the action of the Lord Lieutenant in refusing this appointment of Mr. J. O'Brien. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would have them to believe that the Lord Lieutenant had not appointed Mr. J. O'Brien, Town Councillor, upon the Governing Body of the asylum because he was not wanted. If the Asylum Board were at its full complement, the Irish Members would not consider so much the injustice of the refusal of the Lord Lieutenant to accept the nominees of the Corporation; but what made them feel doubly grieved in this matter—and to this he invited the special attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary—was that they knew very well that the appointment of Mr. O'Brien was refused by the Lord Lieutenant, not because of his unfitness for the post, not because he had not capacity for administering the affairs of the asylum in a proper manner, but because he was what might be called a personal enemy of Earl Spencer and of his rule in Ireland. The men who were anxious for Mr. O'Brien's appointment were Nationalists, and that was the secret of the thing. But who was the last man that the Lord Lieutenant had appointed to be one of the members of this Governing Board? Why, Mr. Barry Shehan, one of the most notorious anti-Nationalists in the whole of Cork, a man who was thrown out of the Mayoralty, and a man who could not claim to have anything like the confidence of the majority of the people of Cork. This gentleman had been appointed. Why? The reason was that every time a Royal Duke came down to Cork, and the citizens did not want to receive him, Mr. Barry Shehan was always there to crawl in the gutter and kiss the sacred foot of that Royal Duke or anyone else that might come there. This Mr. Barry Shehan was a servile supporter of Earl Spencer in all his acts—good, bad, or indifferent.

Mr. Healy

THE CHAIRMAN: Again I feel it necessary to remark that this is not an occasion upon which to attack the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The Vote before the Committee is to provide for an increase of pauper lunatics. The hon. Gentleman has developed his observations to a great extent, and I must really beg of him now to confine them to the Vote before the Committee.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, the right hon. Gentleman would do him the justice to consider that in speaking that night he was not at all actuated by any desire either to transgress the Rules of the Committee, or to bring any adverse ruling unnecessarily upon his own head. If he had been led into transgressing the Rules of the Committee, he now asked the Committee to believe that it was wholly on account of the interest he felt in this case, and the desire he felt to put it as strongly as possible before the Committee. The point which he was endeavouring to put was that he considered the citizens of Cork had a perfect right to nominate, if not to elect, the men who should be upon the Asylums Board, and who should have the administration of the money which the Committee were now called upon to vote. It had already been pointed out to the Committee that the administrators of the Asylums Board were, to a man, not the representatives of the people, but the nominees of the Crown or the Crown's representatives. Now, the principle for which he contended was that this was public money. He and his hon. Friends would vote the money freely, because it was for the purpose of sustaining a necessary charitable and praiseworthy institution; and because it was for the purpose of maintaining an institution which was supposed to protect, but which he was afraid did not protect as well as it ought, those who had been deprived by the act of the Almighty of their senses. He and his hon. Friends acknowledged that this Vote was wanted; but while supporting it they did say, and he believed the majority of Englishmen and Scotchmen would endorse his statement, that it was only fair and just that where there was public money to be expended, that public money should be disbursed by people who were elected by the ratepayers, and who were responsible to the ratepayers. Now, the money that the Committee were going to vote, the money that had been voted, and, under the present system, all the money that would be voted, would be disbursed, not by the representatives of the people, but by a lot of decrepid, old noble Irish landlords, who had no sympathy with the people, and who had not got the confidence of the people, but who were only administrators of this Board simply because they had the favour of the Lord Lieutenant. The best proof of the truth of the statement that had been made that the Lord Lieutenant refused to appoint Mr. O'Brien because he was a Nationalist was to be found in the fact that he (Mr. W. Redmond) had endeavoured to press upon the attention of the Committee—namely, that the very last gentleman who was appointed by the Lord Lieutenant was a man who had been hissed in the streets of Cork. He (Mr. W. Redmond) was as anxious as any Member of the House to see peace and contentment reign throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain and Ireland. He had no desire to see the people of his country for ever distracted and discontented; but sincerely did he say that as long as institutions of this kind were governed by the nominees of a foreign Lord, and not by the representatives of the people, so long would there be discontent, and so long would it be the unpleasant but necessary duty of Irish Representatives in that House to keep the British Parliament up late, and to keep some Members of the British Parliament out of their beds listening to Ireland's grievances. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would only say that the Lord Lieutenant would reconsider his determination in appointing Mr. O'Brien; if words would come from the Chief Secretary's lips to the effect that he considered that the nominees of the Corporation and citizens of Cork ought to be put upon the Board; if the right hon. Gentleman would only say that he would try that, for the future, the people's nominees should not be overlooked, his words would be read to-morrow with great pleasure throughout the whole of Ireland, and would do much towards making his stay in Ireland pleasant. But the right hon. Gentleman's dominant and persistent refusal to give hon. Members any encouragement that, in the future, money like this would be administered by the people's representatives was calculated to give new life to agitation and to discontent; indeed, he (Mr. W. Redmond) fervently hoped that the Irish people would keep up agitation until such grievances as he had detailed were wiped out once and for ever.

Mr. William Redmond

Mr. LEAMY asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) whether he really intended to give the Irish Representatives any explanation in regard to the statement made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) with respect to Dr. Fames and the milkman? Of late, a great deal of attention in this country had been attracted to the management of lunatic asylums, and he hoped that this attention would be continued until some reform was brought about. But he asked hon. Gentlemen whether they really believed that if a doctor managing a private lunatic asylum in England was shown to have been guilty of such ignorance—to put it mildly—as Dr. Fames displayed in the case of James Ellis

French and the milkman, he would be allowed to continue in his office? Would any rich man, who was unfortunate enough to have some member of his family afflicted with insanity, put such a person in an asylum which was managed by a man who had shown himself so incapable of diagnosing insanity? But the asylum over which Dr. Fames had superintendence was a pauper lunatic asylum, and surely if any asylum needed consideration from the Members of the House of Commons, it was an asylum for pauper lunatics. In many cases, pauper lunatics had no friends at all, or, if they had, their friends were poor, and probably lived at a great distance; and, therefore, to leave pauper lunatics under the care of a man like Dr. Fames was positively disgraceful. Dr. Fames gave a certificate that James Ellis French was mad. It was proved that that was wrong, and that French was not mad. Then, again, Dr. Fames was charged with the most extraordinary conduct, of which he (Mr. Leamy) never heard until to night. It was said that this Dr. Fames, on his own motion, dragged a milkman, who was in the habit of going to the asylum, within the gates, locked him up, and put him in a straight-waistcoat. This man, too, it had been shown, was not mad; and yet Dr. Fames was allowed to retain his position. What gain could there possibly be by the Chief Secretary for Ireland supporting actions of this kind? Suppose there was such a man in any asylum in London who was capable of such conduct, and that his conduct was brought under the notice of the House, would he be allowed to remain in his position 24 hours? No; he would be at once suspended. It appeared that Dr. Fames was to be retained. The least the Government could do was to institute an inquiry into the sanity of Dr. Fames himself, because either the man was a scoundrel or he was insane. He could not have given certificates with regard to two people, both of which it had been proved were false and wrong, if he knew his business. If he did not know his business, he should not be continued in office. His patients were only pauper lunatics; but surely they had a right to expect the protection of the House. The question of the non-appointment of Mr. O'Brien had been already dealt with, and he would not allude to it further, except to say that, unfortunately, it was impossible to expect that the Chief Secretary of Ireland would, in any way, recognize a man in whom the people of Ireland trusted. What he wished to lay special stress upon was a matter which had common humanity for its advocate. He asked, whether these unfortunate pauper lunatics were to be put under the care of a man who was thoroughly incompetent? If the right hon. Gentleman wished to get his Vote to-night, some information must be afforded with regard to this man, Dr. Eames. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not prepared to give them an explanation, he (Mr. Leamy) would consider himself justified in moving that the Chairman do report Progress.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the facts relating to French's insanity were somewhat complicated. The original certificate was signed by three medical men, of whom Dr. Eames was one. Dr. Eames was selected to examine French, because he was an eminent and experienced man, whose opinion would naturally carry weight. At the trial, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) believed that Dr. Wheeler, one of the most eminent doctors in Ireland, gave independent evidence to the same effect. That evidence, however, was contradicted by other physicians; but there was nothing in that to show that Dr. Eames behaved like a rogue or lunatic, as had been inferred. Whether Dr. Eames acted wisely or not he was not prepared to say. The Court decided French was sane, and, therefore, it must be presumed that Dr. Eames was in error. Certainly Dr. Eames had some ground to go upon, seeing that his opinion was assured by other medical men. With regard to the case of the milkman, of which he had not heard much—

MR. HEALY: Does not the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland know all about it?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he understood that the milkman brought an action against Dr. Eames, and that at the trial Dr. Eames obtained a verdict.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman had made an extraordinary statement with regard to French, for he had said that French might or might not be mad. Was that, or was it not, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman? If there was a doubt as to French's insanity, was not the right hon. Gentleman, as the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, bound to have an immediate inquiry made into the matter? The Lord Lieutenant was the dispenser of mercy in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman was his Secretary. In order to save this man, Dr. Eames, it was now said that French, who had been found guilty of a most horrible crime, might or might not be mad. What did that involve?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that French might, or might not, have been mad at the time; he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) was not competent to pronounce an opinion upon the subject. All he had to say was, that there was a certain amount of medical evidence for French's madness, and a certain amount of medical evidence against it. Dr. Eames went for his madness.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had stated that French might or might not be mad at the time. He (Mr. Healy) understood that the present view of the right hon. Gentleman was that French had since recovered sanity.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had no view on the subject at all. He did not mean to express his own opinion. How could he say whether French was mad or not? What he said was, that there were certain eminent doctors for French's madness, and that there were others against it. The case was brought up for trial, and it was determined that the evidence was stronger in favour of the man not being mad than otherwise.

MR. HEALY said, that Dr. Eames was a brother Freemason of French's, and he was the first person in Ireland who was chosen by the Lord Lieutenant to test the sanity of French. The certificate which Dr. Eames gave with regard to French's condition was dated from the Cork District Lunatic Asylum, and Dr. Eames's signature was the first signature on the document. This, however, was not merely a question of the man's madness. Madness might have been feigned by French; but it must be remembered that the certificate practically divided itself into four branches. The certificate was in these words—

Mr. Leamy

"We are of opinion that he is suffering from mental disease and softening of the brain, and great nervous debility, with impairment of bodily health, and that from this infirmity of mind and body he is incapable of discharging the duties of his station, and that such infirmity is likely to be permanent."

If it was a certificate of the man's madness, he could understand it being said that the man might have been forging at the time, and that possibly, in the view of the doctors, he might have been an insane person; but Dr. Fames certified also as to infirmity of body, and that the infirmity was likely to be permanent; and therefore the question he (Mr. Healy) put to the Committee was this— "Is a person who has given a certificate of that character a proper person to be in charge of a lunatic asylum?" If a man like that was in charge of lunatic patients from day to day, was he not likely to be a judge of insanity? If he was not, why did he occupy his present position? French might have deceived Dr. Fames as to his sanity; but how could he deceive him as to infirmity of body? Surely a doctor was, at all events, a judge of the soundness of body and limb; surely he could tell whether a man's body was in a fairly sound state. A man could hardly feign that he was such an infirm cripple that he was quite incapable of discharging the duties of his situation, and that his infirmity was likely to be permanent. He asked any Member of the Committee who was not fettered by official relations, whether a doctor of this kind was one who ought to have charge of a large pauper lunatic asylum, containing hundreds of patients—an asylum upon the Board of which the Government refused to allow a single representative of the people to be nominated by such an independent body as the Cork Corporation? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that Dr. Fames was acquitted. Why, as a matter of fact, Dr. Fames paid a sum of money into Court, and the jury found that, as the man was only imprisoned for a few hours, that sum was sufficient compensation for the imprisonment. There was no actual acquittal. It was not denied that Dr. Fames forcibly imprisoned the man. It was not denied that Dr. Fames ordered the man to be straight-waist-coated, and, therefore, was he (Mr. Healy) to be told that because Dr.

Fames escaped with such a small penalty he was a proper man to have charge of a lunatic asylum? The sum and substance of the whole thing was that Dr. Fames was a Freemason. If he had been a Catholic he would have been turned out of his office within 24 hours. Could the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland get up, and, at the Table of the House, attempt to convince hon. Members who know the full facts of the case? Why, the right hon. Gentleman had not even convinced his own supporters with reference to these facts. It was required to ascertain the sanity or insanity of one of the worst scoundrels in the entire country, and it was of the utmost importance that the ablest man should be selected to make the examination. The whole country was ringing with the case of James Ellis French. A popular newspaper in Ireland had attacked the man, and the whole of England, as well as of Ireland, rang with the case of this County Inspector, who was charged with the most heinous and terrible crime, and then, in order to shield him, the Government employed Dr. Fames; and when it was found that Dr. Fames had made a great mistake, the Government, through the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, attempted to screen him by saying that French might or might not have been mad at the time. According to his sentence, French was now undergoing penal servitude for two years; he was supposed to be breaking stones and picking oakum, and doing all the other terrible and dreadful tasks imposed on a convict; and yet he was the man of whom Dr. Fames had expressed the opinion that, with his infirmity of mind and body, he was incapable of discharging the duties of his situation, and that such infirmity was likely to be permanent. All he (Mr. Healy) could say was, that a Government who first of all employed a man like Dr. Fames to screen a man like French, and then, when Dr. Fames had done all the dirty work, turned round to screen him by saying that French might or might not have been mad at the time the certificate was given, was just worthy of being a Government represented by Lord Spencer.

Dr. LYONS said, that Dr. Fames was a gentleman whom he had had the pleasure of knowing for several years past, and to whose character he could bear testimony. Dr. Eames had filled a responsible and important position for a considerable period, with, so far as he (Dr. Lyons) knew, complete satisfaction to all concerned. He believed Dr. Eames to be absolutely incapable of lending himself to any sort of a sham certificate, such as it was supposed had been furnished in the case of James Ellis French. The case of French was by no means uncommon. It very often happened that a man for a considerable time successfully shammed lunacy, and hon. Members knew, from the correspondence of French which had been published recently, that he was a man capable of exercising a considerable amount of ingenuity. He (Dr. Lyons) believed it was a part of French's case, as indeed it was a common part of such cases, to attempt to starve himself, and thereby diminish his general bodily condition.

MR. HEALY: Why, French was not in the gaol at the time of the certificate.

DR. LYONS: During part of the time he was in gaol.

MR. HEALY: The certificate was given on the 30th April; but French was not arrested until June.

DR. LYONS said, he nevertheless believed that French attempted to starve himself, and to reduce his physical condition as to weight, and to produce an appearance of delicacy. It must be admitted that he succeeded in imposing on the physicians who reported on his case. What had happened in French's case was by no means an uncommon occurrence in the history of lunacy. He (Dr. Lyons) personally had been aware of such cases, and it was only by long and repeated examination that he had succeeded in exposing them. What he desired particularly to say was that from his own personal knowledge of Dr. Eames—a knowledge which extended over a very considerable period—Dr. Eames was totally incapable of lending himself to any such misrepresentation as had been alleged by his hon. Friends sitting on the opposite Benches. Dr. Eames had pursued his profession with satisfaction to all with whom he came in contact, and he had certainly discharged the very laborious and onerous duties of his position as head of a great lunatic asylum with great satisfaction to the Governors and Directors. That a man, under certain circumstances, should be misled with regard to well-acted lunacy was not to be wondered at, when they considered the extraordinary ingenuity which persons sometimes adopted.

MR. LEAMY said, that all the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin City (Dr. Lyons) had said was that, in his opinion, Dr. Eames was incapable of lending himself to a sham certificate. Allowing, then, that that was not a sham certificate, it only showed that the man who made it was incompetent to diagnose a case of lunacy. [Dr. Lyons: He made a mistake.] Possibly, he made a mistake; but if this man had the experience of lunatics which the Committee were told he had, he should be the last man in the land to make a mistake. The hon. Member had led the Committee to suppose that French confused the mind of Dr. Eames, because he was in goal and tried to starve himself. Now, that was not the fact, because, when the certificate was given, French had not been arrested. Now, as to the case of the milkman, he (Mr. Leamy) thought they had a right to a statement of the exact details from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). In the case of French, Dr. Eames made a wrong certificate, and in the case of the milkman, he, of his own motion, seized the man, whose business brought him to the lunatic asylum every day, threw him into a cell, and put a straight-waistcoat upon him. Now, he (Mr. Leamy) wanted an explanation of these matters. Dr. Eames might have made a mistake in the case of French, and he might have given a certificate, because he was invited to do so; but, in the second case, he acted entirely upon his own responsibility; he outraged the law by seizing the man and imprisoning him, and his ground for doing so was that the man was a dangerous lunatic. He (Mr. Leamy) wanted to know whether the Government intended to keep such a man over an asylum of pauper lunatics; or were the Committee to understand that it did not matter who superintended pauper lunatics, so long as the man happened to be a friend of the Government? Dr. Eames might be an estimable gentleman in private life; but there was one thing very remarkable, and that was, that every Government official who was attacked from these Bonches was a man of the most stainless character. Mr. HEALY: Until he is found out. Now, with regard to the second case brought against Dr. Eames—namely, that as to the milkman, he and his hon. Friend demanded an explanation from the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland.

Dr. Lyons

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that the examination of French was made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the man was or was not capable of discharging his duties. Very much more was involved than the sanity of the man, and it was well the Committee should know that the opinion of Dr. Eames was attested by two other eminent medical men.

Mr. HEALY: Also Government officials.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): Now, he had been asked about the case of the milkman who had been detained at the asylum. The man represented himself as a fit patient for the lunatic asylum. The warder took charge of him for a short time, and Dr. Eames allowed him to be put into a cell for a few hours. The man afterwards brought an action against him, and Dr. Eames lodged £5 in Court, which the Jury found was sufficient; and it was under these circumstances that Dr. Eames had been so violently assailed.

Mr. CALLAN said, that if what the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had stated were correct, Dr. Eames had committed no act whatever, but had simply allowed the warder to act. He would be glad to know whether that was a correct statement of the case? Were they to understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, professing to know all the facts of the case, deliberately stated that Dr. Eames had not imprisoned the man; that it was the warder who did it? He (Mr. Callan) understood that that was the very reverse of the truth. Was it true that the hon. and learned Gentleman had the audacity—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to use that language at all.

Mr. CALLAN said, he withdrew the word "audacity," and would substitute for it "effrontery."

Mr. HEALY said, he had never heard a more extraordinary statement from the Treasury Bench than that of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland. Dr. Eames, at all events, gave a certificate that French had softening of the brain, great nervous debility, and infirmity of mind. He need not question then the bona fides of the Government for calling in Dr. Eames; it was not necessary for his purpose to do so. With regard to the milkman, he was surprised that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland should make the statement he had made. Had he been counsel for the man, he (Mr. Healy) had no doubt he would have made a very different statement to the jury. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the man wanted to become a patient, that the warder took him in, and that Dr. Eames allowed him to be kept in a cell a few hours, and that Dr. Eames had paid £5 into Court for damages in the action which was brought against him. The facts of the case were these. The man wanted to tender for a supply of milk to the asylum; he went there, and it would appear that, because he tendered for milk, they treated him as a lunatic. But why had Dr. Eames paid £5 into Court, if he were an innocent man? He need not have paid one farthing. Now, he (Mr. Healy) asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he could expect that hon. Members on those Benches could give credit to his statement, which just showed how the Law Officers appraised the intelligence of the House of Commons? Any story would do for the House of Commons; they thought anything would go down with those whom they supposed to be blockheads in the House of Commons. He said it was really astonishing that the hon. and learned Gentleman should come forward, at that time of the morning, and tell the Committee such a yarn. Dr. Eames had proved himself to be incompetent both with regard to the certificate in the case of French and the treatment of this milkman. It was absolutely necessary that some person of independent character, like Mr. O'Brien, should have a seat upon the Board of the asylum; and he would advise the rate-payers that, until they had this, they should not pay one penny of the contributions demanded of them for the equipment and salary of men like Dr. Eames.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he should like to know whether it was permitted to warders to put people into straight-jackets and cells without instructions from the prison doctors? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland said that the man asked to be taken in as a patient, and that Dr. Eames allowed it to be done. But was that a candid statement? Were those the real facts of the case? It appeared to him that, throughout the course of this discussion, there had been, on the part of the right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken from the Treasury Bench, a distinct want of candour. Was it candid to tell the Committee that the reason why they had not appointed Mr. O'Brien to be one of the Governors, was that the Board of Governors was already sufficiently full? Would it not have been better to say that the Lord Lieutenant did not like to have imposed upon him representatives of this kind? And he put it to the Committee whether they did not fully believe that that was the case? Might they not hope that, at a future time, there would be a little more candour on the Treasury Bench with regard to these statements? Was it not hard for the Committee to listen to, and be expected to swallow, such stories as this? He (Mr. Sullivan) said that Mr. O'Brien was well known to be a reputable citizen, a man of integrity and honour, whose character was not in the slightest degree blackened because he had fallen under the censure of the Lord Lieutenant. On the contrary, his character stood out stronger than it did before he had fallen under the censure. He would not, however, dwell further upon the subject than to observe that the Committee might as well have been treated to a chapter from the Arabian Nights, or Alice in Wonderland, as to such stories as these—that the Lord Lieutenant considered the Board of Governors was already sufficiently full, and that that was the reason he had not appointed Mr. O'Brien. He (Mr. Sullivan) said that it was not for the credit of Parliament that such stories should be bandied about by Gentlemen occupying the high positions of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Hon. Members on those Benches regarded it as an outrage, and thought that it ought to be so regarded, that the Committee of that House should be asked to listen to stories so bare of plausibility.

Mr. Healy

MR. BIGGAR said, he had heard the greater part of the conversation with regard to this matter, and as the case had been put by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, it seemed that Dr. Eames was either an ass or a scoundrel. He might take his choice. He was either perfectly stupid and ignorant of his profession, or he was a dishonest person. He (Mr. Biggar) did not blame the Government for refusing to examine into the case, under the circumstances. If nothing had been known of the character of Dr. Eames at the time, the Government would have been justified in asking him to examine French; but the difficulty was that, knowing now that he had been proved to be either dishonest or incompetent, they should continue him in his position. That was the ground on which he found fault with the Government, and it was in keeping with the whole course of their conduct in matters of this kind. With regard to the lunatic asylum at Cork, it was known that the persons who were Governors of that asylum did not pay any proportion of the rates. They were landlords, and not occupiers, who did not contribute in proportion to the rates which supported the lunatic asylum; and they knew that the Government, notwithstanding their alleged desire to give local self-government to the people of Ireland, and to extend the franchise amongst them, continued to uphold the present system. He thought they gave very little evidence of their desire to extend popular rights and liberties by their conduct in connection with the Cork Lunatic Asylum. Because, instead of appointing to one of the Governorships of that asylum a person who had the confidence of his fellow-citizens, they appointed a man who was most unpopular with them. He would ask the hon. Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) if he would give the Committee the benefit of his opinion with regard to the conduct of Dr. Eames, and whether, under the circumstances, the Government were justified in continuing his salary.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) was not in Order in calling on an hon. Member to speak.

Mr. BIGGAR said, in that case, he would ask the Chairman to call on the hon. Baronet to state whether he was satisfied that French was a person of unsound mind, and whether he thought the case of the unfortunate milkman who was detained was one which could be justified, and whether he thought the Government were justified in screening the conduct of Dr. Fames? Hon. Members on those Benches thought the Government were, on these grounds, to be censured; and he should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £200, the amount of Dr. Fames' salary for three months.

Motion made, and Question put.

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £890, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, in aid of the Local Cost of Maintenance of Pauper Lunatics in Ireland."—Mr. Biggar

The Committee divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 61: Majority 39.—(Div. List, No. 51)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDERS: It is necessary that I should now explain the position in which we stand as to Supply. The Committee will remember that last year the question as to the time within which certain Votes must be taken was fully discussed and considered. The result was that as on the Thursday corresponding to the present Thursday we had not finished the Supplementary Estimates, we had to take the Supplementary Estimates on the following Saturday, with the scandal of having to sit into Sunday. I think we ought to finish to-night the Supplementary Estimates, over which, I am bound to say, we have been spending an unusual amount of time, instead of taking them on Saturday, and possibly having to repeat the scandal of finishing them on Sunday morning. If the Committee are desirous of knowing why there is a special necessity for that being done, I may say that there is even more necessity for it this year than last. There was not so much controversy last year over the Navy Votes, and it was found possible to take a Vote on Account also on the same day; but I think everyone who knows what has to be discussed on the Navy Vote will see that it is very doubtful whether we shall be able to do that this year. Therefore, as next week is the last week in which we can take the Army and Navy Votes, it will be absolutely necessary to give the whole of it to Supply. It is therefore a matter of urgent necessity that we should finish the Supplementary Estimates to-night; and I can only say that I am quite ready to sit up all night for the purpose, rather than repeat what we did last year, and finish them on Sunday.

Mr. SEXTON said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite Mr. Childers had omitted one important fact—namely, that last year the Session commenced on the 6th of February. This year, in consequence of the extraordinary call made upon hon. Members at the end of last year, the Session did not begin until the 19th of February. Where was the necessity that the whole of next week should be given up to the Army and Navy Estimates. He thought the right hon. Gentleman might easily arrange to apportion some of next week to the Supplementary Estimates. And, again, why should to-morrow's Sitting be given up to the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, for which, notwithstanding that there was no need to hurry in the matter, the Government had obtained precedence? He asked the right hon. Gentleman to put down Supply for to-morrow as the first Order of the Day, and retire the Order for Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill. He had sat in the House during 10½ hours already, and certainly did not wish to sit up all night for the purpose of passing the Supplementary Estimates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDERS: We cannot assent to the proposal of the hon. Member, for Supply has no privilege except on Mondays and Thursdays. The effect of the hon. Gentleman's proposal would be, that we should not have the same means of going into Supply on the day he names which we have on Mondays and Thursdays.

Mr. SEXTON asked what would be the effect if hon. Members undertook to make no Motions on going into Supply?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I am afraid that is a matter beyond me. Hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot control or govern the House in that respect; and it is, therefore, quite out of my power to assume that any other days in the week will be devoted to Supply but Mondays and Thursdays.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the observations of the right hon. Gentleman applied only to the Supplementary Estimates; he had not spoken of a Vote on Account.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I stated that last year we did take the Navy Estimates and the Vote on Account on the same night, because although there was a great deal of discussion on the Army Estimates, on the Navy Estimates there was very little discussion indeed.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave as a reason for not taking these Votes to-morrow that Motions might be put down on going into Committee of Supply. Well, presumably the right hon. Gentleman had full control over his own Members; and as the only Members of the Tory Party now present were the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), and the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), neither of whom were likely to hunger with any very urgent desire for an opportunity to put down a Motion, and the Irish Members were not likely to put down Motions—taking these facts into consideration, and knowing that Motions could not be put down for to-morrow, unless Notice were given of them now, he hoped the course pointed out would be adopted by the Government. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, Motions could be put down.] If that were so, of course it could not be helped. At any rate, it was better to take the chance that Motions on going into Committee of Supply would break down at a reasonable time than to refuse the reasonable request of the Irish Members. It was better to do that than to drop the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill at a reasonable hour to take Diplomatic and other Votes, in which the Irish Members were not particularly interested, and then expect them to sit up to a very unreasonable hour discussing Votes upon which they had a great deal to say. It was stated by the Government that the Votes Irish Members wanted to consider would take a long time to discuss; but he would remind the Committee that the Diplomatic Vote had lasted four hours, and that, at the best, the discussion upon it was only of an academic character. The amount of money now involved was £3,500,000; and, in his opinion, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted that sum to-night, he was hardly likely to get it. There was material enough in these Votes to enable the Irish Members to discuss many points for a considerable time. Even if they sat up all night, they might find themselves unable to dispose of all these subjects; and it might be necessary to sit up for two nights—that was to say, if the Government thought to cram these Votes down their throats. Last year the Irish Members, at the request of the Government, who offered a compromise, forewent their discussion; but months wore on, and they ultimately found that absolutely nothing was given to them in return for the course they had taken. His experience of wrangles of this kind was that they came to no good, and his advice to the Government was—"Go to bed early, if you can." When these wrangles were continued, it was not unfrequently the case that towards the close Members of the Liberal Party got disgusted with the business, and put pressure on their Leaders to bring the wrangle to a close. Moreover, the officers of the House found their health ruined by these arrangements, and the result was a general cave in all along the line. Well, he (Mr. Healy) was always in favour of amicable arrangements—[Laughter, and "Hear, hear!"] He was only giving an opinion for himself—for no one else. He approved of amicable arrangements; and he would, therefore, suggest that they should dispose of the Superannuation Vote, the Inland Revenue Vote, and the Telegraphic Vote to-night, and leave the Civil Contingency Vote and the Temporary Commission Vote to Monday. In the Vote for Temporary Commissions an important question would arise. The Irish Members had come down to-night, not expecting the

Mr. Sexton

Diplomatic Vote would last so long, and believing that they would have had an opportunity of discussing the boundary question. The material to be used in this discussion was voluminous. Then, in the Civil Contingencies Vote, he found such an item as this—

"The Right Hon A W Peel, equipage on election as Speaker of the House of Commons, £1,000."

He should like to have some explanation of that. Then there was another item—

"Payment to Surgeon Wheeler for attendance on Mr Sharn Carter in pursuance of a verdict against the Crown given in the Court of Exchequer in November 1883, £1,147 18s."

That also would have to be remarked upon; and, lastly, there was—

"The compassionate grant to Mrs. Eliza Colgan in consideration of loss caused by the misconduct of Crown Solicitor in Ireland, £240."

on which they would have a good bit to say. These were matters of importance in themselves, and he hardly thought it was the way to treat the House of Commons, to take it by surprise at that hour of the morning, and inform it, for the first time, that it was intended to ask to-night for this £3,500,000. It would have been more candid for the Government to have informed the Irish Members earlier that they intended to apply for all these Votes, and then Members would have known what to do. The great argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to be that an All-night Sitting had led to a "Sunday scandal." Well, he (Mr. Healy) thought, with regard to Sitting on Sunday, that the better the day the better the deed. His recollection of what occurred during the last Sitting which ran into the Sunday was, that it was remarkably enjoyable. He (Mr. Healy) did not belong to the Sunday Rest Association, therefore he had no objection to the Votes being postponed until Saturday; and if it should be necessary to go on with the debates after 12 o'clock, he saw no reason to believe that his constituents would object to having their grievances exposed and discussed a minute after midnight any more than a minute before midnight. Let the disputed Votes be put down for Saturday. To his mind, it was much more important that the Government should, at that hour of the night, enter into a friendly understanding as to the discussions to be taken in Committee, and that they should put their heads together for the purpose of arriving at a general friendly understanding, and that they should postpone the Votes, and take them either to-morrow or Saturday.

Mr. MOLLOY said, that, under existing circumstances, it seemed to him that a Saturday Sitting was absolutely necessary; because, supposing even though they remained there all night, the items before them would require so much discussion that they would of necessity involve a Saturday Sitting. No matter how much goodwill might be shown in this matter, it was impossible to hope that a discussion on all the items could be disposed of in a night, unless some arrangement were concluded between the different Parties in the House. He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that it was impossible to bring on the Supplementary Estimates to-morrow, because Notices of Motion would be put down, and would have to be disposed of before the Speaker could leave the Chair. He did not think there would be any waste of time of particular importance, so far as he could gather. He (Mr. Molloy) could foresee that, under any circumstances, they would have to take a Saturday Sitting. As the Irish Members were willing to discuss the Votes on Saturday, and as the Government were willing to make an effort on their part, surely the compromise suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) could be agreed to. Let them have these Votes brought on in an orderly and proper manner, and disposed of on Saturday, instead of being fiddled with to night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDESS said, if he could see an opening for a reasonable compromise he should be glad to accept it. He thought, from what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen opposite, that it was possible to meet them half way. He noticed that there were a good many disputed items on the Civil Contingencies Vote, and it was also suggested that there were questions to be raised on the Vote for the Boundary Commission. But perhaps hon. Gentlemen had not observed that, as there was a Bill before the House in which the recommendations of the Boundary Commissioners were embodied, those recommendations could not be considered in Supply. The House would have to discuss them on the Bill; and the only question that hon. Members could discuss in Supply would be the constitution of the Commission. He would not, therefore, propose to postpone that Vote; but he would agree to postpone the Vote on Account. If they took the rest of the Votes before the Committee, the Vote for General Gordon and others which were purely formal, then, on Monday, they could proceed with the Civil Contingencies Vote, the Vote on Account, and the Excesses Vote, on the understanding that the House would allow them to be taken at whatever hour they might come on.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was of opinion—and he believed his view was shared by hon. Gentlemen who sat near him—that they had better accept the offer made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in such a conciliatory spirit.

MR. SEXTON said, that, if they did so, it was rather because they were always ready to recognize any evidence of an amicable spirit on the part of the Government, than that they accepted all the conclusions of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman were perfectly sound and irresistible with regard to all the Supplementary Votes. It was necessary that these Votes should be taken on a certain day, in order that the Appropriation Bill might be got through before the end of the financial year; but he was at a loss to know how it was that a Vote on Account, which related to the next financial year, was so absolutely necessary.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.) £107, Redemption of Consolidated Fund Allowances.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to call attention to this Vote, his object being to insure a full and accurate statement in the Estimates. He saw in the Vote the following item:—

“For commutation of a yearly payment of £2 1s. 10d. to the lord of the manor of Appuldurcombe under 36 and 37 Vic. c. 57, and for the purpose of sufficient Capital Stock of Three Per Cents. Annuities for transference to the official Trustees of Charitable Funds to enable them to take over the payment of a yearly allowance of £1 12s. to the Master of Oswestry School under the Act 46 and 47 Vic. c. 55, s. 18, £107.”

It would be seen that this Vote of £107 was made up of two items; separate statements were given with regard to these; but the Vote was a lump sum for the two. There could be no question about paying the item, because the sum was one which they were not only bound to spend, but which probably they had spent already; but his object was to have everything in these items stated as distinctly as it could be.

MR. HIBBERT said, he agreed that it would have been much better if the amounts had been put down separately. If he had any power in the future, he would take care that they were put down separately.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

(8.) £3,800, Temporary Commissions.

MR. SEXTON said, he had said a few minutes ago that the Irish Members had a desire to ask for further information than the Boundary Commissioners had laid before the House. The Commissioners had presented maps of the final boundaries, and certain documents called Reports, which, however, were very meagre in their character. They assuredly had not guided the Commissioners in arriving at their final scheme. That information was exclusively stored in certain rooms of Whitehall; and he therefore asked that hon. Members might have access to it. The Irish Members intended to dispute the decisions of the Boundary Commissioners in certain instances. The Irish Members desired to have the evidence collected by the Commissioners and used by them in coming to a final decision, and they wished to make the Commissioners the servants of the House instead of its masters. The House would be better able to reverse the judgment of the Commissioners with the evidence before it upon which the Commission itself founded its judgment. He had no doubt the information he required could be given without inconvenience.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr. HEALY said, he should like to know, in addition upon this Vote, how the amount was to be appropriated? There was, he understood, £3,800 asked for as a Supplementary provision; and he should like to know whether the Commissioners, at least as far as Ireland was concerned, were being paid, because he had some reason to believe that such was not the case, and that these gentlemen were doing the work for nothing? He thought that men of this kind should be paid for their work, conceiving it to be very undesirable that they should be going about the country declaring that they had been fulfilling these important functions for nothing. He desired to have some information beyond that which was at present available to hon. Members, concerning certain districts in which he and his hon. Friends were interested—for instance, Tyrone, Down, Armagh, Derry, Donegal, and Dublin City. They were not so particular with regard to Tyrone and County Down; but they were very particular with regard to the others. He would go further than the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) as to the evidence which they would require. The evidence upon which the Dublin City divisions were decided upon were certainly somewhat extraordinary. The Commissioners had adopted a scheme of the Conservative Party which had not been presented on the day appointed for the discussion; it was handed in next morning at a totally different inquiry—to the inquiry relating to the City of Dublin. The scheme was considered to be altogether absurd; and it was believed that it had not the slightest chance of being adopted. It was laughed at as a joke on the part of the Orange Emergency people. The Irish Members would, in addition to the information his hon. Friend wanted, like to have the scheme proposed by the Conservative Party in this case. It was only five or six schemes that the Irish Members asked for. As to the maps the Commissioners had drawn up, so far as Ireland was concerned they had good reason to complain of them. In England, where they had no baronies, it did not much matter how the outlines of the divisions were shown; but in Ireland, where the Lord Lieutenant's instructions were that baronies should mark the line of division, baronies should be shown. In the Irish map, however, there was nothing to show these divisions. The City of Derry was not shown in the map of Donegal—Derry, as hon. Members were aware, being on the other bank of the Foyle. The object of preparing the plans in this way had, no doubt, been to throw dust into the eyes of the public. Then take the Lough of Strangford; to look at the map, no one would imagine, who did not know the district, that there was water there at all; it was divided so awkwardly, and the map was so inexpressive. Probably, if it were not for Lough Swilly, hon. Members might have no idea that there was a lough there. It was not candid, he maintained, to use maps in that way, simply, as he believed, for the purpose of blindfolding the House.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought he could meet the hon. and learned Gentleman on certain points. Far from admitting that he thought the maps were so bad, his opinion really was that they had been prepared with great care. He had to admit that the map of Dublin City was difficult to make out. City maps were always difficult to make out. He had been able to understand the county maps very easily; but the map of Dublin City he admitted had been a puzzling one. With regard to the hon. Member's request that maps showing the original scheme should be given to the House, the hon. and learned Member had not put the request tonight in exactly the same form which he had put it in the House some time ago; and he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) might be able now to meet him. The hon. and learned Member wished to know whether he could circulate amongst Members a map showing the original scheme. It would not be difficult to do that with regard to six or seven schemes only; but he thought if they agreed to the request they would soon be asked to do the same in the case of all the English schemes. The more important question of the hon. and learned Member was that with regard to some further statement of reasons by the Commissioners; and upon that point he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would endeavour to meet the hon. and learned Gentleman. To-morrow he would be able to see one or two of the leading Members of the Boundary Commission; and he would ask them, if they had not themselves got sufficient facts to make a proper statement before the House, to obtain the facts from those who held the inquiries; if they could make a distinct Report he would ask them to make it, and lay it before the House. Of course, he could not pledge himself to the exact form of the Report; but he would do his best to obtain the information which was desired. He was not allowed on this Vote to discuss the details of the changes which had been made; but he might say, in passing, that, whatever case the hon. and learned Member might make out with regard to certain boundaries, he had been misled by considering the case of Dublin County by itself. If the hon. and learned Gentleman were to look at some of the Scotch schemes, at some of the Middlesex divisions, at the Tyneside divisions, at some of the South Wales divisions, he would find them very similar indeed to the Kingstown division in the county of Dublin. As he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had already stated to the Committee, Sir John Lambert served on all three Commissions. Sir John Lambert was in a very delicate state of health, and yet he came forward and gave an amount of time and labour to the Commission such as had seldom been witnessed. Sir Francis Sandford followed his example, and asked not to be paid. The other gentlemen had been paid at the rate of so much a-day—in some cases at the rate of five guineas a-day, and in other cases at the rate of three guineas a-day.

Mr. SEXTON said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had ventured a defence of the boundaries of the county of Dublin; but when the time came he (Mr. Sexton) and his hon. Friends would be able to show that there were aspects and features in the boundaries of county Dublin which had no parallel in the Three Kingdoms. He would like to know if the Assistant Boundary Commissions were still in existence, or if their powers were exhausted; because, in Committee, it might be found necessary to refer to the Commissioners themselves.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the three Boundary Commissions ceased to exist a day or two before the House resumed its Sittings; but he had asked Sir John Lambert, Sir Francis Sandford, and Colonel Owen Jones to continue to advise him, and they had kindly consented to do so. Whenever a point arose, he should suggest that it should be referred to those gentlemen.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £15,400, Inland Revenue.

(10.) £20,000, Post Office Telegraphs.

(11.) £20,000, Grant to the Family of the late General Charles George Gordon.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I think I ought, on this Vote, to give the reason why, after the lamentable fate of General Gordon—he was a personal friend of mine, and no one deploras his loss more than I do—it became part of the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider whether any grant should be made to his family. There were doubts whether certain members of his family would wish to receive any grant of public money, and also it was difficult at first to know what might have been General Gordon's own wishes in a matter of that kind, and how, if this grant were made, he would wish it to be divided amongst the members of his family. Perhaps I may say now that the Prime Minister would have made the statement I am now making, had he been able to be in his place. I know, however, that I represent my right hon. Friend's views on the subject. The first question we wished to ascertain was, what would probably have been General Gordon's wishes in this matter; and, secondly, what would be the wishes of his family if Parliament thought fit to propose a grant for them. The Committee will observe that we have worded the grant in this way—

"This sum will be paid to trustees, and will be applied by them for the benefit of General Gordon's family, in accordance, as far as possible, with his last wishes, and in such manner as Her Majesty may direct."

Now, after some trouble, we ascertained that General Gordon expressed his latest wishes in a paper which may, perhaps, not be called a will, but which was equivalent to a will. Those wishes were that any capital sum he might receive—and he expected to receive a considerable sum from the King of the Belgians—should be expended in a particular way. The Committee will remember that General Gordon was in the service of the King of the Belgians at the time Her Majesty's Government asked him to go to the Sudan, and that his service with the King of the Belgians would probably have resulted in a considerable pecuniary benefit to him. He expressed, in the paper I have referred to, a wish that the interest on whatever sum he might receive should be applied for the benefit of his sister, or some of his sisters, in the first instance, and that the capital sum should ultimately be divided amongst the whole of his nephews and nieces. That, we are satisfied, was his intention as to any sum he might receive from the King of the Belgians. I do not remember the exact number of his nephews and nieces; but it is a large number. I think General Gordon left three sisters, two of whom are married. There are also the widows of two brothers, and altogether in the families of his brothers and sisters there are a considerable number both of sons and daughters. We propose, then, to follow out what we believe were General Gordon's wishes, of course reserving, in the words of the Resolution, to Her Majesty power to make any other direction as to the appropriation of the grant, should further information be received as to the deceased's wishes in the matter. I have given the Committee all the information I have at this moment.

Mr. R. N. FOWLER thought the Committee generally would agree with the proposition the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer put before them. The purpose for which he rose was to make a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman. There was a movement, on a large scale, to raise a memorial to General Gordon; but he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) did not think that any private memorial could express the feeling of the country. He would, therefore, ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider with his Colleagues whether it would not be within the power of the Government to propose a Vote to the House to erect a national monument to the memory of the gallant General in St. Paul's Cathedral? He threw the suggestion out to the right hon. Gentleman, because he thought that its adoption would meet with cordial approval both in the House and in the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDEAS) said, he would inform his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. R. N. Fowler) proposed; and he was sure it would receive the right hon. Gentleman's serious consideration.

Mr. O'KELLY said, that, in connection with this Vote, it was proper to ask the Government whether they would not take into consideration the propriety of making a grant to the family of Mr. Power? Mr. Power died in the service of the country, and had some claim, he Mr. O'Kelly thought, to the consideration of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Kelly) that it would give great satisfaction to many people if the Government were to make suitable provision for the family of Mr. Power, a gentleman who, like General Gordon, lost his life in the public service. It was well he (Mr. William Redmond) should say that he was speaking altogether without any knowledge of what the feeling of the family was; but he knew Mr. Power personally, and he had a great admiration for his character.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDEAS) said, that he would not fail to represent the wishes of the hon. Gentlemen (Mr. O'Kelly and Mr. William Redmond) to the Prime Minister. It was well, however, to point out that Mr. Power was an unpaid commercial Consul, and the services of such Consuls were not counted as public services.

Mr. SEXTON said, that the fact that Mr. Power's services were not paid for was a very bad reason for not making his family compensation. Mr. Power was a man who underwent considerable hardship, faced extraordinary peril, and ultimately lost his life in the public service. Seeing how often Mr. Power's services had been described and acknowledged in the country, in the Press, and even in the House by Ministers of the Crown, it would be ungracious in the Government of a wealthy nation if they did not compensate his family.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £292,500, Army.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The reason for asking this Vote is given on the face of the Estimate; but I may be allowed to add a few words of explanation. The Vote will form no charge whatever on the taxpayer, but is necessary because the original Estimate for 1884-5 assumed that a large amount would be received from the Egyptian Treasury on account of the Army of Occupation; whereas this amount will not be paid during the present financial year, but early in 1885-6. The state of Egyptian finance justified our postponing, from time to time, calls on Egypt for the instalments of this contribution as they became due; and we did so in the full belief that the new loan would be raised before the end of this month, and that all the payments would then be made. But delays, with which the Committee is acquainted, have occurred, and the Convention and Decree under which the loan will be raised are not yet signed. We must, therefore, vote what Egypt was to contribute, and recover the amount after the 31st instant. This explanation covers the next Vote also. In all, Egypt contributes £4 per month per man, of which £3 5s. is credited to the Army, and 15s., for transport and other services, to the Navy.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £52,200, Navy.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) explained that this sum also ought to have been paid by the Egyptian Government before the 31st of the present month. They would not, however, be able to pay it until after the 1st of April, when the loan would be raised. The money would then be paid and received in the coming financial year instead of in the present one.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that this was an exceedingly peculiar arrangement. He believed the impression of the public had always been that the loan proposed to be raised was not to meet the annual current expenditure of Egypt, but to make good some capital charges.

Mr. Sexton

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, it was to meet a deficiency in the contribution due to us this year by Egypt. The amount would be paid out of the loan.

Mr. TOMLINSON asked, if the sum borrowed from Messrs. Rothschild would be repaid?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the loan would cover that, of course; but this Vote had nothing to do with that. The payment of this sum by Egypt had been postponed until after the 1st of April. Her Majesty's Government did not wish to press the Egyptian Government until the loan had been raised.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, why there would not be a reduction on the Estimates of the coming year corresponding with the addition to the Estimates of the present year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman had studied the rules as to bringing to account grants in aid. If more money came in aid than was shown in the Estimates, the amount would be paid into the Exchequer. This sum, when received from Egypt, would be paid into the Exchequer.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, if the right hon. Gentleman had it in his power to cite a single instance in which the Estimates of the appropriations in aid were verified by the actual results?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Yes; I think so.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

ELECTIONS IN COUNTIES (HOURS OF POLL) (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Grey, Mr. Stafford Howard, Mr. Coshran-Patriek.)

[BILL 85.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Hours of polling in counties) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definitions).

On the Motion of Mr. SEXTON, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 18, after "alderman," insert "or any commissioner."

On the Motion of Mr. SEXTON, the following Amendment made:—

In page 1, line 30, after "same," insert "and includes a place subject to the Act of the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, chapter eighty-two, or to 'The Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854,' or to any local Act providing for the election of Commissioners in any town or place for purposes similar to the purpose of the above-mentioned Acts."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Repeal of 41 & 42 Vict. and 47 & 48 Vict., c. 34) agreed to.

Mr. SEXTON, in moving to insert, after Clause 3, the following new Clause:—

"During the twenty-four hours, from midnight to midnight, within which the poll at an election subject to this Act is taken for any place defined in section two, such place shall be exempt from the operation of section eleven of 'The Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act, 1902.'" said, the police had very considerable powers in Ireland after dark, and hon. Members knew full well to what lengths constables would sometimes go in derogation of their rights. The object of this clause was to secure to the voter free access to the poll.

New Clause brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was not in a position to accept this clause, and he could not accept it that night for reasons which he would very briefly give to the Committee. This Bill, should it become an Act, would come into force at the end of the present Parliament. Now, the Crimes Act was a temporary Act, and the question of its renewal, as a whole or in part, would shortly have to be considered by himself and his Colleagues. Up to the present, no decision had been come to on the point which would justify him in debating upon the merits of a clause relating to a particular portion of the Crimes Act. It was impossible, therefore, for him to accept the clause.

Mr. HEALY said, that if the right hon. Baronet's (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) argument was a good one, it would have been a proper one to set up in the case of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act. In that Act he (Mr. Healy) got a clause inserted, to the effect that the Crimes Act should not apply to any offence which was in the former Act. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, fell to the ground. He and his hon. Friends were glad to hear that the Cabinet had not yet decided to renew the Crimes Act; but, after all, the right hon. Gentleman's statement did not correspond with a statement recently made by the Government Whip (Lord Richard Grosvenor). The noble Lord, who did not fling away his words, either in or out of the House, told his constituents the other day that it was the intention of the Government to renew the Crimes Act, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone) was reported in the Irish papers to have made a similar statement. [Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE: I did not say that.] At that time of the morning (3.30), he could not ask the hon. Gentleman what he did say. Anyhow, if the Government did resolve to renew the Crimes Act, the least thing they could do was to provide that its Curfew Clauses should not extend to polling. If the Government did not intend to renew the Crimes Act, the blot now existing in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act should be removed.

Mr. SEXTON said, he took it, from what had been stated, that the Government had as yet formed no intention as to the renewal of the Crimes Act. That was an interesting statement, and enabled him to indulge a hope that they might, at a later period, be able to inform the House that they did not intend to ask for its renewal. If, on the contrary, they should propose to renew it, there would still be an Irish Party who would use every endeavour to oppose it. He would now ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WARTON rose to move the insertion of the following Clause:—

"Part II. of the First Schedule of 'The Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1853,' shall be read and construed as if the words following were not contained therein, viz., 'not exceeding the amount authorized by the Act of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth years of Victoria, chapter eighty-four.'"

THE CHAIRMAN said, the clause the hon. and learned Member proposed to move was one which it was clearly not in the power of the Committee to insert; and he should, therefore, rule that the clause was out of Order.

MR. WARTON rose to Order. He wished to point out that the Bill made an alteration in the hours of polling; and by extending them would, therefore, extend the labour of the Returning Officers. Owing to a singular blunder in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, which he had noticed at the time, there was an inconsistency which was very curious; and the result was that a Returning Officer might charge more than he had a right to charge, and a Member might lose his seat. He, therefore, submitted that some consideration should be given to the point.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT rose to Order. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was persisting in moving a clause which the Chairman had declared to be out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Bridport was speaking to a point of Order.

MR. WARTON said, he was pointing out that if the poll were kept open hours longer than hitherto the labour of the Returning Officers would be increased, and the payments would necessarily be larger.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he felt bound to rule that the clause was out of Order, and that it was not in the power of the Committee to insert it; but it was perfectly competent to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport to move it on Report.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it might save time, and prevent the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) putting the clause down for the Report, if he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) were now to state that the point raised was one on which his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would propose some legislation, as he fancied it would be necessary to adopt some such provision as the hon. and learned Member proposed.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be considered To-morrow."

MR. WARTON said, he would suggest that the Report stage should be considered that day week, as some Notice would be required for the clause promised on behalf of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, if the hon. and learned Member would give to the Clerk at the Table the Amendment which the Chairman had ruled out of Order in the Committee stage there need be no further Notice.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked, whether it was understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would bring in a clause?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, if the hon. and learned Member for Bridport would place the clause in the hands of the Clerk at the Table without delay, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would inform his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General what was proposed to be done. He perfectly understood the object of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, and his impression was that to meet that object it would be necessary to insert the clause in another Bill; but if it were handed in at once he would consult the Attorney General, and inform the hon. Gentleman as to the course that would be proposed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

MUNICIPAL VOTERS (RELIEF) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Hibbert, Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

[BILL 64.] CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

THIRD READING.

Order for Consideration read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. HEALY said, he understood that no Amendment had been proposed or made in the Bill; and he wished to ask, as a point of Order, whether there was really any stage of the Bill before the House? As there had been no Amendment to the Bill, in his judgment the heading given to it in the Orders of the Day was inaccurate, and the Bill could not come before the House under the stage of a Bill to be considered, as amended.

MR. SPEAKER: The stage has not been abolished, although there has been no Amendment to the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

MOTIONS.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (SECOND BALLOT) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BART, Bill to amend the Law relating to Parliamentary Elections by providing for a Second Ballot in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BART, Mr. JOHN MONLEY, and Mr. BROADBENT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 94.]

BARRISTERS ADMISSION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CALLAN, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Admission of Barristers in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CALLAN, Mr. FARWELL, Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Mr. HEALY, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. KENNY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 95.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Four o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 13th March, 1885.

MINUTES.) - PRIVATE BILL - Second Reading
- British Agricultural Association, negatived.
PUBLIC BILL - First Reading - Municipal Voters (Relief) * (39).

BRITISH AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said: My Lords, this is a Bill which involves considerations of very great importance to the agricultural interest; and I should have thought that it would, as a matter of course, be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee. It has had the misfortune, however, to attract the unfavourable notice of my noble Friend at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale); and in face of his hostility, which is always regarded, and justly regarded, as so powerful in this House, I am bound to lay before your Lordships the reasons why I think this Bill ought to be read a second time, and referred to a Committee to examine its details. I wish to lay emphasis on this fact—that I am urging the second reading of this Bill because, by so doing, I shall relieve myself of the necessity of going into a number of details, of which the Bill is full, and which, if they are challenged, can be remedied in Committee. I am only asking you so far to approve the main principle of the Bill as to send it in the ordinary course to be examined by a Select Committee. What is the principle which I am urging on your Lordships to accept? You are aware of the great disasters which have befallen agriculture during recent years, and one of the worst consequences of those disasters is that agricultural credit has almost entirely disappeared. Before the bad years money was lent largely to farmers—at a very high rate of interest very often, but still lent—and the farmers had money on which to work; but when the bad years came these loans were drawn in, very often to the ruin of the farmers and the suffering of the banks. There is, in fact, no agricultural credit, speaking generally and roughly, to be had; and if the law remains in its present state there is no prospect of an early revival of agricultural credit, because the security is not sufficient, considering the smallness of the profit, to invite investors to invest their money in such enterprises. The proposal in this Bill is to enable a Company of capitalists to lend money to the farmer against his crop—against the crop which the money advanced is intended to raise; so that if he intends to raise an expensive crop in a certain field he shall be at liberty to pledge that individual credit, that crop, to pay the interest and the capital by which the crop is raised. That cannot be done now, because the mixture of chattel interest in the crop and the farmer's own interest in the land prevent the ordinary machinery of a bill of sale from being applied. You will say—"What possible objection can there be to a capitalist being allowed to advance money upon a crop to be repaid out of the proceeds of that particular crop, the crop being ear-marked for the purpose?" Well, the objection is this—that there are other creditors upon the farmer's holding, and that the new creditor will stand before these others. But it is to be noticed that it is not proposed that the capitalist should stand before the landlord, because that would not be just. The landlord furnishes the land, and the capitalist furnishes the capital; and it would not be fair that the capitalist should come and thrust the landlord aside and stand before him. The landlord's interest is, therefore, saved. He has an absolute priority on any proceedings under this Bill; but after the landlord the crop is set aside in order to pay the capital by which it has been grown, and no other creditor of the farmer, as respects that crop, can step in and take it. It seems that that in itself is a perfectly just proceeding, because but for the advance of the loan there would be no crop grown; and it is certainly for the public interest that the crop should be grown; and, therefore, it is for the public interest that the capitalist should be allowed to have a lien on the crop. The same has been done in other countries—in New South Wales, for instance, where, in many instances, money is lent for the crop on the security of the crop. But in the present instance we have a precedent, and in this country precedents are invaluable. We have the principle of an advance specially guaranteed from the land by the Act of 1864, under which lenders were empowered to lend money to landlords to enable them to make improvements upon the land, and that stood in front of all mortgages which might previously have been upon the same land. We ask you to do for the farmer what has been done again and again, and on an enormous scale, for the owner. We ask you to enable the occupier to pledge the improvements which he has made by the money lent for that purpose. The owner can do that already, and it is just that the occupier should be able to do it. It is, however, not only just; unless it is done the agricultural interest cannot rise again for a long time from the depression in which it is. I have heard of one solid argument against the principle of this Bill, and that is, that if this is a good thing it should be done by a Public

Bill. But my answer to that is that in the present state of Business in Parliament it is laughing at us to say that you must pass Public Bills. You can only pass large Bills behind which there is great pressure; but a Bill which aims at nothing but doing good cannot be passed. But to tell us that because one Parliamentary road is blocked up therefore we must not try another which is open is merely to laugh at the misfortunes under which agriculture is labouring. We have, however, something more powerful than argument or common sense. We have a good precedent. This very thing has been done again and again in favour of the owner—that is, Private Bills have been passed on the subject before any Public Bill. A Public Bill was not passed until 1864. Again and again Private Bills were passed before that date. Amongst these there was the Act passed in 1848 with regard to the West of England Company which obtained this privilege. In 1849 there was the Act conferring the power on the General Land Drainage Company; in 1853 there was the case of the Lands Improvement Company; in 1856 the Scottish Drainage Company, and in 1860 another Company, obtained this power. All these were Private Bills, and we only ask to do for the occupier what has been done again and again for the owner; and I am sure if this Bill becomes law it will confer enormous benefits on that interest which is now suffering so severely, and which of all other interests in the country is deserving of your Lordships' consideration.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, it was his duty, occupying the position which he did, to oppose this Bill. Nothing could be more dangerous than to allow private legislation to supersede public legislation. The effect of this Bill would be, if passed, that an example would be set in favour of placing private before public legislation. In other words, this Bill practically did away with the Bankruptcy Act, for the tenant was protected against the operation of the Bankruptcy Act under the operation of this Bill. The tenant also came under a contract of partnership with this Company, and the effect of the Bill would be that there would be an example set of legislation for private purposes, setting aside that which was already public law relating to such matters. He considered that nothing could be more dangerous than tampering with the law. If his noble Friend would introduce a Bill of a general character dealing with the objects he had in view, he would pass it through this House; and if its objects were desirable, he had no doubt it would also pass through the other House of Parliament. He denied that it was impossible to find time to pass a Public Bill on this subject. There were many Public Bills that did pass as well as Government measures; and no doubt if a Public Bill were introduced it would receive every attention from the two Houses. The public law with regard to debtor and creditor was set aside by this Bill. He wanted to know why a Company should have power to advance money for such purposes? Why should a landlord not have the same powers? He had no interest in the Bill one way or the other; but he held that it was an improper Bill for the House to sanction in the shape of private legislation.

The Marquess of Salisbury

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he must express his concurrence in the objection taken by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, as to the principle of the Bill. He was very sorry to object to any Bill which was brought forward to benefit the agricultural interest. He felt as acutely as anyone the present position of agricultural industry; but he felt also the importance of the principle involved in maintaining the proper line of demarcation between public and private legislation, and that principle greatly exceeded the importance of this Bill. Private legislation concerned only the interests of private persons or private Companies, and no person had a locus standi against a Private Bill except the persons who claimed to have private interests with which it interfered. All those persons, and those only, might be heard against it. Questions of public policy were never considered at all; and it therefore appeared to be absolutely vital to prevent any inroad, by Private Bills, upon that province which public legislation had already occupied. If this Bill had been introduced as a Public Bill he should have offered no objection to the second reading. It was said there was a difficulty in passing a Public Bill; but that suggestion only added to the force of the objection. It was important to take care that, because there was a difficulty, Private Bills were not introduced instead of Public Bills. In the case of a Public Bill, every man was supposed to have notice; but of Private Bills no public or general notice was given. A Public Bill was publicly debated, in both Houses, in all its stages; but a Bill like the present would not be considered at all, except in a Select Committee, without opponents. These Private Bills were scarcely ever circulated; and when they passed they were not printed with the Public Statutes. Was it true that this Bill contained provisions which encroached on the province of public legislation? He thought it did, in several ways. It would affect, throughout the Kingdom, the rights of landlords and creditors. According to one of the clauses of the Bill, when the Association was going to lend money to a tenant it must give 14 days' notice to the landlord, who, if he pleased, might refuse his consent. That applied only to tenancies of over 12 months' duration. When the landlord received the notice he might know nothing about the Act, or anything connected with it; and before he could consult his solicitor the time for objecting under the Act might have expired, or else his solicitor would have no more time than might be left of the 14 days to make all necessary inquiries about the matter. If the tenancy was for 12 months, or any less period, the landlord was only at liberty to object to the transaction on one or other of two grounds. One was that the tenant was bound, by his covenants, not to do those things, for which he proposed to borrow the money. In the great majority of cases that was not likely to be the case; and therefore that ground might be put aside. The other ground was that the tenancy would be determined within 12 months; so that, in order to enable the landlord to object on that ground, he must turn out his tenant, which, otherwise, he might not have wished to do. If objection were made on either of the grounds mentioned, the Company could take the matter to the County Court, which would determine whether the objection was to hold good. But, supposing no objection were made, various rights were conferred on the Company, which were at variance with the public law. He would first take the case of the landlord dealt with by the 33rd section.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It has been withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, then, of course, his objection to that clause disappeared. If the other clauses to which similar objections in principle applied were also withdrawn, his objections would also be withdrawn. He would next take the case of a creditor of a person to whom money had been lent by the Company, and this brought out in the strongest possible way the objection of principle. The 31st and 32nd sections practically said that, if the occupiers in possession, having the apparent ostensible ownership of everything upon the land, became bankrupt, the ordinary law was to be entirely set aside, and the general creditors were to be altogether postponed, and absolute preference was to be given to this Company. This was to be done not by a Public Act, but by a private measure, about which tradesmen could know nothing, and in respect of which no communication was to be made to them. The effect of this change would be that an agricultural tenant would be empowered to enter into a contract with the Company by which he could prefer them to all his other creditors, and give them a preferential security on all his present and future movables and farming live and dead stock. All he could say was, that if that were a proper thing to do for the protection of agriculture, it ought to be done by public legislation, and the change in the law should be considered in all its bearings in both Houses of Parliament. The noble Marquess had stated that the principle of this Act had been embodied in some Private Acts already passed. It was impossible to say how far that was the case without an examination of those Acts. For his part, he had never heard of any private legislation being proposed before which superseded the Bankruptcy Act; and he might point out that in some of the Acts to which reference had been made, before an advance could be made it was necessary to obtain the sanction of a public Department—the Enclosure Commissioners; and all that was then done was to charge the property in the land against reversioners, if the Commissioners thought that they would derive benefit from the proposed improvements. One Act which had been referred to—that of the West of England Drainage Company—was in itself a warning. It enabled loans to be granted on the security of land, to ecclesiastical as well as other persons, without any of the usual and proper safeguards for the protection of the interests of successors; and one particular clergyman, without any ecclesiastical consent or oversight, mortgaged his glebe to the full extent of its value to the Company. Last Session the most rev. Primate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had to come to Parliament for a general Public Act, which was passed to prevent such mischief occurring in the future.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that he could not endorse what the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack had said with regard to Private Bill legislation. He thought that some of the most efficient work done in that House was the initiation of private legislation, especially on the subject of the landed interest of the country. While it was necessary for an Act of this sort to be publicly debated and considered in all its bearings, it was not absolutely essential for a measure of this sort to fulfil those conditions to quite the same extent as a Public Bill. The noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack had criticized the main blots of the Bill; but one observation could be made with respect to some of the loans to tenants. It was thought very objectionable by some persons to admit the principle of lending to tenants on standing crops, for they said that if a tenant were in such a position that he required to borrow on standing crops he was not in a proper condition to borrow at all. In the case of expensive crops, such as hops and beetroot, when the tenant's capital was insufficient, the assistance of the landlord would be very advantageous. For that reason, it appeared to him that there would be advantage in considering this measure on its merits before a Select Committee. Evidence would be taken to show what would be the best means of promoting a scheme which would meet the requirements of the situation. The situation with regard to agriculture was undoubtedly a serious one. They had not been able to get a Royal Commission to inquire into it; but their Lordships would admit that there was no industry in the country which so much required an inquiry at the present time. He ventured to think that if this Bill were referred to a Select Committee much valuable information might be obtained with regard to the best means of dealing with the question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I cannot say that the arguments of the noble and learned Earl on the Wool-sack have convinced me. He has addressed himself almost entirely to technicalities, and those not of a very important character, contained in the Bill. He dwelt very much, almost playing with words, upon what he called the privacy of a Private Bill, and said that there was no sufficient opportunity of discussing a private measure. The procedure in a Private Bill is exactly similar to that in the case of a Public Bill, with the exception that it is submitted to a Select Committee in addition. It passes through all its stages in this House like any other Bill, and its contents are discussed in this House, not only as a matter of form, but in practice also. When the noble and learned Earl talks of no notice being received of such a Bill being passed, and of its being passed secretly, my impression is that more publicity has been given to this Bill than to most Bills that come before us. The noble and learned Earl has rested very much upon the grievances of the landlord, and the fact that he is only to have a fortnight's notice. I quite admit that that is too short; but I think that the second reading of a Bill is hardly the occasion on which to discuss a question of detail of that description. It is contrary to all our practice to make a consideration like this the ground for rejecting the second reading of a Bill; it is easy to rectify any such error in Committee. The noble and learned Earl practically did not deal with the Preference Clause at all. It appears to me that you have passed Bill after Bill doing for the owner precisely what you are now asked to do for the occupier, giving him priority for money lent for improvements. When you were being asked to give advantages to the owner, you never discovered all these technicalities. The recommendation to pass such a Bill as this as a public measure is utterly impracticable, and has no meaning whatever. I regret that the noble and learned Earl, and I presume Her Majesty's Government, have taken this view with respect to a measure which has undoubtedly an object of very great interest in view. I do not think, however, that there has been sufficient support of the measure in this House to justify me in pressing the second reading to a division.

LORD CARLINGTON (Lord President of the Council) desired to say, on the part of the Agricultural Department, that he had approached the consideration of this Bill with great interest, and with an intention, if possible, of supporting it. At the same time, it was impossible—and he thought most of their Lordships would feel that it was impossible—to resist the arguments of the noble and learned Earl on the Wool-sack against the Bill on its present lines and in its present form. The noble and learned Earl had certainly taken objection to some of the details of the Bill; but he could not agree with the noble Marquess that the noble and learned Earl had rested his chief objection to the Bill upon any of these details rather than on much broader grounds. He could only say that if this Bill had been a public one he should have voted for it with great pleasure and satisfaction, although feeling that there would have been necessity for considerable change in Committee.

On question, resolved in the negative.

BURMAH—RENEWAL OF DIPLOMATIC ARRANGEMENTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is intended to renew diplomatic relations with the Kingdom of Burmah? The noble Viscount said, he would only add a few words to express a hope that the Government were giving full consideration—which he had no reason to doubt—to the important subject of the relation of this country with Burmah. He would ask, further, whether the reports were correct as to the action of the Chinese in conjunction with the Burmese in restoring the authority of Burmah at Bhamo; and, also, whether it was true that Sir William Hewett had been ordered to go up the Irrawaddy? He thought he need hardly remind the noble Earl how important it was that this country should have a predominant position with respect either to a change of dynasty in Burmah or to the action of Foreign Powers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that, as their Lordships would be aware, diplomatic relations with Burmah had been broken off in 1879. In 1882 an ineffectual attempt had been made to renew them. At the present time he would only state that the subject was engaging the most careful attention of the Viceroy. He was in communication with the Viceroy; but he was not in a position to say what the Viceroy might think it right to do in the matter. With regard to the other matter, he had no information whatever as to the report with reference to the action of the Burmese and Chinese at Bhaino. Neither had he heard anything as to any expedition of Sir William Hewett up the Irrawaddy.

NAVY — CHILDREN OF WARRANT OFFICERS—THE COMPASSIONATE FUND.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, who had the following Notice on the Paper:—

"To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any allowance from the Compassionate Fund for the children of warrant officers is to be granted; and, if so, whether the grant will be extended, as in the case of other officers, to all orphan children?"

said, he would not have asked the Question had he been aware that, to a certain extent, it had been already answered in "another place." He would now vary the Question, and ask whether the noble Earl could state when an answer would be given; and whether the claims of all or any of the children would be taken into consideration?

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in reply, said, that an allowance would be granted to all children of warrant officers who lost their lives in and by the Service, whether they were killed in action or not.

ARMY ADMINISTRATION.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

VISCOUNT BURY, in rising to move for the following Returns:—

"(1) Return of the titles of the Acts of Parliament at present in force for the regulation of matters connected with the Army; showing the clauses of each Act which have been repealed by subsequent legislation; (2) a list of the Orders in Council now in force for the government of the Army; (3) a list, with dates, of the several volumes of Royal Warrants and of Regulations issued by authority of the Secretary of State for the administration of the Army and now in force; (4) a list of the Reports of Royal Commissions or of special Committees on Army matters which have been presented to Parliament since the year 1872; (5) Returns of the terms for enlistment, discharge, extension of service with or without pension, transfer to the Reserve, extension of reserve service, or re-engagement for the reserve that existed in 1879 at the time of Lord Airey's Committee, and the terms in force at the present time for the same—namely, the enlistment, discharge, transfer to the reserve, extension of reserve service or re-engagement for the reserve; periods of service that give title to pension, and the amount of such pension; also the provision made for the families of reserve soldiers when their husbands are with the colours; and if any persons are charged with the duty of affording assistance to the families of reserve soldiers in case of need during the absence of their husbands," said, that he was placed in a position of some difficulty. The Motion for the first four of these Returns had been placed on the Paper by himself, and he could speak about them; but the others were moved by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Napier of Magdala), who was now unable through indisposition to be present. The Motions had been joined because the discussion of them would otherwise have been separated by several other subjects. The Motion which he himself now brought forward was necessitated, because from 1871 down to the present time there had been a constant succession of changes in the constitution of the Army, which had left it, he did not say now whether in a worse or in a better position than it was before, but certainly in a totally different position. From 1871, when Lord Cardwell began his reforms in the Army, almost all the changes that were made were embodied in Acts of Parliament, in Royal Warrants, and in General Orders. Large sums of money were spent in abolishing purchase, and in establishing depot centres. Lord Cardwell's changes involved the absolute destruction of the system which they superseded. Each successive War Minister was compelled, whether he liked it or not, to develop the new plan, some parts of which were found not easily workable. It was impossible for any Minister, whatever his opinions might be, to resist the plea that the new system required time to prove its effects, or to induce his Colleagues to sacrifice the more than £3,500,000 that were expended on the depot centres, or to face any new succession of organic changes in the constitution of the Army. At no time was it possible after 1872 to go back to the old Army system, which was entirely destroyed — its bones, so to speak, having been buried. When Lord Cardwell introduced this scheme in 1872 he had been fortified by the Localization Committee, which dealt with two classes of subjects — the one destructive, the other constructive. The destructive parts of the scheme had been entirely successful—that was to say, the existing Army system was wholly demolished. The constructive parts of the scheme were not so effective, hardly any of them having yet been carried out. Lord Cardwell took care to embody all his changes in Acts of Parliament, and successive Secretaries of State had since then had no choice but to obey the law. Each of them had tried to make the system work, and had taken certain steps which, whether they were right or wrong, were absolutely irrevocable. Each of them might, in fact, be said to have broken up the ground behind him. Before Lord Cardwell's changes, or in 1871, the Votes for the Army amounted to about £16,000,000 per annum. The Army Estimates had remained at pretty much the same sum ever since. At that time enlistment was for 21 years, at the end of which term a pension was obtained; recruiting was found to be difficult, hardly sufficient men coming in to make up for the waste in the Army. In fact, even lowering the standard and giving large bounties scarcely enabled them to get enough men for the Service. Therefore, it must be acknowledged that the state of the Army in Lord Cardwell's time was very unsatisfactory, and it was quite right to apply some strong and even drastic remedy to it. There was no Reserve. Lord Cardwell's plan was to abolish purchase, to secure the necessary flow of promotion by the compulsory retirement of officers, and to give promotion by seniority, tempered by selection. Pension to the rank and file was entirely done away with, an endeavour was made to create a Reserve by passing men after three years' service in the ranks into the Reserve, and the main feature of the scheme was to localize the Army and to establish what was now called the Depot Brigade system—to identify regiments with various localities for recruiting and training, connecting the Regulars, the Auxiliaries, and the Reserves with the Forces actually serving under the standard. That system was based on the number of battalions—namely, 141, which then happened to exist in the Army; and its smooth working depended on the possibility of retaining exactly 71 battalions always in England and 70 abroad, any disturbance of that proportion involving the complete dislocation of the scheme. Now, on no occasion since then had that proportion been kept up; and Lord Cardwell's original scheme, from beginning to end, though nominally adopted, had never been really carried out. The scheme was embodied first in the Regulation of the Forces Bill of 1871, which was three times remodelled before it passed. First, the whole Bill, except as to the abolition of purchase, was withdrawn. Then the abolition of purchase clauses were thrown out in their Lordships' House. Then those clauses were carried into effect by Royal Warrant, and in the same month of 1871 the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) moved a Resolution declaring that the amended Bill was read the second time only on account of the clauses securing compensation to officers; and that Bill was at last carried only in the shape of clauses giving compensation to officers. Shortly afterwards came what was called the Localization Committee, which presented three successive Reports, and subsequently the Localization Act was passed, £3,500,000 sterling being granted for the building of barracks at the various depot centres. In that year also a General Order was issued to the Army giving effect to the recommendation of the Localization Committee, and containing instructions for the officers appointed to command in connection with the localization of the Forces. In 1874 there was a change of Government. At that time there were in active operation the Army and Militia Reserve Act of 1867, the Regulation of the Forces Act of 1871, the Localization Act of 1872, and the General Order of 1873. In 1875 Mr. Gathorne Hardy appointed the well-known Militia Committee of which Lord Stanley was Chairman. That Committee propounded a scheme similar in many respects to that adopted by Mr. Childers. Mr. Hardy also appointed Sir Daniel Lysons's Committee to examine the brigade depôts; and in the same year, when preparations were made in prospect of the war with Russia, a Committee was appointed on the mobilization of the Army. In 1878 Mr. Hardy appointed General Armstrong's Committee on the short-service system. On the recommendation of that Committee, the whole system of rewards and punishments had been framed to meet the requirements of the old long-service system, which were set aside and remodelled in order to suit the circumstances of the new system of Mr. Cardwell. In 1879 Colonel Stanley succeeded Mr. Hardy, and he appointed Lord Airey's Committee in consequence of the difficulties which had been found in the working of the short-service system. That Committee might be said to represent the military opinion of the day. Their recommendations were not presented to Parliament for a considerable time—in fact, they were not presented until Mr. Childers had matured and laid before Parliament his new scheme in March, 1882, while moving the Army Estimates. He need not enter into an examination of that scheme, because it was the scheme upon which the Army was at present regulated. His object in giving this brief history of the Army changes from 1871 until the present time was to show their Lordships that there were a series of Acts of Parliament, of General Orders, of Royal Warrants, and of Orders in Council which overlapped each other to such an extent that no one could make head or tail of the mass. Officers did not know how they stood, nor under what Regulations they came. There might be a mass of books for them to consult; but it was nearly impossible for them to find out whether a certain Royal Warrant or General Order had been wholly or partially repealed by some subsequent legislation, and, indeed, unless in the case of such experts as his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, no officer could exactly say under what Regulations the Army at present existed. It was necessary, therefore, that there should be laid before their Lordships such information as that he had indicated, and that there should be in the possession of officers of the Army a single Return from which they and others interested in the administration of the Army might gather the exact position of legislative enactments by which the Army was controlled. If the Returns for which he asked, as well as the Return asked for by his noble and gallant Friend the Field Marshal, were granted, as he hoped they would be, there would be in the hands of officers in the Army and of those interested in its government a compendious book of reference by which the actual condition of affairs might be thoroughly known.

Viscount Sidmouth

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

"1. Return of the titles of the Acts of Parliament at present in force for the regulation of matters connected with the Army; showing the clauses of each Act which have been repealed by subsequent legislation;

"2. A list of the Orders in Council now in force for the government of the Army;

"3. A list, with dates, of the several volumes of Royal Warrants and of Regulations issued by authority of the Secretary of State for the administration of the Army and now in force;

"4. A list of the Reports of Royal Commissions or of Special Committees on Army matters which have been presented to Parliament since the year 1872;

"5. Returns of the terms for enlistment, discharge, extension of service with or without pension, transfer to the Reserve, extension of reserve service, or re-engagement for the reserve, that existed in 1879 at the time of Lord Airey's Committee, and the terms in force at the present time for the same; namely, the enlistment, discharge, transfer to the reserve, extension of reserve service, or re-engagement for the reserve."—(The Viscount Bury.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was unable to trace any connection between the historical retrospect given by the noble Viscount and the Motion of which he had given Notice. The only object he could conceive the noble Viscount had in making his statement was to show the system was introduced by Lord Cardwell, and to prove that because subsequent War Ministers were unable to depart from it he (Viscount Bury) was to be acquitted from any responsibility in having to carry it out. He had no difficulty in acquitting the noble Viscount of that responsibility. The noble Viscount, towards the conclusion of his speech, complained that there was a good deal of confusion as to the documents, whether General Orders or Acts of Parliament, by which the Army was governed. He had no objection to produce the Returns asked for; indeed, the Motion had, to some extent, been anticipated, and the documents were in such a forward state of preparation that they would probably be presented to the House in a few days. He thought, however, the noble Lord somewhat exaggerated the confusion to officers and others interested in the Army arising from the number of documents dealing with its administration. He did not seem to be aware that the documents regulating the Army were infinitely more simple in their character than they had been in any former period. With one or two exceptions, the legislation affecting the Army was up to date. It was contained in 12 volumes of Regulations, eight of which were confined to departmental arrangements. It seemed to him, therefore, that the criticisms of the noble Viscount referred more appropriately to the old days, when there was no such thing as the consolidating of Warrants. At present there was no confusion whatever. The Warrants were perfectly clear, consolidation took place from time to time, and every officer could not fail to obtain with very little trouble the information he wanted. There was another volume to which he would like to refer; it was a manual of military law issued on the authority of the War Department. The book had been drawn up by an able legal authority, embodying the Acts of Parliament and dissertations on military law regulating the Army up to date. The price of the book was 2s. 6d., so it was not beyond the reach of noble Lords who were interested. The Returns asked for by the noble and gallant Lord the Field Marshal had already been placed before the House in a very convenient form. The noble Viscount's Motion concluded with a reference to a Return, though in reality it was rather in the nature of a Question, as to the payment which the wives of Reserve soldiers would receive while their husbands were with the Colours. He did not think that that was a subject for a Return; but he would give the noble Viscount what information he could. The wives of Reserve men with the Colours would receive the same allowances as were received by the wives of soldiers serving abroad—namely, 8d. a-day, with 2d. a-day for each child up to a certain age. These sums were calculated on the foreign rate, and not on the home rate, which was much smaller; and he believed no complaint had been made as to the way in which the wives of Reserve men would be dealt with. There was no such organization as the noble Viscount suggested for relieving the wives and families of Reserve men in case of need; and he failed to see how such an organization could be established. The families of Reserve soldiers were scattered all over the country, and the task of relieving them in case of need must devolve on local administrations in the places where these people resided. In conclusion, the noble Earl said he hoped he should be able shortly to lay upon the Table of the House the Returns for which the noble Viscount had moved.

Viscount Bury

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY wanted to know whether it was proposed to give effect to that part of the original scheme which provided that when the two battalions of one regiment were both abroad a third battalion should be formed at home? That part of the scheme had never yet been carried out.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he must protest against the extraordinary irregularity of asking a Question on a Motion with which it had nothing whatever to do; but he had no objection to answer it. When it was thought desirable, no doubt, the depot could be, and was in several cases, increased in numbers. Of course, the Military Advisers of the Crown were guided by the circumstances in which wars were carried on.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS expressed his satisfaction with the announcement that the Returns moved for by his noble Friend would, as far as possible, be granted.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 13th March, 1885.

MINUTES: SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Resolutions (12th March) reported
PUBLIC BILLS: Ordered—Peasant Proprietary and Acquisition of Land by Occupiers No. 2 Ordered—First Reading—Industrial Schools
(Ireland) (96).

Second Reading—Referred to a Select Committee—Registration (Occupation Voters) [63].

Committee—Parliamentary Elections—Redistribution (re-comm.) [49]—R.P. [Fourth Night]. Considered as amended—Third Reading—Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll) [85], and passed.

Withdrawn—Peasant Proprietary and Acquisition of Land by Occupiers [43].

QUESTIONS.

—o—

CIVIL SERVANTS IN BANKRUPTCY— CASE OF MR. JOHN KIRWAN—ORDER OF COURT OF BANKRUPTCY (IRE- LAND).

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland recently ordered that a sum of £40 per annum should be set aside from the salary of John Sligo Kirwan, who is Government Cattle Inspector for the Port of Belfast, to liquidate a claim of £100 due to the National Bank of Ireland; and, whether the Government have refused to conform to the decree of the Bankruptcy Court; and, if so, can they give a reason, and also will they reconsider their decision?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It is true that an order allocating part of Mr. Kirwan's salary has been made by the Court of Bankruptcy; but it is not true that the Government have refused to conform to it. The order was incorrect in describing Mr. Kirwan as an officer of the Privy Council instead of the Veterinary Department. This was pointed out to the Solicitor of the Official Assignee on the 3rd ultimo, and he has not since replied. I should add that the Veterinary Department are at present in communication with the Treasury on the point whether Mr. Kirwan's is a case coming under the Rules affecting Civil servants in pecuniary difficulties.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)—THE MEDICAL OFFICER OF HEALTH, ST. PANCAS.

MR. FIRTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the circumstances attending the resignation of Dr. Murphy as the Medical Officer of Health for St. Pancras; whether there is any ground for the statement made in his letter of resignation that "exceptional and unscrupulous means" have been adopted to prevent the carrying on of effectual sanitary work, and to discredit him in his contest with those who were affected by his condemnation of insanitary property in St. Pancras; and, if such statement is true, whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have no information as to the circumstances attending the resignation of Dr. Murphy except that furnished by his letter which has appeared in a local newspaper. So far as we are in a position to form any opinion on the subject, Dr. Murphy has discharged his duties as Medical Officer of Health with great efficiency. The action of the Vestry with regard to the Medical Officer of Health is in no way subject to the jurisdiction of the Board; and we cannot, therefore, intervene.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT —ARMS' LICENCES—CASE OF JAMES LORD, MOUNT NUGENT, CO. CAVAN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that at the time James Lord, of Mount Nugent, county Cavan, got a licence to carry arms he was not holder of any land; and, if not, what notice will he take of the conduct of the two magistrates who certified he was a landholder?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It appears that James Lord was not a holder of land at the time when he got his licence. The certificate which described him as a farmer was therefore erroneous in this respect; but it is reasonable to suppose that the point to which the magistrates were directing their attention was the fitness of the applicant to carry arms rather than the exact description of him in the form, and as Lord is stated to be a young man of excellent character, who would probably have obtained a licence on such a recommendation whether he was a farmer or not, I am disposed to regard the matter as an oversight which calls for no further action.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. W. W. NEWENHAM, CO. CORK.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether William Worth Newenham, a

Militia captain and magistrate of the county of Cork, after dining with the resident magistrate, Mr. Arthur Mitchel, on the 22nd of January last at Cork, was found about midnight on that occasion drunk and misconducting himself in Winthrop Street by Constables Carroll and Lockhart, who took him prisoner to Turkey Street Guardhouse; whether Mr. Newenham assaulted the police, and tore the tunic belonging to one of them; whether Mr. Newenham behaved in a most violent manner, shouting at the top of his voice that he was an Orangeman, a Freemason, and a magistrate of the county of Cork; and that he had got drunk in the company of the resident magistrate, before whom he ordered the police to bring him; whether the police, instead of lodging Mr. Newenham in Bridewell in the usual course, to be dealt with next morning by the city justices, brought him to the City Club before Mr. Mitchel, R.M. who discharged the prisoner, remarking that it was a case for a summons; whether it is the fact that no summons has been since issued; if so, why has a summons not been issued; whether the subsequent correspondence between Messrs. Mitchel and Newenham will be laid upon the Table; whether the police made a report of the matter to their superiors; if so, what is the purport of that report; and, whether the Government will retain Messrs. Mitchel and Newenham in the Commission of the Peace?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The incident to which this Question has reference occurred on the 15th, not the 22nd January. At about 11 P.M. on the day I have named Captain Newenham was brought in custody to the club where the Resident Magistrate was, and charged with attempting to assault a policeman. The Resident Magistrate ordered his discharge, and told the police they might proceed by summons. The case was subsequently investigated by the police authorities, who came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to move further in the matter, and it was allowed to drop. It is not true that Captain Newenham had dined with the Resident Magistrate that evening. Captain Newenham was not drunk, nor are the other particulars of conduct ascribed to him true. He did not desire the police to bring him before the Resident Magistrate, and no correspondence whatever on the subject has passed between him and Mr. Mitchel.

Mr. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman, then, be kind enough to say why Captain Newenham was arrested?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: He was arrested for an attempt to assault the police.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND: Why did he attempt to assault the police?

[No reply.]

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1864 - REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS.

Mr. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the Government have considered whether the fifteen days now allowed by law to town clerks (7th to 22nd July) is sufficient this year for the preparation of the Parliamentary Voters List in view of the influx of new voters, and will they communicate with the town clerks of the eight boroughs left under the Seats Bill on the subject?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): This subject has been under the consideration of the Irish Government. We are already in possession of the views of the Town Clerk of Dublin. The matter will receive careful attention.

Mr. HEALY: Will the other town clerks be consulted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) was understood to say that he thought they would.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT - FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN NORFOLK.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been called to a statement reported, in the Evening Standard of the 3rd instant, to have been made by the Earl of Suffolk, the Chairman at a Council Meeting of the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture, as to the recent outbreak of foot and mouth disease in Norfolk, in the following terms:—

"No disease had existed in the district before, and there was evidence which justified them in believing that the pig, while in London, had taken the infection from the diseased sheep brought from Germany."

and, whether it is a fact that the pig referred to was taken to Swaffham on 12th January, and that the first cargo of sheep from Germany, in which the disease appeared, arrived on 11th February?

MR. TREVELYAN: The pig referred to was taken to Swaffham on the 12th of January. The first cargo of sheep from Germany in which one sheep was found to be affected with foot-and-mouth disease was landed at Deptford on February 11. As a matter of fact, the pig never came nearer London than Clapham Junction. It appears, from a full report of Lord Suffolk's speech, that his Lordship acquitted the pig of the charge of having contracted the disease from a German source.

MR. CHAPLIN asked whether, between the passing of the Act of last year and February 11, during which time animals were continually imported from Germany, the disease did not exist in Germany?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is impossible to say that disease did not exist in Germany during the period referred to; but out of 500,000 sheep introduced from Germany in the course of 12 months only two of them were known to have been affected by foot-and-mouth disease.

MR. CHAPLIN: Do I understand that the disease prevails at the present moment in Germany?

MR. TREVELYAN: It prevails at the present moment in Germany—that is to say, it exists.

SEEDS SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT—REPAYMENT OF LOANS.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the Local Government Board has impounded the rates of the Kildysart (county Clare) Union to the extent of £905, due on account of the Seeds Supply (Ireland) Act; if, previous to adopting this course, the local guardians had definitely refused to liquidate the debt; in how many instances has a similar course been adopted by the Local Government Board; and, if the total outstanding amount on account of the Seeds Act can be stated?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have impounded the rates of Kildysart Union to the extent of £905, due under the Seeds Supply (Ireland) Act, and they were bound by the Act to do so. The Guardians had not definitely refused, but they had failed to liquidate their debt, although allowed a considerable extension of time beyond the date at which the sum was due. The Board have been obliged to exercise their compulsory powers in 58 similar instances. The total amount now outstanding for seed loans is £106,597 4s. 4d.

MR. KENNY: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to convey that in 58 other Unions the Local Government Board impounded the rates?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No; I do not know to what extent the Local Government Board exercises their powers.

MR. KENNY: I will put a further Question on the subject.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—ENNISTYMON UNION.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Local Government Board has come to a decision with regard to an excessive charge upon the Ennistymon (county Clare) Union, for an inquiry under "The Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1883;" if he is aware that the Ennistymon Board of Guardians has recently passed a resolution strongly disapproving of the action of the Local Government Board in sanctioning such a charge, and add,

"The Board of Guardians, with reluctance, have to observe that in this matter a disregard for the welfare of both labourers and ratepayers has been apparent on the part of the Local Government Board;"

and, if any action will be taken to punish those officials of the Board or others who have made an excessive or fraudulent charge for their services?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I explained, in reply to a Question of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on the 4th of December last, that the sum which the Local Government Board have called on the Guardians to pay in this instance is made up of the cost of advertising an inquiry under the Labourers' Act, and of the expenses of a shorthand writer. The Guardians have since admitted their liability for the advertisements; but they still dispute the item for the shorthand writer. There is, however, no other source from which the payment can be made. The charge was made according to a scale fixed by the Treasury, and the allegations in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question are absolutely unwarranted.

Mr. Arthur Arnold

GENERAL GORDON'S TELEGRAMS

Mr. BOURKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Copies of Telegrams which General Gordon sent to Sir E. Baring and others during the last few months of the siege of Khartoum have reached the Government; and, when will they be laid before Parliament?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Evelyn Baring forwarded by the mail which arrived last Monday some letters addressed to himself by General Gordon, and bearing date the 9th of November and 12th and 13th of December last. They are now being printed, and I do not think there will be any objection to lay them on the Table with any that may be subsequently received.

GENERAL GORDON'S DIARIES.

Mr. BOURKE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Sixth Volume of General Gordon's Diaries, which left Korti on the 16th, has reached the Government; and, whether this volume will be sent to General Gordon's representatives?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The sixth volume of General Gordon's diaries has been received. A letter has also been received from General Gordon, which shows clearly what were his wishes with regard to these journals. It is addressed to the Chief of the Staff of the Sudan Expeditionary Force, and is dated November 10, 1884. It says—

"Since departure, 10th September, of Lieut. Colonel Stewart, C.M.G., I have kept a daily journal of all events at Khartoum, which contains also my private opinions on certain facts, which, perhaps, it is just as well you should know confidentially. You can, of course, make extracts of all official matter, and will naturally leave my private opinions out in the case of publication. I have already sent five portions of this journal, and now send the sixth portion."

That ends the letter. The official extracts referred to will be published as soon as possible. The whole diary will be handed over to his relatives, and we shall confer with them as to what portions it is desirable to include in the official extracts.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. JOHN ECCLES, PETTY SESSIONS CLERK, PORTADOWN.

Mr. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the conduct of Mr. John Eccles, Clerk of the Petty Sessions at Portadown, who, during the hearing of a case by the magistrates, there stated in open Court that a man named Patrick Byrne, who was about to be examined as a witness, was not to be believed on his oath; and, whether it is intended to tolerate such conduct on the part of Mr. Eccles, or what course it is intended to adopt towards him?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It appears that the Petty Sessions Clerk did make the observation referred to, and in consequence an action was brought against him by Patrick Byrne, which he settled by payment of a sum of money. Mr. Eccles at the time thought it his duty to make the statement to the Bench which he did, but afterwards regretted it. The Lord Lieutenant has given directions that he shall be censured for his conduct.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES.

Mr. ROLLS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has received any and what reply from the Railway Companies to his suggestion or request that the Bills for Revision of Rates should be withdrawn; and, whether he is now prepared to state the course he intends to take or advise with reference to these Bills in the event of their not being withdrawn?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have to thank the hon. Member for his courtesy in postponing this Question; and as the subject is one of very great interest and importance perhaps the House will allow me some little latitude in making a statement on the matter. The House will recollect that the subject of the classification of railway terminals was dealt with by the Railway Rates Committee in 1882; and they recommended, among other things, that one uniform classification of goods should be adopted for the whole railway system, and that the terminal charges should be recognized, subject to their publication by the Companies, and, in case of challenge, to the sanction of the Railway

Commissioners. Last year the Government brought in a Bill dealing with the whole subject of railway legislation, and they endeavoured to carry out these recommendations of the Railway Committee in a clause in that Bill, the important part of which in reference to this subject I may quote—

“ It shall be lawful for a Railway Company to charge a reasonable sum for terminals subject in case of dispute to the sanction of the Commissioners, who may prescribe the manner in which the scale of such terminals shall be published. The provisions contained in this section with respect to such terminals shall not apply to any Railway Company until such Company has submitted to Parliament a revised classification of rates and a revised schedule of maximum rates, nor until such revised classification and schedule have been approved by Parliament.”

I have seen it stated that the Board of Trade are responsible for the Bills referred to in the Question, and I suppose that opinion has arisen from the terms of the Bill introduced by the Government last year. But I may point out that the provision in the Bill is one of a number of concurrent provisions; and it does not follow that because it would be right to pass a Bill dealing generally with railway grievances it would be right to take out one particular subject and deal with it separately from all the rest. I have also to state that the Board of Trade is not in any way committed to the details of the particular Bills which are now before the House. These are nine in number, and I am informed that they deal altogether with no less than 381 Acts of Parliament, and also with the rates and charges upon something like 28,000 articles. It will, I think, be evident to the House that if these Bills had been generally accepted by the traders as a fair basis for the settlement of this rather difficult and complicated question, it might be very well to refer them to a strong Hybrid Committee, which would have been, in that case, able to deal with any disputed points which might have remained over. Unfortunately, that has not been the case, and it must be clear from recent agitation that the trades generally, either because the Bills are in themselves objectionable, or owing to some misapprehension as to their provisions, are entirely opposed to these Bills. Under these circumstances, there would be so much contentious matter to be laid before a Parliamentary Committee that I confess it is almost impossible to suppose that within any reasonable time any Parliamentary Committee could deal with the vast number of questions that would be presented to it. It was under these circumstances that I received, a short time ago, a communication from my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Sir Bernhard Samuelson), who, speaking on his own behalf and on behalf of a very influential Committee of Members of both Houses of Parliament, who had been selected to represent the interest of the traders, suggested that this was a matter which ought, in the first instance, and before any legislation on the subject was attempted to be inquired into by some efficient tribunal, and my hon. Friend suggested that the Railway Commission would be the natural tribunal for such an inquiry. I must say that I thought such a suggestion was one which deserved very careful and even favourable consideration, and I have since been in communication with the Railway Companies on the subject. I was very anxious to have the assent, and the willing assent, of the Railway Companies to any proposal of the kind, because I felt that if an inquiry of this kind were forced upon either party it would probably be unduly prolonged, and we could hardly hope that the Report, when received, would be as satisfactory a basis for legislation as it would be if it were the result of an amicable arrangement entered into between the two parties. I have seen the representatives of the Railway Companies on several occasions, and for the last time this morning, when the Chairmen and officials of some of the leading lines were good enough to wait upon me, and I am glad to say the Railway Companies assent to the principle of the inquiry which has been proposed; but there is still some difference of opinion as to what should be the character of the tribunal. The Railway Companies, as I understand, agree that the Railway Commission must be the nucleus of such a tribunal, and they think that it would be right and proper that two representatives of the traders and two of the Companies respectively, as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury, should be added to the Commission, as expert Commissioners, to assist them in coming to a conclusion. They think, also, that it is desirable that the Commission should be further strengthened by the addition of the names of one or two gentlemen of independent and great position, who would command the confidence both of the traders and of the Railway Companies. I have had some little experience in forming Commissions, and I am bound to say that I have found it on previous occasions very difficult to please all parties, and I am not very hopeful of being able to find gentlemen of the position and character desired by the Railway Companies who would be willing to undertake such a laborious and difficult technical task as that proposed, and who would, at the same time, enjoy the full confidence both of the traders and the Railway Companies. The matter, however, is one for further consideration; but if it should prove impossible to find such gentlemen, then I confess, speaking for myself, my opinion is that it would be desirable that these Bills should be referred to a Commission, appointed according to the suggestions I have already referred to, and consisting of the Railway Commissioners and the four experts added, and that they should be instructed to inquire into the railway charges with the view to see how far the Bills before the House provide a satisfactory settlement, and if they do not, in what way they should be modified. I hope, under these circumstances, the Bills will not be proceeded with.

Mr. Chamberlain

SIR JOSEPH PEASE: Has the right hon. Gentleman found any difficulty on the part of the Railway Companies in defining the scope and the duties of the Commission?

MR. CAUSTON: As none of these Bills deal with the question of preferential rates on foreign goods, will that question be referred to the Commission? The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the agricultural interest suffers greatly upon the subject.

MR. R. H. PAGET: The right hon. Gentleman has not made a definite reply to the Question on the Paper as to the answer which the Railway Companies have made. We are still in ignorance as to whether they intend to withdraw their Bills.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON: Do I understand correctly that the question to be referred to this Commission, if appointed, will be simply that of rates and charges, and that it will be so referred without prejudice to any more general questions that may arise on railway management?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease), I do not anticipate that there will be any difficulty in coming to an agreement as to the terms of reference. They will be, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Sir Bernhard Samuelson) has suggested, to inquire into the rates and charges, without prejudice to any other and entirely different questions. That will be my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton), for while I admit the extreme importance of preferential rates, yet that is a subject on which we have sufficient information, and which is ripe for legislation when time admits for the introduction and pressing forward of a Bill. As to the Question of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. R. H. Paget), I thought I had given very fully the reply of the Railway Companies. Before giving any definite and final answer they have to consult their constituents; but I am under the impression that they will not, in the end, object to the proposal which has been made, and with regard to the principle of which they have expressed themselves in entire agreement. Under these circumstances, the Bills will not, of course, be proceeded with. If, however, the Railway Companies should think it proper to proceed with the Bills, then I think the House will be able to deal with them.

MR. R. H. PAGET: Are we to understand that this Commission will not include the question of preferential rates?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I thought I made myself quite clear. I said that was not a question to be referred, because it is one which has already been inquired into, and upon which we have sufficient information to be able to legislate as soon as there is time.

MR. TOMLINSON: Will the constitution, functions, and jurisdiction of the Railway Commissioners come within the scope of the inquiry?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir.

MR. HICKS: I should like to ask whether, as the question of through rates from the Continent is not to be submitted to the Commission, it will be dealt with in a Bill to be brought forward after the Commissioners have met?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: It is rather premature to make a statement with regard to legislation which may hereafter be introduced.

MR. CAUSTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether a Bill has been prepared by the Government on the subject of foreign rates? The agricultural interest suffers very much from these rates, especially in the Eastern counties, where they are very unfair?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can throw any more light upon what he considers to be ascertained facts? He says he is ready to introduce a Bill upon the subject of preferential rates; can he say in what sense he has proposed to deal with it?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot give an answer to that Question without making a long speech; but I may say that the whole question was inquired into by the Railway Rates and Fares Committee upstairs, and we have full evidence to enable us to deal with it.

PUBLIC HEALTH—FLACKWELL HEATH WATER SUPPLY.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the defective water supply of the village of Flackwell Heath, near High Wycombe; and, if so, whether the necessary steps have been, or will be, taken to insist that a proper provision shall be made through the agency of the Rural Sanitary Authority?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The Local Government Board have received a complaint as to the water supply of the hamlet of Flackwell Heath, and communicated with the Rural Sanitary Authority on the subject. They, in reply, forwarded Reports from the Medical Officer of Health and Inspector of Nuisances, from which it appears that the dwelling houses are chiefly cottages, scattered over a considerable area; that the cottages, with the exception of about 28, are provided with tanks for the storage of water; and that the Sanitary Authority considers that, where there is no such provision, the owners should be called upon to provide tanks, or in some other way to provide a water supply, instead of the Sanitary Authority undertaking the digging of wells from 200 to 300 feet in depth, as has been suggested. Several new tanks have been provided since attention was directed to the matter. Letters of the Sanitary Authority were forwarded for the information of the complainants, and we yesterday received a Report in reply to the statements of the Sanitary Authority. We are asked to receive a deputation on the subject, and we propose to do so.

THE WEST AFRICAN CONVENTION— INLAND TRANSIT DUTIES.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether under the West African Convention the Powers have agreed to use their good offices with the territorial Powers on the Coast to obtain favourable terms for transit into the interior; and, if this be true, whether the effect of it at Zanzibar may be that goods imported into the interior by Foreign Powers will be admitted free of Duty, while British goods will be subjected still, under Treaty, to a Duty of five per cent?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Powers have agreed to use their good offices to obtain favourable terms for goods in transit. British trade is fully protected by the most favoured nation provision contained in Article I. of the Zanzibar Treaty of May 31, 1839.

NAVY—COMMITTEE ON NAVAL PENSIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the instructions given to the Commission presided over by H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh on Pensions to the Widows and Orphans of Seamen and Marines and other Naval Pensions?

MR. CAINE: Premising that a Committee and not a Commission has been appointed to consider the question of making provision for widows, I have to inform the hon. Member that it is not desirable to raise expectations by publishing the instructions, the result of the inquiry being uncertain.

EGYPT—USE OF THE COURBASH.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Globe of 3rd March, to the effect—

"That, without the usual delays and formalities attending the action of the tribunals, four men belonging to the village of Matarieh were court-martialled," the reason given being "the increasing insolence of the Native population towards Englishmen."

and an alleged assault by some of the villagers on two unarmed Hussars; whether inquiry will be made as to the nature of the provocation given by the Hussars; how is it they went about unarmed; and, whether the punishment inflicted on their alleged assailants was not in direct contravention of the undertaking to abolish the court-martial?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I can only refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to him last Friday, when I informed him that inquiry would be made as to the facts of this case. A despatch to that effect has been addressed to Sir Evelyn Baring; but sufficient time has not elapsed to allow of a reply having been received.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—GERMANY—EARL GRANVILLE AND COUNT HERBERT BISMARCK.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Papers will be laid upon the Table disclosing the nature of the negotiations which have lately been carried on between Count Herbert Bismarck and Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It was agreed that the conversations between Lord Granville and Count Herbert Bismarck were of a confidential character. Any results which have arisen from them will be placed on record in the usual manner, and will be laid before Parliament.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Privy Council have received information as to any further outbreak or outbreaks of foot and mouth disease quite recently in England?

MR. TREVELYAN: The last outbreak of foot and mouth disease was reported to the Privy Council on the 7th instant. The disease appeared among a herd consisting of 22 cattle on a farm at Crowland Common, near Spalding. An Inspector of the Privy Council visited the farm on Monday the 9th, and found six of the cattle then affected with the disease. The Local Authorities have been very energetic. The last animals brought into the premises arrived four weeks before the outbreak was detected. There is no evidence to show that they brought the disease with them. This, with the case of Swaffham in Norfolk, makes only two outbreaks of foot and mouth disease this year, as far as it has gone.

MR. CHAPLIN asked whether, in face of the fact that foot-and-mouth disease prevailed in Germany, the Privy Council were satisfied that the circumstances of that country were such as to afford reasonable security to England, by the continued importation of live animals, against the importation of disease?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is plain we think so, on account of the measures which we have taken and refrained from taking. The fact that it is three weeks since the last sheep were affected with foot-and-mouth disease is a very good proof that the Privy Council were right in not acting more harshly than they did; but, of course, if there is any more importation of diseased animals the Privy Council will very seriously consider the matter.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that in consequence of the reply he had received, and as he could place so little reliance on the Government, he would take the earliest opportunity of calling attention to the subject.

NATIONAL DEBT CONVERSION OF STOCK ACT, 1884.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will enlarge the statement he proposes to furnish in reference to the amount of Two and a-Half Per Cent. and Two and Three-quarter Per Cent., so as to exhibit in a convenient form the gross amount so converted under the Act of 1884, distinguishing the amount taken by the public; by his own authority in respect of savings banks, &c.; and by the authority of the Lord Chancellor, or other Department, in respect of Chancery, Bankruptcy, or other funds on deposit?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER MR. CHILDE: Yes, Sir. The Return which I have promised to the hon. Member for the City (Mr. Alderman Cotton) will give the details the hon. Member desires.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE EDUCATION CODE FOR 1885.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, in consideration of the rule that the Education Code must lie upon the Table of the House for a period of forty days before it becomes Law (should no Address to the Crown be carried for its Amendment), and that the holidays are included in that period, and of the fact that there are now less than forty days before Easter, he will either defer its introduction till after the holidays or lay it upon the Table at once; whether he will take care that the Code shall be in the hands of Members on the day on which it is laid upon the Table; and, whether he will place in the hands of honourable Members the Department's instructions to their inspectors, as to the interpretation of the Code, at the same time?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have no such option, as to the submission of the Code, as the hon. Gentleman seems to suppose. I am bound, under Article 136, "to lay it on the Table of both Houses within one calendar month from the meeting of Parliament," and I shall do so next week. The statute does not prescribe 40 days, but one month, as the period during which it must lie upon the Table. I will endeavour to arrange for the circulation of the Code as soon as possible after I have presented it. The instructions to Inspectors depend entirely upon the conditions of the Code, and they cannot be issued until the Code has received the sanction of Parliament.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF THE NEWRY RIOTERS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the six Orangemen charged with having fired out of the Orange Hall at Newry at a National procession, with intent to murder, were brought to trial at the last assizes at Belfast, where the panel is principally composed of Orangemen; whether the jury disagreed, and it was afterwards stated that ten were for acquittal, and two for conviction; and, whether it is a fact that the venue has been again changed to Belfast; and, if so, for what purpose, or with what hope of conviction?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): One of six persons charged with firing with intent to injure out of the Orange Hall at Newry was tried at the Winter Assizes at Belfast. The jury disagreed. I have no authentic information, nor do I consider it right to make inquiries, as to the proportion of jurors for a conviction or an acquittal. The Attorney General has considered it desirable that the cases should not be tried in Down, the locality where they arose, and, after careful inquiry, he has changed the venue to Belfast. He has no reason to believe that a County Antrim jury will not at the next Assizes discharge its duty, or that the panel will be principally composed of Orangemen.

MR. O'BRIEN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman say if the jury was not composed of Orangemen? Is it not the fact that at the last Belfast Assizes there were only two Catholics on the whole special jury?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), who was almost inaudible in the Gallery, was understood to say that he did not know how many of the jury were Orangemen.

MR. HEALY: Is it not also intended to try James Mulholland, Nationalist, in Belfast?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had no information on the subject.

LAW AND POLICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—ALLEGED CASE OF POACH-ING—ASHFORD PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a statement in The Daily News of Tuesday last, to the following effect:—Two labourers, James and Thomas Wilson, were engaged in cutting wood, when they were taken into custody by a gamekeeper and a policeman, and one of them charged before the magistrates at Ashford (Kent) Petty Sessions with "going round as if to see if there was anybody about, and then taking up a rabbit." According to the evidence of the witnesses, Thomas Wilson had no hand in the business, and was at work when his brother James found the rabbit, which he does not hesitate to declare was placed there by the gamekeeper or the policeman, or by both. The Bench sentenced the two men to twenty-one days' imprisonment, with hard labour; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the circumstances of the case, and will state whether policemen, who are paid by public money, can be legally employed to act as gamekeepers to private persons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, who was indistinctly heard, stated that he had just got the facts of this case; but they did not correspond with those recited in the Question at all. First of all, these men were not taken into custody, but were summoned in the ordinary way; and, in the next place, they were not sentenced primarily to imprisonment. They were fined £1, and imprisonment in default, and they were given a month, at their own request, to find the money. Then, with reference to one of the persons, Thomas Wilson, the report made to him was that he was convicted once of larceny, four times of assault, three times for being drunk and disorderly, and once for malicious injury to property. Therefore he could not entirely accept his testimony when he "declared that the rabbit was placed there by the gamekeeper." These men were imprisoned for this offence in default of payment of the fine; and he thought that the length of time that they should be kept there in default of payment of the fine was a proper matter of consideration for the Home Secretary.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked the right hon. Gentleman to answer the Question that as regarded one of these men there was no evidence at all, the witness admitting that he was at work at the time the offence was committed; and would he also say whether the punishment was for past offences, or whether it was three weeks' hard labour for taking a rabbit, supposing the rabbit to have been taken?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had already stated that the fine was imposed for an offence against the Game Act, and that in default of payment of the fine the punishment had to be inflicted, a month being given for the payment of the fine. With reference to the man whom the hon. Member asked about, he had given a record of his former convictions, and he was present on this occasion. Whether or not the evidence was sufficient to justify the assumption that, being present, he concurred in the act was a question he should like to consider.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS gave Notice that he would put a further Question to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — THE SUB-POSTMASTER AT CRAANFORD.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that the Dublin Post Office authorities sent an official to Mr. E. Byrne, sub-postmaster of Craanford, to threaten him with dismissal if he did not prevent National League meetings being held in the same house as the post office; whether Mr. Byrne was obliged to sign an agreement that he would not allow such meetings to be held; and, whether such action upon the part of the Dublin authorities is approved?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I stated a few nights ago that the Postmaster of Craanford was not threatened with dismissal; but that he was informed that the Post Office authorities disapproved of political meetings being held in the same house as the post office. He was asked to sign a paper to the effect that he would not again allow the meetings to be held in the same house, and I am informed that he agreed to that course. I approve of the action of the Dublin authorities in the matter.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: With reference to this Question I am glad the right hon. Gentleman's answer to-day admits what he did not admit in his previous answer a few days ago. ["Order!"] I beg to give Notice, inasmuch as this Question has created considerable interest amongst the inhabitants of this district, that I will call attention to the fact that Mr. Byrne was not transgressing the rule which says that no political meetings shall be held in the same house as the post office. [Cries of "Order!"] I am giving Notice of a Question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, under cover of giving Notice of a Question, is now arguing.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General—with reference to the last part of the Question of the hon.

Member for Wexford, to which he replied that he approved of the action of the Dublin authorities—who are the Dublin authorities whose action he approved of; and whether a secretary has been appointed to the Dublin Post Office, and, if not, when a secretary will be appointed?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Of course, the hon. Member will give Notice of the Question.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—ST. PATRICK'S DAY—DEMONSTRATION AT LONDONDERRY.

MR. O'BRIEN: Before the Chief Secretary for Ireland leaves the House, perhaps he will be able to answer another Question. I beg to ask him whether he has any intention on the part of the Government to interfere with the National demonstration at Derry?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: When?

MR. O'BRIEN: On St. Patrick's Day.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The question I have been obliged to ask will show the hon. Member that I am unable to answer his Question.

MR. O'BRIEN: As it is of great importance that the intention of Her Majesty's Government should be known at once, I beg to give Notice that I will put this Question again before the rising of the House.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA—THE DECLARATION OF PARIS.

MR. MCCOAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will consider if the time has not come when the Military interests of this Country require that the Declaration of Paris should, like the provisions of the Treaty of 1856, which neutralized the Black Sea, be abrogated, and our full liberty of action as a Maritime Power be resumed?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to this Question, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have not formed any intention of raising any question with respect to the Declaration of Paris. I think the Question of the hon. Member appears to proceed upon a certain growing misapprehension with regard to two subjects which cannot be said to be strictly akin. The provision for the neutralization of the Black Sea, as it is termed in the Question, had relation to a given state of things which prevailed at the moment; and it was well known amongst those who were immediately connected with the negotiation of the Treaty that it was not expected to be a permanent provision. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Oh, oh!] That is an interruption of a very extraordinary and unusual character. That, at least, is my opinion. At any rate, the principles involved in the Declaration of Paris, of course, were laid down with respect to the establishment of a permanent rule with regard to the commerce of the world.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether it was not a fact that the abrogation of the Treaty of Paris was extorted from England by a Foreign Power? [Cries of "Oh!"]

[No reply.]

CENTRAL ASIA—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA—THE DECLARATION OF PARIS.

MR. RICHARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, with reference to the Declaration adopted by the Plenipotentiaries who negotiated the Treaty of Paris in 1856, and which was embodied in Protocol 23 of that Treaty, viz.—

"The Plenipotentiaries do not hesitate to express, in the name of their Governments, the wish that States between which any serious misunderstanding may arise, should, before appealing to arms, have recourse, as far as circumstances might allow, to the good offices of a friendly Power;"

whether England and Russia were parties to that declaration, and whether that declaration does not afford just and sufficient ground for invoking the good offices of some friendly Power as regards the differences which now exist between England and Russia?

MR. GLADSTONE: The accuracy of the reference of my hon. Friend to the Declaration is beyond dispute. I shall proceed to answer the Question as clearly as I can, and I shall endeavour to do so in such a way as not to confuse the separate parts of the subject. With regard to the Afghan Frontier there have arisen two subjects of solicitude which are in themselves quite distinct from each other. One is as to the agreement made some time ago between Russia and England to ascertain the Frontier by inquiry and correspondence; the other is as to the advances which have been made by Russian and Afghan Forces respectively to points within the debatable or debated ground. I mention these because they are entirely distinct from one another—one having relation to a question of right and the other to a question of fact, which evidently does not bear upon determining the question of right. As respects the second of these Questions—namely, the advance of the Forces—it has been agreed between Russia and England that no further advance should be made on either side. With regard to the first of these Questions—that to which my hon. Friend refers—my answer is that the subject of ascertaining the Frontier by inquiry and correspondence is at present under treatment by diplomatic communication, and that it has not yet reached such a stage—there has not been as yet such a full comparison of the views of the two sides respectively—and by the two sides I mean Russia on the one hand, and England and the Ameer of Afghanistan on the other—as to treat that matter as one which is exhausted. It would, therefore, be premature on my part at the present moment to pronounce any opinion as to a mode of solution which might or might not be proper under circumstances not yet fully ascertained.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am not quite sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was rightly understood to speak of an agreement as having been made to the effect that the Forces—that the persons on either side shall not advance beyond the positions which they now hold. I should like to know whether that is to be a permanent arrangement, or only a temporary one, to last while the boundary question is being discussed?

MR. GLADSTONE: My only reason for not saying that it was to last while the boundary was being discussed was that I did not wish to lead to any inference whatever being drawn in regard to those positions, or to what might be done with regard to them in the course of the negotiations. But the agreement of which I spoke is not in the nature of a formal instrument, but an agreement contained in diplomatic Correspondence. It is an agreement without any specific limit of time; but it will doubtless hold good so long as there is any occasion for it.

MR. CHAPLIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House when the agreement was arrived at, which he says is to last so long as there is occasion for it?

MR. ONSLOW: In connection with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I should like to ask whether the Government consider that the Afghans have advanced out of their own territory as yet; and whether this verbal agreement which the Prime Minister tells us has been come to has also been accepted by the Ameer of Afghanistan?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I should like to put a Question with regard to the very important statement which my right hon. Friend has made—whether the agreement which he mentioned is to be considered a new agreement, or whether it is one which has been supposed to be in force for some time past?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not quite certain what the right hon. Gentleman means by the "agreement which has been supposed to be in force for some time past." But, of course, the agreement is quite distinct from that which is known as the Clarendon-Gortchakoff Agreement, which embraces a much larger geographical range. I think this can be called properly a new Agreement, which has grown up in quite recent Correspondence, out of existing circumstances, and which has reference to the existing state of facts. I am afraid that I was not quite clear in my answer before. No doubt, this Agreement has reference to recent negotiations, and is intended to provide against a disturbance of these negotiations, and to leave a fair and open field for them. I cannot state the precise date of the agreement; but perhaps it is not very material. I certainly could not answer the Question put to me by the hon. Member for Guildford [Mr. Onslow] with regard to the positions taken up by the Afghans, because that would be pronouncing absolutely if I made a declaration upon matters with regard to which it is supposed that negotiations are to be carried on. Of course, I need only say that it is the duty of the Government to claim for the Afghans all the territory to which we think they are justly entitled.

MR. ONSLOW: Has the Ameer of Afghanistan agreed to this present, or new, verbal agreement made by the Government?

[No reply.]

MR. ONSLOW: I will put the Question to-morrow.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I propose on Monday to ask the right hon. Gentleman, who says that the Russian and Afghan Forces have advanced to debatable ground, whether he considers that the positions of Pul-i-Khatun, Zul-ficar, Akrobat, and Pul-i-Khisti, are debatable ground?

MR. GLADSTONE: My expression was "on debatable or debated ground," and not "on debatable" only.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Then I will add the words "or debated ground."

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SUPPLY.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked, Whether the Government would undertake not to bring on the Report of Supply at an hour when it would be impossible to discuss the various Resolutions? He made this request because most important Votes in Supply, including the Vote with respect to General Gordon and the Military and Naval operations in Egypt, had been taken that morning at an hour when they could not possibly be discussed.

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that, hemmed in as the Government were by the conditions of the law, they must be governed by the pleasure of the House in regard to the time when Supply and the Report thereon could be taken.

EGYPT (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN — EXPENSES OF THE INDIAN CONTINGENT.

EXPLANATION.

MR. J. K. CROSS: My hon. Friend the Member for North Derbyshire (Mr. Cheetham) asked me on Monday night—the 9th—with respect to the division between the Indian and the British Exchequers of the charges of the Indian Contingent sent to Suakin, whether any assurances had been received that the employment of Indian troops in the Soudan on the proposed terms met with the approval of the Indian authorities? I replied that Her Majesty's Government had received no protests whatever, and that I thought that if any objections had been entertained in India, Her Majesty's Government would have heard of them. I should mention that on the 9th of February the Viceroy had been informed by telegram of the details of the Force required from India, and had been also informed, in the following words, of the proposed financial arrangement:—

"The British Treasury will defray all additional expense caused to the Indian Treasury by the employment of these troops."

When I answered my hon. Friend on Monday night no objection had been received from the Government of India to the financial arrangements proposed in the telegram which I have just quoted. But on the following morning—Tuesday, 10th of March—we received a despatch, dated February 17, in which the Government of India say that they—"May have imperfectly apprehended the precise nature of the arrangement."

This despatch of February 17 seemed to imply that they were not perfectly satisfied; but, at the same time, in a Circular Order of the 12th of February, which was received by the same mail as the despatch of the 17th of February, they say that—

"The whole of the extra expenditure will, as in the Abyssinian Expedition, be debited to Her Majesty's Imperial Government."

A telegram was, therefore, sent on the 10th instant, explaining the arrangement, which strictly follows the Abyssinian precedent, and asking whether this does not meet their wishes. To this telegram the following reply has been received, which, with the permission of the House, I will read—

"Telegram from the Viceroy, dated Calcutta, March 11, 1885.

"Though your proposal does not altogether coincide with that contained in our financial despatch, No. 53, of February 17, we acquiesce in the arrangements suggested."

I have thought it better to make this statement, lest there should be the slightest misapprehension on the subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed BILL.—[BILL 49.]

(Mr. Gladstone, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Attorney General, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th March.]

[FOURTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

REDISTRIBUTION.

Boroughs.

Clause 3 (Disfranchisement of certain boroughs for corruption).

Mr. SLAGG moved, in page 2, line 3, to leave out the words "each of." The Committee would see that the object of the Amendment, taken in conjunction with an Amendment in the Schedule of which he had given Notice, was to retain the borough of Macclesfield in the list of boroughs returning one Member to Parliament. He was sure the Committee would acquit him, in discharging what he considered to be a duty, of having the slightest sympathy with the corrupt practices which had led to the disfranchisement of Macclesfield. On the contrary, he entertained the greatest possible antipathy to such practices, and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had no warmer admirer than himself (Mr. Slagg) for the efforts he had made, by legislation, to put an end in future to those illegal practices which had formerly prevailed at some elections. Nor was it his intention to rest his case in the slightest measure on a question of degrees of merit or demerit; but he would point out that there were several other towns which were reported by the Commissioners as having been guilty of precisely the same practices for which Macclesfield had incurred such a considerable penalty. His point was this—that, in starting afresh under the Bill, the Government might let bygones be bygones; and when they proposed to retain such cities as Chester, Gloucester, and Oxford, which had been convicted of precisely the same practices, they might extend the same spirit of forgiveness to the town of Macclesfield. He might point out that Oxford and Chester were remarkably happy in having friends at Court, and it would appear that the unfortunate town of Macclesfield had suffered because it was not similarly situated at the critical moment when the present Bill was drawn up. If she had possessed a friend at Court such a fate would never have befallen her. Although he did not for a moment pretend to say that the right hon. Gentlemen who had sat for those boroughs were in any way implicated in the corrupt practices of which the constituencies had been found guilty, yet he was sure that if Macclesfield had been so fortunate as to have had similar advocacy, it would not have been in its present position. But it had had no such friend, and, consequently, an exceptional fate had overtaken it. He made this claim not because Macclesfield was the best or the worst, as to corruption, but because, by the character of its population, the nature of its trade, and its growing importance, it had a right to a separate representation even more than Oxford, Gloucester, or Chester. The other boroughs he had just classed with Macclesfield, though of considerable importance, had not the large commercial importance possessed by Macclesfield. Now, in principle, he believed they had been accustomed in this country to base the representation, in a large degree, on commercial interests, and Macclesfield certainly occupied an important position commercially. As hon. Members knew, it was the ancient seat of the silk trade of the country; in fact, he might say that, at the present moment, it was the only great centre of the silk trade. In times past it had made large sacrifices in the public and general interests by being placed in competition with France under the Commercial Treaty of 1860. But with great industry and enterprise, with wonderful perseverance and resource, her manufacturers had set themselves to work to improve their position, and now it was the stronghold of the silk trade, and one of the most important manufacturing centres in the country. It possessed a technical school, grammar school, a high school, a free library, together with other valuable educational institutions, and the means it posessed for improving the condition of the people were highly efficient, and upon a very liberal scale. He, therefore, respectfully submitted to his right hon. Friend that all these matters should receive full weight before he determined to leave out this city from the list of fully represented towns, and extended his consideration to other and less important places. He regarded it as very hard that a thriving town of this sort was to be gibbeted for all coming generations in the way that was now proposed by the Government, and handed down to perpetual reprobation, owing to the fault of a certain number of voters in the past, who, in the natural course of events, would soon pass away. Since the schedule of voters was first made in the case of Macclesfield, he was told that no less than 1,500 were dead, or had disappeared from the locality. In the course of time all the rest would disappear. Surely the Government had no wish in this Bill to punish the town. They might be satisfied with expressing their virtuous indignation, and disfranchising the persons who had been guilty of corrupt and illegal practices. He considered that it was wrong to make Macclesfield for ever a martyr, and to place it under a stigma, because a certain number of voters had committed themselves in the past. Of course, he would be told that all these matters had been fixed and settled; but although the two Front Benches had agreed to exterminate Macclesfield, he could assure hon. Members that the people of Macclesfield had not so agreed, and they were exceedingly indignant, and very justly so, at the manner in which they had been disposed of under the Bill. This was not a Party question in the slightest degree, and he very earnestly begged hon. Members to understand that he did not urge this point on behalf of Macclesfield because it was likely to return a politician of either one complexion or the other. It was a very remarkable fact that the whole community on both sides of politics had come forward to press this proposition on the attention of the House and of the Government. He hoped that what he had said would induce his right hon. Friend to modify his virtuous indignation. He quite approved of the efforts of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in trying in every quarter to obliterate corrupt and illegal practices; but he thought that in selecting Macclesfield as a scapegoat, and making her a terrible example, the Government were going a little too far. Hon. Members, he felt assured, would agree with him that there was no reason whatever why Macclesfield should be singled out for exceptional treatment, when other boroughs which had been found guilty of precisely the same practices were allowed to go free—to say nothing of other boroughs which were as bad, or worse, but in which the corrupt practices had not been found out. He made a strong appeal to his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to be merciful while there was yet time, and to restore Macclesfield to the position her high general character, her great commercial importance, and the enterprize of her people certainly entitled her to. He begged to move the Amendment which appeared on the Paper in his name.

Mr. Slagg

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, to leave out the words "each of."—(Mr. Slagg.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the Committee fully appreciated the tone of his hon. Friend, and the very temperate manner in which his hon. Friend had placed his views before the Committee entitled those views to the fullest consideration. The hon. Member inferred that favour had been shown to other constituencies—the cities of Oxford and Chester—on account of the connection of two of his right hon. Friends with those cities; but the hon. Member would remember that his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was defeated at Oxford, was driven away from the representation, and was succeeded by a Conservative, and, therefore, it was not likely that he would have much affection for the city which had thus treated him. The case was almost similar at Chester, seeing that his right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Dodson), who formerly represented the city, had ceased to be its Member; and he could say most positively that in the course taken both in regard to Oxford and Chester no such interest as had been suggested had been brought to bear upon the matter, nor had any such considerations been allowed to influence the Government as to the boroughs which were to be punished. Other considerations altogether had been brought to bear. His hon. Friend talked of "gibbetting" a constituency for all time; but Parliament had not shrunk in former times from disfranchising boroughs for similar offences. He would remind his hon. Friend of the cases of Sudbury, St. Alban's, Totnes, Bridgwater, Beverley, and Lancaster, in each of which the right to return Representatives had been extinguished on the ground of corrupt practices. What were the Government now doing in the case of Macclesfield? Macclesfield retained its representation, and that representation was quite adequate. Under this Bill one of the divisions of Cheshire was to be the Macclesfield division, and instead of allowing it to remain a borough with a population of 37,000, all they had done was to add Congleton to Macclesfield, and the only result was that the Macclesfield division would now have a population of 54,000 instead of 37,000. Therefore, instead of punishing Macclesfield as they had punished other boroughs for offences far less than those committed by Macclesfield, the representation of the town was not extinguished at all, but the town itself was allowed to remain the seat of a largely increased constituency by simply adding the town of Congleton to it. All the punishment awarded to it was to retain it on the list of county divisions returning a Member, with an addition to the area of representation. He would not trouble the Committee with all the details of the corrupt practices which were proved to exist in Macclesfield, and which led to its disfranchisement after the last General Election, nor would he enter into any speculation as to the degree of corruption that was necessary to justify the disfranchisement of a constituency. He would simply point out what was found by the Commissioners in the case of Macclesfield. In the first place, it was found that every election which had taken place in the town of Macclesfield, as far as the facts were known, since 1832, had been corrupt. He believed the statement had been circulated that there was one pure election. No doubt, the Commissioners went back into the history of the borough until they found a pure election, and they ascertained that there was a pure election in 1859, which stopped their retrospective inquiry; but it was pure, simply because it was uncontested. This was what the Commissioners reported in regard to the election of 1865—

"Corrupt practices did extensively prevail in Macclesfield."

and the Reports in reference to the General Elections of 1868, 1874, and 1880, were in precisely similar words. And as to the corruption itself, what was the Report of the Commissioners? 5,364 persons voted in 1880, and one of the witnesses who knew Macclesfield very well estimated that of that number more than 4,000 were corrupt. The Commissioners, who, of course, were unable to discover all the bribery that took place, actually did discover and schedule the names of 2,872 persons—out of the 5,364 who voted—as having either given or taken bribes. That represented 53 per cent, or more than one-half of those who voted, as having been absolutely bribed, and some of them, it appeared, were bribed on both sides. In addition, there were many minor cases of giving and receiving tickets which were in reality bribes given for the vote. With the exception of Sandwich, where 60 per cent of the persons who voted were reported to have been bribed, Macclesfield appeared to be the most corrupt constituency in England. Gloucester, no doubt, closely approached it, 45 per cent of the voters having been scheduled; and it must be remembered that in the first Bill introduced in reference to the corrupt boroughs, Gloucester was included. If, however, one offender had escaped, that could be no reason why another which richly deserved punishment should be passed over. He challenged his hon. Friend to find, in the case of Lancaster, Beverley, Bridgwater, or Totnes, which had ceased to return Members, any evidence of corruption worse than that of Macclesfield, which had been corrupt at every election. An hon. MEMBER: Sandwich. No doubt, Sandwich was a very bad case, and Sandwich would be disfranchised; but if they looked at the extent of the corruption, and the length of time over which it had been spread, there had been no case in England as bad as this. The corruption went on openly. It was not a matter of politics. Both the agents arranged it without the least secrecy. Five magistrates and 31 members of the Town Council had been scheduled, and several persons who were scheduled by the Commissioners had since been elected members of the Town Council. The bribery at Macclesfield was always so openly and extensively carried on that, as he had said, at one single election no less than five magistrates and 31 members of the Town Council were parties to it. Some of the witnesses complained that they only obtained 12s. a-day from one side, and 6s. from the other. The Commissioners said, in their Report—

“Your Commissioners were much struck by one feature of the corruption which prevailed at the last election—namely, the open, fearless, and confiding manner in which it was practised on both sides. No recourse was had to any of the ordinary contrivances by which elsewhere such practices are attempted to be hidden; the ‘man in the moon,’ and his methods of procedure, were alike unknown at Macclesfield. Not the slightest anxiety appears to have been evinced or precaution taken by either party to conceal its doings from the other, and the number of subordinate agents employed for the purpose of bribing was of surprising and quite exceptional magnitude, and everybody was deemed adequate to the work; neither position, age, character, nor discretion being held requisite. The fortunes of the candidates were without hesitation or misgiving, and without any guarantee of political fidelity, placed in the hands of hundreds of the poorest and most ignorant classes—in the hands of girls, and even of children; whilst the devolution of authority was clearly traceable from the highest official to the lowest subordinate, so that no difficulty could be experienced in fixing the candidate with liability for the acts of his many hundred agents.”

Such unblushing corruption could not be overlooked by the House; and he did hope that the Committee, while wishing to forget the past, would not shrink from inflicting fair and just punishment. They must also bear in mind that if they accepted this Amendment they would have to look about and see where a Member was to be found for Macclesfield; and it would be a strong course to adopt to take a Member from a town which by this Bill was entitled to representation and give it to such a town as Macclesfield.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) that it would be desirable to restore the Member for Macclesfield. But as this was the first of the clauses where the question of continuing the disfranchisement of these boroughs arose, it would be interesting to give the history of the Commissions that had been held. In giving that history he would be as brief as possible; but he wished to show the Committee to what extent the Bill dealt with the disfranchised and scheduled voters.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that this clause did not deal with the scheduled voters, and upon that point he should have a proposal to make to the Committee.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL said, that under those circumstances he would not proceed further with the case of scheduled voters; but he ventured to remind the Committee very briefly of the way in which the question stood. In 1866 Commissions were sent down to Lancaster, Totnes, Reigate, and Great Yarmouth. He was himself one of the Commissioners at Lancaster, and he was able to say that the corruption there was scarcely less extensive than it was subsequently proved to have been in Macclesfield. In 1867 the boroughs of Lancaster, Totnes, Reigate, and Great Yarmouth were all disfranchised. The next step taken was to send down Commissioners to Beverley, Bridgwater, Cashel, and Sligo in 1870. Disfranchisement followed in the case of those four boroughs; and not only were the boroughs disfranchised, but certain persons were personally scheduled. In 1875 the same course was adopted of sending down Commissions to Boston and Norwich. The Writ for Norwich was suspended until the end of the Parliament, and Boston was disfranchised for seven years; so that those two boroughs had a less amount of punishment inflicted upon them than either of the other boroughs he had mentioned. In 1880 Commissions were sent down to Boston, Canterbury, Chester, Gloucester, Macclesfield, Oxford, and Sandwich; and in 1881 those places were so far disfranchised that the issue of new Writs was suspended until after the meeting of Parliament in 1882. By a Bill introduced in 1882 that suspension was renewed until 1883; in 1883 it was carried forward until 1884; and last year it was continued down to the present time. But the present Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill proposed to give a seat to each of those boroughs with the exception of Macclesfield. [An hon. MEMBER: And Sandwich.] As the population of Sandwich was below the number necessary to return a Member, there was nothing to be said in regard to it. Clause 27 of the Bill, which dealt with the voters who had been scheduled by the Bribery Commissioners, continued the disfranchisement of those voters, and also applied to them Section 39 of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of 1883. The question raised by the Amendment had reference only to the borough of Macclesfield, and he agreed with what had fallen from the Attorney General that Macclesfield was no worse off now than it would be if the proposal of the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) were adopted. It was proposed to add to Macclesfield another town with a cognate industry—namely, Congleton, and a few adjoining parishes, and practically Macclesfield, with Congleton, would have its Member again. He had intended to avail himself of this opportunity for saying a word with regard to the disfranchised voters; but he acceded to the suggestion of the Attorney General that there was a distinction to be drawn between the voters and the boroughs. He had, however, an Amendment on this very clause with regard to Macclesfield, and he would explain what the course was which he ventured to suggest, in the hope that his hon. and learned Friend might adopt it. He agreed with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) that it was not desirable to continue this gibbetting by name of the corrupt boroughs and voters. As they had already passed a new Franchise Act, and a new Act dealing with corrupt practices, and were to have a redistribution of seats, he thought, if they could, it would be as well to wipe out all previous legislation on this point. His proposal was to leave out Clause 3, and as the effect of this would be to leave Macclesfield and Sandwich as boroughs, he would suggest that they should place those boroughs, without saying why or wherefore, in the list of boroughs no longer to return a Member. They would then be in the Schedule with Beverley, Bridgwater, Sligo, and Oasbel, and the whole of them would cease to be any longer entitled to return a Member. He ventured to suggest that course to the Attorney General as a medium course which they might follow. He thought that plan would be far better than to gibbet Macclesfield and Sandwich with the stigma of having been disfranchised for corrupt practices.

MR. RYLANDS said, he did not at all agree with the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), although he entirely concurred with him that when they reached the 27th clause it would be desirable to consider the propriety of continuing the disfranchisement of voters by name who had already been scheduled by past Commissions. He supported Her Majesty's Government in the course they proposed to take in regard to Macclesfield. He thought that Macclesfield had been very fairly dealt with. So far from being extinguished, the town would remain an important centre of representation in association with another important town, and it would form a very important section of the county of Chester. Under these circumstances, he did not think the people of Macclesfield had any right to complain, because, although they were not included as a borough, they would still return a Member and continue to have separate representation. He did not think that the town of Macclesfield was entitled to make any further demand, and, therefore, if his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) divided the Committee, he should certainly vote with the Government against the proposition of his hon. Friend.

SIR EARLELEY WILMOT asked if the corrupt voters of Macclesfield, about whom so much virtuous indignation had been expressed, were to be whitewashed in order that they might form part of the voters of the new Macclesfield electoral division? He understood that Macclesfield was to receive, on losing its power of separate representation, the advantage of being created an electoral division in conjunction with another town. He wished to know whether the voters already disfranchised were to be restored to the regular list?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES, said, that would depend entirely upon the course the Committee would be prepared to take when they came to the consideration of a future clause.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. AGNEW supported the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg). He thought that in this matter Macclesfield was being made a scapegoat. He saw no material difference in the case of Macclesfield and the state of things which was found to exist at the last Election at Oxford, Chester, Gloucester, and other towns. He was of opinion that Macclesfield had been sufficiently punished already. The Committee ought to know that the ratepayers of Macclesfield had been called upon to pay a sum of £5,000 or £6,000 as the cost of the election inquiry. They had also suffered a grievous disability in being unrepresented in the present Parliament. At the last Census the town of Macclesfield had a population of 37,000, and the trading population of so large a town was, he thought, fairly entitled at least, having regard to the circumstances of the case, to be represented by one Member. The Committee was doubtless aware that since 1832, up to the present time, Macclesfield had been entitled to return two Members, and it was not too much to ask that the large working-class population of so important a town should not be altogether disfranchised. He had not a word to say in extenuation of the evil deeds that might have attended the General Election; but he thought that it was a serious thing to disfranchise the population of such an important constituency—the centre, as his hon. Friend had pointed out, of a great and growing industry. It was an industry that was rapidly reviving. In the last decade the population of Macclesfield had increased by 2,000, while the rateable value of property in the town had increased to the extent of £16,000 or £17,000. Certainly, then, it was a hardship that a stigma should be imposed by this Bill upon a town, which, if at one time peccant, was now repentant. He knew from experience that Macclesfield had borne the disgrace which followed the election inquiry with great humility. His hon. Friend had referred to the fact that at least 1,500 of the scheduled voters were now non-resident at Macclesfield. Their places had been taken by others, and he had not understood the hon. and learned Attorney General to say that the whole constituency was corrupt. Surely a leaven of righteousness was left in it; and he would appeal to the Members for Cheshire, most of whom sat on the Benches opposite, to support his hon. Friend, if he carried his Amendment to a division. He was afraid that the disfranchisement of Macclesfield, as a Parliamentary borough, which would be the effect of the Bill, would go far to crush out the public life of the town. He very much disputed the assertion of the hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill) that Macclesfield would be better off in consequence of being joined to Congleton—a town 10 or 12 miles distant. At any rate, the people of Macclesfield did not think so, nor did they regard it as other than a poor solatium for disfranchisement that the name of Macclesfield was to be given to the new Parliamentary division of Cheshire. If his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) went to a division, he would certainly support him.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his hon. Friend who had just addressed the Committee had urged, in favour of Macclesfield, that it was not worse than certain other boroughs; but surely that was rather a reason for including those other boroughs, than for excluding Macclesfield? The case against Macclesfield was a strong one, and ought only to be considered upon its own merits. It must be borne in mind that the representation of Macclesfield would not be got rid of altogether, but that hereafter it would, in conjunction with Congleton and an extended district, return one Member. That was a remedy which had already been applied in other cases—such as East Retford and Chippenham—where the districts had been enlarged, and the representation made to include other places; and he thought the result of Macclesfield ceasing to have a separate representation would be calculated rather to improve, than to injure, the public life of a town where no less than five magistrates and 31 members of the Town Council had been scheduled for bribery. It would become the centre of an industrial community, and would not be merged in an agricultural district. The new district proposed to be created was mainly an urban district, and Congleton would have reason to complain of being thrown into a rural district if the separate representation of Macclesfield were preserved. If they were to destroy the new county district of Macclesfield, and give to Macclesfield one of its two Members, they would then have to deprive Congleton and other manufacturing places of a representation which it would be very difficult indeed to provide by any other means. In any re-arrangement of the county representation, the difficulty, he thought, would be insuperable; and, in fact, it would become necessary to alter three divisions of the county of Chester if the Amendment were passed. In addition to which Congleton would be thrown into an agricultural district, and most likely the agricultural interests would be swamped by the addition. There was no county which had given the Commissioners more trouble than Cheshire, and he thought it had been very satisfactorily dealt with. It would be a great pity to throw into confusion the whole of the arrangements of the county, as the Amendment would do. If Macclesfield was retained as a borough, all the arrangements of the Boundary Commissioners would be upset; and he certainly did not think that his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had made out a case for such a change.

The Attorney General

Mr. WARTON said, he thought this proposal of the Government placed their conduct in a very peculiar light. It seemed to him that the whole proceedings of the Government, with respect to disfranchisement for corrupt practices, had been characterized by reckless inconsistency. Some time ago the Government proposed to disfranchise three boroughs—Sandwich, Macclesfield, and Gloucester; and it was a singular fact that the Government should have included Gloucester at one time, and excluded it from disfranchisement at another. He thought it would be necessary to ascertain the reason why Gloucester was to be spared. The Attorney General told them, or rather had inferred, that one way of arriving at the guilt of a borough was to take the percentage of voters who had been bribed. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that 60 per cent of the voters of Sandwich, and 63 per cent of those of Macclesfield, had been scheduled for bribery; and it was further stated that the percentage in Gloucester amounted to 50 per cent. These figures, however, were open to doubt, because they ought, to a certain extent, to look at the nature and degree of the bribery; and if they did so, he was inclined to think that a very large proportion of the bribery at Macclesfield was not of a very heavy character. It was a sort of one shilling and half-a-crown bribery, although, no doubt, it was carried on upon an extensive scale. It was not, however, to be compared with the enormous sums paid in bribes in the borough of Bridgwater. He had no desire to defend Macclesfield, but he was only anxious to show how little faith they could have in the consistency of the Government when they bore in mind their changed ideas in regard to the question whether Gloucester should be disfranchised or not. He did not for a moment say that Gloucester ought to have been disfranchised. He was glad that it was spared, if only for the sake of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Monk), who was such a constant attendant upon the deliberations of the House. He could not agree with the hon. Member for South-East Lancashire (Mr. Agnew) that any repentance on the part of Macclesfield was to be taken into consideration. The hon. Member confounded repentance with remorse. He recollected the case of a very distinguished man, who was found guilty of having received a bribe, and who went out at once and hanged himself. That was a very different kind of repentance from that displayed by Macclesfield, who, when she was found guilty of bribery, never dreamt of committing suicide.

Mr. W. H. JAMES said, that if they were to judge from the Election Commissions of 1840 and 1881, the measures which the House had adopted against bribery in the case of Totnes, Beverley, Bridgwater, and Great Yarmouth had not been altogether successful. It was perfectly certain that they would never do anything against bribery by punishing the small people, such as the poor voters and humble solicitors. What they wanted to get at was those who supplied the money. Until they did that, the existence of corrupt practices would not be got rid of.

Mr. LEWIS said, it was well to deal with relative cases of bribery and corruption as an element of the extent of punishment to be meted out. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had referred to the cases of Oxford and Chester, and he (Mr. Lewis) thought it was desirable to remind the Committee of the extraordinary circumstances which attended those cases, and which certainly told against any exceptional treatment of Macclesfield. They were told, in the Report of the Macclesfield Commissioners, that the total amount of expenditure was some £5,000 or £6,000; but what was the case with regard to Oxford? He left out all consideration whatever of the bribery that was proved to have taken place at the General Election, and he would only deal with that which occurred at the bye-election in the month of May on the acceptance of Office by the Home Secretary. In that case, in an election which lasted only a week, the expenses amounted to no less than £9,000. At Macclesfield the occasion was the General Election, and the cost was £5,000 or £6,000 for a contest which extended for a month or five weeks, whereas at Oxford an election, which was spread over eight days at the outside, cost £9,000. The constituency of Oxford was within 100 or 200 of that of Macclesfield, being about 5,000 or 6,000 in each case. And what was the case with regard to Chester? In that contest he also found that £9,000 were reported to have been spent. It did appear to him then that, under such circumstances, it was somewhat inconsistent to complain of the town of Macclesfield, and to compel her to become part of a new county division, and to permit Oxford and Chester to retain their representation. As to the stigma cast upon a town by the names of persons being scheduled in an Act of Parliament, that course was not taken because the town was exceptionally guilty, but because the inquiry of a Commission showed that a large portion of the constituency had been bribed. He did not think it was necessary for the Attorney General to repel the suggestion of outside influence in the cases of Oxford and Chester; but when the hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Home Secretary had no reason for giving his benediction to the City of Oxford, seeing that he had been defeated, that was just what he did. After the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been defeated, he addressed the people from one of the hotel windows, and blessed them in the most unutterable way that a great orator, such as the right hon. and learned Gentleman, was quite able to do. This may have been the way in which his benediction and blessing had been carried out. Certainly, no preponderating case had been made out to justify the House in attaching a stigma to Macclesfield. The Attorney General had referred to the cases of Totnes, Bridgwater, and Beverley, and had spoken of those towns as having been treated with severity; but in Totnes and Bridgwater the bribery was not limited to 2s. 6d., but almost every trader in the town received as much as £10 or £20 for his vote at the election. To compare such places with Macclesfield, where a voter got a ticket which was the remnant of an old system of corruption, and where the expenditure only reached £6,000, was really absurd. It seemed to him that the Committee were placed in an exceptional difficulty in this case. If it had been merely a question of representation, he did not think that Macclesfield would have much to complain of. He recollected, however, the eagerness displayed in some parts of the House to put a whitewashing clause into the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, which passed a year or two ago, and he recollected that such clause was put in to prevent an inquiry being made into any case that had occurred in times past. He thought, therefore, that that clause ought to operate by analogy in the case of Macclesfield. It was not necessary to say anything of the case of Sandwich, where the bribery was of a very different character from that committed in Macclesfield. He thought the balance of convenience and propriety would be to make an exception in this case; and if the Motion went to a division, he should vote in favour of the excision of Macclesfield from the Schedule. He should do so simply on the ground that it was rather a hard thing that the first time that a Petition had been prosecuted against Macclesfield, and having regard to the other offenders let off, that an odious exception should be made against her.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS remarked, that if it had not been for an observation that fell from the last speaker, he would not have troubled the Committee; but reference had been made to the amount of money spent at the Macclesfield Election and the cost of the Oxford Election. It was pretty well known by those who had inquired into the details of the case in connection with the Oxford Bribery Commission, that comparatively little money went into the hands of the electors. The Commissioners sat for a long time, and took evidence in the slovenly way in which such Commissioners generally did take evidence, giving every facility for the larger culprits to escape. The principal culprits were attorneys, and not the voters themselves; and one particular attorney in that town, who had received large sums of money in order to save himself, inveigled other persons into the net and succeeded in escaping. That individual came forward before the Commissioners and confessed to having received large sums of money about which he gave no account beyond the fact that he had burnt his papers. He got off as attorneys generally managed to get off, and he still remained a Clerk of the Peace for the Division, although he certainly ought to have been disqualified from holding public appointments ever afterwards.

Mr. Lewis

Mr. RAIKES said, he thought that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had not chosen the most convenient way of bringing forward his Amendment. It would have been better to have dealt with the case of Macclesfield by itself when they came to the Schedules. He would ask the hon. Member not to press his Amendment on this occasion, but rather to take the opportunity, when they came to the Schedules, of seeing whether they could not deal with this particular borough. Macclesfield, in any case, would not have much to complain of, because in the position it was to occupy in the future it would be able to give full play to its elective force. By the addition of Congleton, the whole of the particular industry in which Macclesfield was engaged would be included in the representation. At the same time, he thought that more had been made of the electoral offences of Macclesfield than was necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General told them that the bulk of the constituencies had been scheduled for corrupt practices. No doubt, that was so; but he agreed with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) that the quality of the corruption, although the quantity was very considerable, had not been by any means of such a flagrant character as that which marked the delinquencies of other boroughs which had been the subject of inquiry by a Royal Commission. Therefore, there was a certain amount of unfairness apparent in treating small bribes, which were almost regarded by the voters as a slight honorarium for going to the poll, in the same way as the payment of bribes of £5 and upwards for voting in a particular way was punished. Macclesfield was rather harshly treated in being exposed to stigma in this peculiar way; and he should be disposed, when they came to the Schedules, to move the substitution of the name of Boston for that of Macclesfield. Boston was, in his humble opinion, far more deserving of stigma than Macclesfield; and he thought, when the proper time came, he should be able to make out a good case for putting Boston in the Schedule, and leaving Macclesfield out of it. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) not to press the Amendment on the present occasion, but to leave it open, so that the question might be raised on the Schedules, and dealt with in a more convenient and satisfactory manner.

Mr. SLAGG said, he very much regretted that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had taken the line of instituting comparisons; for they were aware that comparisons were odious in nearly all cases, and he thought they were particularly so in this instance. The line of argument taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman was one he had very carefully avoided, as he had not sought to go into the general question of the relative corruption of different boroughs in which improper practices had been reported by the Commissioners as having extensively prevailed. Had he done so, he fully believed he could have made out quite as bad a case in some of the other boroughs as that of Macclesfield. But he could not leave this part of the question without pointing out that the bribery which had taken place in the borough of Oxford was enormous, and far transceeding anything that had occurred at Macclesfield; and that all the hon. and learned Gentleman had gained by making the comparisons he had instituted was that he had shown that, whereas bribery was very extensive in some other boroughs, as far as the sums paid were concerned, in Macclesfield pretty nearly all that could be said as to the quality of the bribery was that it was open and above-board. He was very sorry his hon. and learned Friend would not accept his Amendment; but as he had taken that course, it seemed hopeless to press it upon the Committee. He should, therefore, ask leave to withdraw the Amendment, in order to raise it afterwards in another form.

[Fourth Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WARTON moved to omit, in page 2, line 4, after the word "cease," the words "to be entitled." The clause now under consideration provided that the boroughs to which it referred should cease to be entitled to return any Member. He could not see what was the use of the words "to be entitled." It was quite enough to say "should cease to return any Member." He contended that the words he proposed to omit were mere surplusage, and ought to be struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that at the present moment Macclesfield did not return any Members; but, at the same time, it was entitled to do so.

Mr. WARTON said, Macclesfield did at the present moment, in a certain sense, return Members; but the Government had chosen, year after year, to suspend the issue of the Writs, and, therefore, in the sense in which he put it, Macclesfield might be said to return Members at the present time. Macclesfield was in the list of boroughs which returned Members to that House, and it was quite possible for any Member to move that Writs should be sent to Macclesfield by the Clerk of the Crown requiring the borough to proceed to an election. It so happened that by an Act of Parliament, passed last year, the Speaker was required not to issue his Writs during the Vacation; but the time had expired at the meeting of the present Parliament, and the position in which Macclesfield now stood was that it had all its former right to return two Members—a right which it had acquired when Parliament re-assembled on the 19th of last month. Under these circumstances, he felt he ought to press his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 4, after the word "cease," to leave out the words "to be entitled."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Amendment negatived.

Mr. GILES moved to leave out the clause. He said his object in moving this Amendment was that a Member should be given to Macclesfield. He was afraid that the discussion that had taken place on the previous Amendment had very much taken the wind out of his sails; but, in asking the Committee to accept his Amendment, he contended that its adoption would not affect the general principle of the Bill. The only way in which the Bill would be affected by it would be that in future Macclesfield would be entitled to return one Member; and he could not see that any difficulty would be created if the Amendment were adopted. Macclesfield was a very important town, and the centre of a large industry, and it was proposed by this clause that it should be treated in a very harsh manner. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had stated that Macclesfield would be rather benefited than otherwise by the arrangement in the Bill; and he (Mr. Giles) would say that if that were the case, the stigma now attached to the town should be taken away, and the borough at once removed from the operation of the intended Penal Clause. He submitted that the principle embodied in this clause was a new departure from everything they had had before, and when they talked of corrupt practices, and of Macclesfield being worse than any other borough, he should like to ask hon. Members whether they were not perfectly well aware that in old times there were certain parties in almost every borough who looked to a General Election as a periodical harvest? They had votes which they wanted to sell, and somebody else had money and wanted to buy. All that, however, was at an end; and when they talked of punishing the borough of Macclesfield they should remember that if they were to punish the 53 per cent of voters, who, as the right hon. Gentleman had said, were corrupt, they would also be punishing 47 per cent of innocent persons. He did not think that that was a fair principle to proceed upon. He held that it was no argument to say Macclesfield should be deprived of its representation because of its being once corrupt. The question was, would the Bill admit of Macclesfield having a Member? If it did, he contended that they should give it a representation, and let it start with a clean sheet. Let them condone the past, and say, "Let bygones be bygones," because in the future the community would be sufficiently protected by the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act against corruption at General Elections. If hon. Members looked at Clauses 4, 5, 6, 10 and 21 of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, they would see that the punishment for transgressions of the law were something frightful, varying from penalties of £100 to £200, from disqualification for seven years to disqualification for ever, and imprisonment of from one to two years, with hard labour. That, he thought, would be considered quite sufficient punishment for indulgence in corrupt practices; but there was one clause in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act—Clause 49—which, he thought, went a long way to show that Clause 3 of the present Bill ought not to be there. Clause 49 of that Act said—

Mr. Slagg

"Notwithstanding the provisions of the Act 16 & 16 Vict. c. 87, or any amendment thereof, in any case where, after the passing of this Act, any Commissioners have been appointed, in a joint Address of both Houses of Parliament, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices in any election, the said Commissioners shall not make inquiries concerning any election that shall have taken place prior to the passing of this Act, and no witness called before such Commissioners or at any election petition after the passing of this Act shall be asked or bound to answer any question for the purpose of proving the commission of any corrupt practice at or in relation to any election prior to the passing of this Act."

The Prime Minister had said the other night, in the discussion which took place on the question of University Representation, that this Bill might fairly be said to exclude everything of the nature of disfranchisement. He should like to call the attention of the Attorney General to that statement, for, after quoting this opinion on the part of the Prime Minister, he submitted that he had proved his case. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would agree to accept his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the Clause.—(Mr. Giles.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the clause had no disfranchising effect whatever, and no man would lose his vote by it.

MR. GILES said, Part III. of Schedule 1, referred to in the clause, had a disfranchising effect.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, a certain number of persons gained by the clause, but no one lost his vote by it. It was not like the case of disfranchising a borough, where the electors lost their votes. Now, the people residing in the borough would go into the county and retain the same vote they had had before.

MR. GILES desired to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the latter part of the clause, which said—

"After the passing of this Act each of the Parliamentary boroughs named in the third part of the First Schedule to this Act shall cease to be entitled to return any Member."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that was so; but there was no disfranchisement of the people implied. They would all keep their votes; but, instead of voting for the borough of Macclesfield, they would vote for the Macclesfield division of the county of Chester. With regard to what had been said about Sandwich, the population there was only 2,800—it was a mere village. The population of Deal and Walmer was larger. The question of the population of Macclesfield had been fully discussed, and he need not go further into it.

MR. STAVELEY HILL suggested that it would be as well to wipe out the 3rd clause of the Bill and the 3rd part of the First Schedule, and insert the two words "Macclesfield" and "Sandwich" in the 1st part of the First Schedule.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he found the words "as boroughs" in the 2nd clause, while in the 3rd clause

[Fourth Night]

they were left out. He would suggest whether, as they were thought necessary in Clause 2, they were not also necessary in Clause 3? He thought that the safest course was to retain the words in Clause 2, and to insert them in Clause 3, as that would not only make the two enactments consistent, but would also prevent any doubt as to the meaning.

MR. TOMLINSON pointed out that the number of inhabitants was not specified in the first part of the 1st Schedule as the reason for the disfranchisement of the boroughs named in it. He therefore thought it was unjust and invidious to single out two towns for penal disfranchisement, when they were really not worse than others which had smaller populations, and might have been included with the small boroughs in the first part of the Schedule.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he could not understand why the words "as boroughs" should be inserted in the previous clause.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) was, perhaps, right in the suggestion he had made, that the words "as boroughs" were not necessary.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, if his hon. Friend (Mr. Giles) pressed his Amendment to a division, he should vote for it. He thought it would be most unfair to single out these two boroughs for exceptional punishment, when there were many others that were in a far worse position. They had been told that the voters of Macclesfield would not lose their votes, but that when the town ceased to be a Parliamentary borough the electors would be merged among the county voters in the Macclesfield division, and have the same rights as they now possessed; but he would ask why, if the Macclesfield voters were as corrupt as they were said to be, they should be restored to their position as electors in a county division? No doubt, there were certain parties who would be very glad to see the 30,000 or 40,000 inhabited-householders of Macclesfield merged in the county of Chester; but he thought the clause a very unfair one. In fact, the more he looked at the details and particulars of this Bill, the more he thought those on his side of the House had reason to complain of it.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

On a matter of this kind he cared very little about one Party or the other; but he did think that an important measure like this, which was intended to alter the entire representation of the country, ought to be fair and just, and that the infliction of the stigma and disgrace on the two particular boroughs that had been singled out from among a number of others that were admittedly quite as corrupt reflected no credit whatever on the framers of the Bill. He should certainly vote for the Amendment if a division were taken upon it.

MR. BIGGAR said, he hoped the Government would stick to the clause. The two boroughs of Macclesfield and Sandwich were, perhaps, no worse than many others, but they had been found out and must pay the penalty. For his own part, he thought it quite right that the House of Commons should mark its sense of the misconduct of those boroughs in the manner proposed. As had already been stated, the electors belonging to the two boroughs would not thereby lose their status as voters, because they would become absorbed in the county divisions in which the boroughs were situated. If the clause were agreed to, the effect would, he thought, be that each of the boroughs affected by it would be very much in the same position as a vicious horse that was put along with three steady animals in a four-horse coach—it would be forced to go straight, whether it liked it or not—for there would not be so much inducement to go wrong when the two boroughs were merged in large constituencies as there had been before. He therefore thought it most desirable that the Committee should pass the clause. In his opinion, if even-handed justice were meted out to those boroughs, the electors would even be allowed the opportunity of voting for the county divisions into which they would be taken; but, regarding the proposal of the Government in the light of a compromise, he thought they were very liberally dealt with, and that they had no reason to raise any complaint against the clause.

MR. WARTON said, he was inclined to agree with the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) in regard to the point he had raised, and to think that, instead of inserting the words "as boroughs" in Clause 3, it would be better to strike them out of Clause 2 on the Report. He also agreed with the hon. and learned Member below him Mr. Staveley Hill, that it would be far less invidious to put the names of the two boroughs under discussion into the 1st Schedule, because, although they all had their minds full of figures on this subject, there was no occasion to make any particular reference to them, and no reason why they should state in the Schedule why this or that borough ceased to return Members. It might be because a borough had too small a population, or it might be because it had sinned; but, whatever the ground, there was no reason why it should be stated in the Schedule. He hoped those who agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Giles) would give him their support.

MR. H. TOLLEMACHE said, he hoped the Government would accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for West Staffordshire (Mr. Staveley Hill), and insert Macclesfield and Sandwich in the first part of the 1st Schedule. If they simply voted to leave out the 3rd clause, there would be this great difficulty, that the large populations outside the limits of the Parliamentary boroughs of Macclesfield and Sandwich would have to be absorbed in the neighbouring constituencies, and in the case of Macclesfield the number that would have to be thus provided for would be about 18,000. In the case of Sandwich the number of people thus absorbed would be no less than about 38,000. He should not feel justified in voting for the omission of the 3rd clause, unless the Committee had a statement from the Attorney General or some other Member of the Government, to the effect that they were willing to allow the two boroughs, Macclesfield and Sandwich, to appear in the first portion of the 1st Schedule.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 153; Noes 31: Majority 122.—Div. List, No. 52.)

Clause 4 Boroughs to have numbers of Members reduced).

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he wished to move an Amendment, in page 2, line 6, to leave out the words "the City of London shall return two Members and no more, and." He would ask the indulgence of the Committee in moving this Amendment, for he felt how unworthy he was to fill a seat which in former days had been filled by most distinguished men—he felt how unworthy he was on the present occasion to discharge the painful duty of pleading for the Parliamentary life of that great constituency which had done him the honour of sending him to that House. It was proposed by the present scheme to do away with the privilege which the City of London had enjoyed for more than 550 years. He wished to put before the Committee reasons why he thought no case could be made out for doing away with the great privilege which this, the first City in the Empire, really the first City in the world, had so long enjoyed. He knew that the argument which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would use would be the population of the City; but he (Mr. Fowler) wished to represent to the Committee that the number of electors was a much more important point in connection with a constituency than the number of people who slept within its limits. With regard to the City of London the registered number of electors was 26,636, of whom nearly 20,000 were ratepayers, and about 7,000 Liverymen. No doubt, they would hear complaints made against the right of the Liverymen to vote; but he would remind the Committee that the Livery of the City of London included many of the greatest men in this country. He saw opposite to him his hon. Colleague, and his hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. R. Biddulph Martin), who were his opponents at the last Election, and who had been supported by a great many distinguished men on the other side of the House. The First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone) was, he believed, engaged in Mid Lothian at the time, but that right hon. Gentleman declared in favour of his hon. Friends, and, if he were not mistaken, three Members of the present Government had voted for the hon. Gentlemen. Probably, the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke) also voted for them. He (Mr. Fowler) and his Colleagues at that Election had been supported by three Members of the then existing Cabinet. Therefore, he might say that the Livery of the City of London comprised among its number many of the first men in the country—many men whose names were held in honour throughout the whole civilized world. Well, he proposed to compare the way in which the City of London was dealt with under this Bill with the manner in which other towns were treated. Newcastle was the largest of the two-Member constituencies, and it had 14,000 electors, while others had a much less number. Bath, for instance, had only 6,000, Devonport 4,500, Northampton 8,700. Then, let them look at the boroughs which it was proposed should return three Members; they would find among these Nottingham, with an electorate of 19,300, and Bristol, which, with its electorate of 26,700, was to return four Members. The result was, that while it was proposed in this Bill to give four Members to 26,700 electors in Bristol, it was proposed to take away two Members from the 26,636 of the City of London. He wished to ask whether a difference of only 364 voters, or they might say 500, was a sufficient reason for taking away two Members from the greatest commercial City in the world and giving two Members to a place of much less importance—namely, Bristol? He wished to speak with every admiration for the great City of Bristol, which, they all knew, was one of the foremost cities of the world, yet they must be also aware that it did not by any means hold the position which was held by the City of London. Nevertheless, in this Bill it was proposed to take away two Members from London and to confer two on Bristol, the difference between the two places being simply that Bristol contained 364, or they might say 500, more electors. Even if they deducted the Livery vote, it would be seen that the City of London was in a very superior position to many cities and boroughs which would have three Members. As he had said, he was perfectly aware the argument would be that the Bill was based upon population. The Bill was supposed to be based on that, and it would be stated that by the last Census the population of the City of London was only 50,526. But he maintained that that Census most inadequately represented the position which the City of London held. In the first place, he would take some exception to the circumstances under which the Census was taken. It was effected for what, no doubt, was a very good reason—namely, the general convenience of the public, and it was very probable that Sunday night was the best time at which to take a Census for the country at large; but still, as regarded the City of London, a Census taken at such a time must bear very unfavourably upon it, and could not be looked upon as very reliable. He had no doubt that if, for instance, the Census had been taken on a Monday night—at which time he himself resided in the City, and would have counted as a unit in the population—the population would have been found to be much greater. In his own case he had been returned under the Census as an inhabitant of Wiltshire, and there were very many people in a similar position. The fact was that owing to the accident that the Census was taken on a Sunday night, the population of London was made to appear much smaller than it really was. His argument was that a night population was a most inadequate test of the numbers that the City of London contained. Would Her Majesty's Government, supposing they wished to ascertain the number of Members in the House, consent to having a poll taken during the day? Certainly not, as the Business of the House was carried on at night. In the same way it was absurd to take a Census of the City of London in the night time, when its business was carried on during the day. The result of the day Census in London, 261,000 odd, did not include the casual, fleeting population such as cabmen, carmen, and police, though, of course, it did include those people who spent all day in the City and only left it to sleep. He wished to urge upon the Committee, in the strongest manner possible, that the day population of such a place as the City of London had a right to be taken into account. The fact was that property was so valuable in the City of London, that, although he might make an exception in the case of one or two wards, yet, generally, people found it too expensive to reside in it, and for their own convenience they went elsewhere. He recollected that, 30 or 40 years ago, Macaulay in an eloquent passage described the change that time had produced in the City of London in the matter of population. Macaulay showed that whereas in the time he was reviewing—namely, the time of Charles II. and the Commonwealth, many people lived in the City who now went to the West End or to the suburban districts; and the migration of the population from the City to the suburbs and to the country had largely increased even since Macaulay's time. Many persons lived outside and came into the City day by day to carry on their regular work within its walls. He maintained that it was much more reasonable to include in the Parliamentary Census of a City the people who spent their working lives within its limits than to confine themselves to the sleeping population; and he thought that a man ought to have a vote for the place in which he spent his working life, rather than for the place to which, having done a hard day's work in the City, he proceeded for the purpose of repose. This seemed to him a very strong point. They had, according to the day Census, 261,000 people spending their days in the City. The City Directory gave 50,000 names, and these were people who, for the most part, were employers. Many of these gentlemen kept a large number of clerks. He maintained that, as it was during the day that the most important transactions took place in the City, the electoral importance of the place should be tested during the day, and that if they took the day Census of 261,000, they would find that the City of London was more entitled to four Members than Bristol was, with its population of 206,000. They would find that the population of the City of London was only a little less than the population of Sheffield, which was to have five Members. It might be said that this 261,000 was not an exact figure, and he did not pledge himself to it; but he argued that where a man spent his life, or most of his time, day by day—all his working hours—that was the place to which he ought to be said to belong; but, admitting, for a moment, that the figure he had quoted was not exact, he could not believe that the 50,000 was a fair figure. He would propose, as a compromise, that they should take half the day Census and add it to the night Census, which would give them 180,500, or a larger population than any three-Member constituency. It must be borne in mind that the whole of this was an adult male population. He did not mean to say that there would not be included in this number some young clerks under 21 years of age; but they would all be old enough to take part in the affairs of life, and to be either bona fide engaged in commerce, or, at all events, getting their mercantile education in the City. With regard to the rating question, the rating qualification had been abandoned from the Bill; but if its rateable value were taken into consideration, the City of London would be entitled to seven Members. He did not know that he ought to press this argument; but, at the same time, he would like it to be borne in mind, as it very much strengthened the force of the City claims on other grounds. With regard to the Livery vote, it was a statutory vote, and had been recognized in previous Reform Bills. As the Committee were aware, prior to 1832 the Livery were the sole electors for the City of London. Those privileges were continued in that year, and they were extended in the Act of 1867. The Committee would recollect that in 1867 London was represented, he believed, by his hon. Colleague whom he saw opposite, and also by an hon. Gentleman whom they all very much respected and whom most of them remembered—Mr. Crawford; and when he referred to this Gentleman's name he might declare that a more admirable commercial Member never sat in the House. He very much regretted the absence on this occasion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). That right hon. Gentleman had promised to support his Motion, and if he had not been compelled to go out of town, he unquestionably would have cordially endorsed what he (Mr. Fowler) was saying. Mr. Crawford had introduced a clause into the Act of 1867 which extended the distance in regard to which the voters of the City of London could vote from seven miles to 21 miles. The Gentleman who introduced that was, as he had said, a very admirable Member for the City—one whom everybody considered most worthily represented the City; but he was also a very much respected Member of the Party opposite. He was a man of unimpeachable Liberal principles; therefore, if he (Mr. Fowler) mentioned the fact that this clause was introduced by Mr. Crawford, hon. Gentlemen opposite would admit that it was a provision made by a good authority, and came to them with a tolerable recommendation. When Parliament, on the two occasions he had referred to, sanctioned the Livery vote, it must have been, he thought, because they felt that the Liverymen of the City of London were a body of men thoroughly entitled to share in the responsibility of sending Members to Parliament. The Committee had recently had a very interesting debate upon the subject of the representation of the Universities. Some hon. Members below the Gangway opposite had endeavoured to do away with the University representation; but the Committee, by a very large majority, had maintained the principle that Universities ought to continue to send Members to Parliament. Of course, the constituency of the City of London was, in some respects, similar to a University constituency. A University constituency was composed of men of learning and men of literary attainments, and of scientific men. London was somewhat different in these respects; but it comprised among its voters the first commercial men in the world, and he urged as strongly as he could the advantage of having such a class represented. It was urged, the other night, with great force, that it was desirable that the Universities should be represented, because they were able to send intellectual men to the House; and, in the same way, he would maintain that it was desirable that the City of London should be well represented, because the City of London contained a great community whose trading and commercial interests were the greatest in the world. No doubt, it would be said that it was all very well to urge this, but that the Bill gave a very large increase to the representation of the Metropolis. No doubt, the number of Metropolitan Representatives had been very largely increased, and that though two Members would be taken away from the City, yet there would be an increase elsewhere within the Metropolitan radius; but, to his mind, that was not satisfactory. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Magniac), as they knew, represented a borough; but he saw from the papers that he proposed to represent a county constituency in the next Parliament. He was afraid that eminent merchants, like his hon. Friend, would not be so anxious to seek City representation in future, as they would be to put up for county constituencies. The place with which a man was most connected was the place where he carried on his daily life, and not necessarily where he slept. For instance, although his hon. Friend (Mr. Long)—a young man who gave promise of a great future in that House, who bore a Parliamentary name of six centuries, and who was the only man who filled the seat in that House which was held by his ancestors in the days of Henry III.—who represented his own county was an admirable county Member, and was well acquainted with all agricultural questions, yet he was hardly the sort of man he, as a banker, would send to represent him in the House of Commons; and there were a number of similar cases which would apply elsewhere. He thought they would find that the class of men who would be elected for the City of London were not the same class of men who would be returned for Metropolitan constituencies as a rule. By taking away two Members from the City of London, they were practically taking away two mercantile men from that House. He dared say there would be an increase of force along the banks of the Thames, which would have the effect of bringing more shipping men into the House; but he ventured to say that it was likely that, in taking away these two Members, they were taking away two authorities on commercial matters, and replacing them with Members who, however good, had not the same qualification. He thanked the Committee for listening to him, and contended that no case had been made out for the alteration proposed by the Bill, which would distinctly lower the character of the House, and urged the Committee to support the Amendment which he had the honour to propose.

[Fourth Night.]

[Fourth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 6, to leave out the words "The City of London shall return two Members and no more, and."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member for the City of London had made a very excellent speech in favour of his Amendment, had put his case in a very moderate way, and had stated very clearly the grounds he relied upon in support of it. He had certainly made the most of his case; but he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would have to state to the Committee the reasons which had weighed with those who had had to consider this matter against the proposal the hon. Member made. The hon. Member said that this was a very similar question to that of University representation which they were considering a few days ago. On that occasion he had frankly admitted to the Committee that he was hostile to University representation, and he had been blamed for his frankness; but he could not help thinking that what he said on that occasion was right. On this occasion he found himself in a different position, and was in entire sympathy with the Bill. This matter of the representation of the City of London was considered at the same time as that of the representation of Universities when the Bill was being drafted, and after full consideration it had been decided in the way in which it now appeared in the Bill. His hon. Friend had told the Committee that the City of London was the first City in the world. No doubt, in one sense of the word, London was the first City in the world. But that meant London as the Metropolis, as known to foreign countries and the inhabitants of the country generally. London in this sense extended very far beyond the limits of the City; but surely his hon. Friend would not contend that the City of London in the limited sense—in the Parliamentary sense—of the word was the first City in the world. [Mr. R. N. FOWLER: Commercially.] He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) contended that the commerce of London extended far beyond the limits of the City. Even some of the most important commercial ports were outside the boundaries of the City. The docks and shipping extended far beyond the City; and again in the City of Westminster very large commercial interests were involved. To the City of London in the wider sense of the word—namely, as meaning the Metropolis—the Bill gave a very large increase of representation. The area of the new Metropolis for Parliamentary purposes would be the local government area, which was only slightly larger than the present Parliamentary Metropolis. At the present time they had 22 Members representing the Metropolis; but they now proposed to give 59, although the area was very much the same in both cases. The hon. Member had spoken of there being a very large number of electors in the City; but he had forgotten to speak of the peculiar franchise which existed in the City of London—the franchise which had been described in strong terms as being scandalous, and as amounting virtually to the sale of the franchise for money. He would not speak strongly of it; but he would describe it as an altogether peculiar franchise, which had been condemned by the majority of a very weighty Royal Commission. Then, again, the condition of residence, which in other constituencies was restricted to seven miles, was in the case of the City extended to 25 miles. Therefore, a very large proportion of the electors of the City of London was accounted for by the peculiar treatment of the City. The proposal of this Bill, it was true, had been based on population; but the City of London had been made an exception. In consideration of its ancient history and position it had been allowed double representation; and whereas all the other Metropolitan boroughs would be single-Member constituencies, the City of London would retain its present boundaries, and would return two Members. For this he had expected the gratitude of the hon. Alderman. If the City of London had been treated altogether on the basis of population, as they had treated other districts in accordance with the Metropolitan scheme, it would only have been entitled to one Member; but instead of that they had given it two. Each Metropolitan Member would, according to the Bill, represent on an average 65,000 persons, while the City of London had considerably under 60,000 by the night Census; so that it was getting more, according to population, than twice—between twice and three times—the ordinary representation to which its population was entitled. His hon. Friend had spoken of the extraordinary manner in which the Census in the City was taken; but it was a remarkable thing that there was hardly any portion of the United Kingdom which did not complain of the same thing. In the case of many fishing towns it seemed as if the whole male population were catching herrings on the day that the Census was taken. The

Mr. R. N. Fowler

hon. Member had not been quite fair in the comparisons he made of London and other cities. He drew a comparison with the City of Bristol. It was true that there were 18,000 odd persons possessing the occupation franchise in London, and it was true that there were only 23,000 in the present City of Bristol. But the City of Bristol had been largely extended, and the number of electors largely increased by the Bill. The hon. Member had rather ignored the tender manner in which this Bill and the Franchise Act dealt with all the ancient franchises of the City. He had said that people ought to be returned where they carried on their business; but they did not touch the franchise in the City of London by this Bill, and therefore persons who carried on their business in London would continue to have a vote there. The real question in this case was, whether they should take Members from other districts of the Metropolis in order to give more than double or treble its proper representation to the City. Upon the point as to where the two additional Members asked for on behalf of the City were to come from the hon. Member had been silent. He had thrown out no suggestion whatever as to the quarter whence they should be drawn. Were he dealing with a less august body than the City of London, he should say it was idle and futile to make proposals for increasing the total number of seats without saying where they were to come from. At the present moment the great bulk of the constituencies were short of their proper proportion of Representatives. Tenderness to existing interests had done much to diminish the fund of Members available to supply constituencies that were properly entitled to more Representatives. Owing to this tenderness, the whole of the great boroughs of the country were less represented than they ought to be, and some were making strong objections at present; and if more Members were to be taken away from them they would be still further unrepresented. The hon. Member had founded his argument, that the Census was unfair, on the smallness of the night population of the City. That was no doubt so, but it was nearly as unfair to the several districts created by the Bill, which contained great commercial houses and offices, and which had been separated into distinct constituencies. There was Mid-Birmingham, Central Bradford, Hull, Leeds, Liverpool, Sheffield, and Glasgow. In all those cases the Boundary Commissioners had so divided the great cities as to make a nucleus of their commercial centres. The test of the Census population was no doubt unfair to all those places; but it must be remembered that all the gentlemen having offices there had their houses in other parts, and voted in more than one place. London was specially favoured in this respect, for the radius of residence was three times as great as in other constituencies. The hon. Member had contended that mercantile interests deserved special representation in that House, and everybody would agree with him; in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government mercantile interests were likely to be more largely represented under this Bill than they had been in the past. They believed that the single-Member system was likely to lead to more distinct representation of the great mercantile centres than had ever been the case before. Looking at all these considerations, he must ask the Committee whether the hon. Member had not failed to make out a case for increasing the very liberal representation which the City of London, in consequence of its ancient privileges, was accorded by the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE said, the right hon. Gentleman had commenced his remarks with a most extraordinary proposition. He had cast a doubt on the fact that London was the greatest commercial City in the world, and stated that that description rather applied to the whole of London than to the City proper; and in illustration of his argument he had mentioned that ships did not come into the City, but into docks lower down the river. The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that all transactions in regard to those ships were carried on in the City itself. It was not only these shipping interests, however, that were involved, for all the commercial interests which it was possible to conceive centred themselves in the City proper. He might say, in fact, that London was the mercantile centre, not only of the whole country, but almost of the world. Therefore, he thought that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) in saying that London was the chief City in the world, was saying that which everybody who knew anything about the City would say was perfectly correct. They were not now proposing to give the City something more than it had hitherto enjoyed; had they been doing so, it would have been a very different matter. They were not proposing to increase the Members for the City; but they were opposing the taking away of two Members from it. They were lowering the position and power of the City and diminishing its prestige by taking away from it two Members, which it had enjoyed the right of sending to Parliament for 550 years. They admitted that for nearly six centuries the City of London had enjoyed exceptional privileges as the chief commercial centre of the country, and no reason had been shown by the Government for taking them away. The only reason that could be seen was that the City of London now contained a considerable Conservative majority; but they, on that side of the House at least, did not see that that was a reason for reducing its representation. His hon. Friend the Member for the City had spoken of the enormous rateable value of the City, and the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had spoken of the great antiquity of the City and its institutions, and he thought those matters ought to be taken into account before they ruthlessly took away part of its representation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), speaking some years ago, said that the people of London were identified with the City; that the great majority, although they did not live there, had occupied premises all their lives there, and spent a large portion of their lives in the City. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared to repeat that statement. The right hon. Gentleman Sir Charles W. Dilke) had taken his hon. Friend to task for having compared the number of electors in the City with the number of electors in Bristol. Now, suppose they deducted the 7,000 freemen, who were enjoying what the right hon. Gentleman had called "this peculiar franchise," it still left the number of electors in the City at 20,000. He would ask the right Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to compare the position which he proposed to give to the City of London with the position of Belfast under this Bill. He took it that there were 21,000 electors in Belfast, which was to return four Members. Well, if they struck out the 7,000 gentlemen who possessed the peculiar franchise which the right hon. Gentleman objected to, they would have the City, with 20,000 electors, having only two Members, compared with Belfast, with 1,000 more electors and two more Members. But if they went to a town in Ireland they saw a still more remarkable difference; and he would like the right hon. Baronet to give his attention to him upon this point, as he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had made some comments upon it. Take Dublin, there the electors were only 13,785, and they returned four Members; and yet the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take away from 20,000 bona fide electors of the City two Members, leaving them only two.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That is on the present franchise.

MR. RITCHIE: No doubt there will be some difference in the number of electors in Dublin under the new franchise.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: And there will be considerable difference in Belfast by the extension of its boundaries.

MR. RITCHIE: How with regard to Dublin?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There the franchise is different.

MR. RITCHIE: Does the right hon. Baronet mean to say that the new franchise will give 50 per cent more voters to Dublin?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; but it will give an increase.

MR. RITCHIE said, he did not think the new franchise would increase the number of electors in Dublin so much as the right hon. Gentleman expected; at any rate it would not make up the difference between the number of voters in Dublin and those in the City of London. Then, if they took the question of population, the attitude of the Government would not bear critical examination. His contention was that the City should be, and always had been, treated in an exceptional manner. The City had a population of 50,526 at night. Now, let them see how the City would be represented in comparison with some of the smaller towns which were to have one Member. He had in his hand a list of four of the small boroughs which, together, had a population of 61,000; and that population of 61,000 in these small boroughs were to return four Members. They were to have four petty boroughs possessing this great representation; and yet the City of London, with upwards of 50,000 of night population, and 260,000 of a day population, was to return only two Members. He contended that the City of London had good ground to complain of the manner in which the Government proposed to treat it. Considering its commercial importance, its ancient history, he thought the City of London ought to have continued to receive the special consideration which it had enjoyed for the past 500 years. He again said, in conclusion, that if it were a question of giving new additional privileges to London, the question might be different; but that was not the question. The question was not the giving new Members, but the taking away seats which existed, and he maintained the Government had made out no case to justify this action.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, he rose with some reluctance to make some remarks on the Amendment now before the Committee, and he did so because they were told that a compact had been entered into by three Gentlemen representing one side of the House, and two Gentlemen representing the other—because they were told that they were to be bound by the opinion or the contract entered into by those five Gentlemen when they met to arrange matters in secret. Up to the present time the Committee had had no particulars of this secret compact. It was only as time went on, and one scheme after another developed itself, that the Committee saw what it meant. It was plain that night that the compact meant, amongst other things, that the City of London was to lose two of its Members. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister ought to cast his mind back upon the traditions of the City of London. The City of London had always been Liberal in its policy and in its politics until 1874, with very few exceptions, which exceptions were only in the interests of some particularly favourite Member whom the citizens desired to honour. It was entirely the right hon.

Gentleman's own fault that the electorate in the City had been turned into a Conservative body instead of a Liberal one. But what had been done once might be done again; the City might not always be Conservative; and he, therefore, sincerely hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see fit to leave the City its present number of Members. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in speaking of the Livery of the City of London, had been a little at fault with regard to the number of the Livery. Assuming the electorate were 20,000 without the Livery, they must bear in mind that very large numbers of the Livery had a vote for occupation. They were entitled to vote for occupying if they did not vote as Liverymen; and very many men voted as occupiers instead of as Liverymen. But with regard to the Livery, he was bound to say that, with all the fault-finding about their voting for Members for the City of London, he did not think there was any more responsible, or more respectable, or any more modest, body of voters than the Liverymen of the City of London. It appeared to be the present disposition of the Government in this Parliament to set aside everything that was respectable, and to push forward everything that was Democratic and trivial. He disputed the right of the Government to define population as "sleeping population" in any city whatever. Surely a day population of a city or borough was entitled to its share of the representation in Parliament. When they considered that the day population was over 260,000, and that amongst them were a very large number of employers, and that it was only the employés who slept within the City, they would see how large a number of people were entitled to the consideration of the Committee. The City, in his judgment, was one of the most important, one of the grandest, and one of the wealthiest cities in the world. He did not know anything that did not exist within its one mile of area. That mile was the most valuable mile of land in the world; and within it, as the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had told them, they had shipping, merchants, ship-brokers, the Bank of England, 84 or 86 other banking interests—so that, so far as the banking interests were concerned, they were amply represented—and it was really the wheel that moved the whole of the finance of the world. The Bank of England, which was within the City, was the source that the Government looked to when it had any great financial project in view or to bring about. Then, again, the Press, which was so mighty in its power, was most largely represented in the City. There was scarcely a Metropolitan daily paper whose office was not within the walls of the City; and most of the weekly papers were also published within its limits. Take the literature of the day. Was it not represented in Paternoster Row, or the large publishing firms which carried on business there; did not these firms push into every house, and bring home to every family circle literature that was wise, and good, and elevating? Travel on further, they found that nearly all the railway stations, the centres of the trading of the country, were within the City walls. The termini of the Great Western, and some others, were not within it, it was true; but these lines were brought within it by the instrumentality of the Inner Circle Railway. Men of all classes and of all positions threw themselves into the City of London, in order to seek employment to obtain a livelihood. There were more distinguished foreign merchants within the City of London, who had emigrated over here and become wealthy and great, than were to be found in any other city of the Kingdom. He could not call to mind any industry that was not represented, in some way or other, in some one of the offices of the City of London. He had himself tried in vain to find out why the Government had endeavoured to take away two of the City Members. He could only put it down to the matter of pique, he could not have put it down to any other feeling whatever. The City represented great intelligence, particularly financial intelligence, and all the interests of the Kingdom. Manchester sent its goods to the City, also Birmingham, Sheffield, and other great towns, in order that the proper markets of the world might be supplied. Under all these circumstances, that the City was entitled to four Members there could hardly be a doubt. The Petition of the City was to the effect that the City of London claimed to be placed on an equality with the Universities in its representation, and that it ought not to lose any of its Members. It stated that the population was large; and if his argument were accepted, that in reckoning that population they should consider not only the sleeping inhabitants, but the day population as well, then a very strong argument indeed had been made out in favour of retaining the present number of Members. The right hon. Baronet had spoken of double votes; but he Mr. Alderman Cotton supposed there was scarcely a Member in that House who did not give a double vote in some way or other; and if, simply owing to the value of land in the City, householders chose to let the upper part of their houses and lived in the country, it was unjust to tell them they should lose half the vote which they had hitherto enjoyed. Nearly all other large cities were similarly situated, a great many of their inhabitants residing outside the City limits. All the merchants of Liverpool did not live in the city; but they crossed over the Mersey, or resided somewhere in the suburbs or in the country. He had no doubt the Prime Minister now and then retired into the country to recoup that strength which he had exhausted in the House, and might be possessed of a double vote. Therefore, a double vote was not peculiar to persons in the City of London. The assertion of the right hon. Baronet that the loss of two Members was but a Corporation feeling was not correct. The Corporation, of course, were anxious to retain the four Members for the City; but there was not a citizen in London with whom he had conversed who did not view with extreme ill favour the proposal to take away these two Members. It was a citizen's question; it was a question which concerned everyone. Even the Chamber of Commerce, presided over by a Liberal Member of that House, had expressed its disapprobation of the proposal; and he sincerely hoped that when this discussion concluded and the arguments which could be used in favour of the retention of the present number of Members had been pressed upon the attention of the Prime Minister, that he would see his way to leave the City its four votes. The right hon. Baronet had asked him (Mr. Alderman Cotton) to tell the Government from what constituency they should take the two votes which they were asking to have restored to them. To put that responsibility upon the City Representatives was rather hard, seeing that it was the Government themselves who were taking the Members away and giving them to other places. Let the right hon. Baronet determine from what constituencies he would take these two Members. There were very many small constituencies which had never enjoyed a vote before who were to be enfranchised from which these two could be taken; and he had no doubt that as the Bill progressed the opportunity of obtaining Members for the purpose of restoring to the City of London her proper quota would be found easily enough. He was at a loss to account for the altered tone of the Government with regard to the City of London, for he remembered when this scheme was first foreshadowed, and public opinion was to be tested, one of the morning papers indulged the world with a statement with regard to the measure, and one of the points in that statement was that the City was to have its four Members. It was not until the famous interview took place between the Leaders of the two Parties that the City of London learnt, with dismay and astonishment, that it was to lose two of its seats. Though that compact had been entered into, he hoped that Members on both sides of the Committee would not allow it to weigh with them in carrying out all the suggestions of the Government. It was one of the most dangerous interviews that ever took place as against the privileges of that House. If the 658 Members of the House were to be guided and governed by a conclave of five—upon which it must be remembered the Government were 50 per cent to the good, the Prime Minister, Earl Granville, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board being on their side, and the Marquess of Salisbury and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition on the other—they ought to know it at once, so as to know how to submit to the inevitable. But he hoped such a compact as that would never be entered into again. He was sure that hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House, who felt a strong desire for the liberty of the subject, would never tolerate such a thing being done again. It was only because they were so near the eve of the General Election that the Liberal Members allowed it on the present occasion. Generally there was no desire to go to the country for the next six or nine months. All that he had said was merely in the interest of the retention of the four Members for the City of London; and he asked the Prime Minister not to take this representation away from the City, but to leave to them their old traditions in that truly liberal spirit which the Liberal Party had always experienced on the part of the City of London in their dealings with it up to the year 1874. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, with his usual foresight, would see that in the time to come, in all probability when another wave of change occurred, the City might, perhaps, be Liberal again. He (Mr. Alderman Cotton) had great pleasure in supporting the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend (Mr. R. N. Fowler).

Mr. Ritchie

[Fourth Night.]

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, they were told when the Bill was brought in that it was not a disfranchising measure. That was clearly a misnomer so far as the City of London was concerned. He approved of the Bill generally, but did think that the City of London had been hardly dealt with. In the first place, the Census had been taken as the basis of population, and for deciding the different constituencies to remain under the Bill. Well, the Census of the City of London taken on a Sunday night could not be, under any circumstances, an adequate representation of what the City really was. In every large town the Sunday night population must be considerably less, or very much less, than what it would be on other nights; but in London that would be especially the case. He did not believe that any man who could possibly get away from London on Saturday afternoon, or Saturday evening, and would otherwise sleep in the City, would neglect the opportunity. A great many of the ordinary dwellers in the City left it on the Saturday or Sunday if they could get away. Still, with all that, London was found to contain 50,000 people. If the Census had been taken on Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday, he had no doubt it would have been found to contain double that number. It was a question worth the consideration of the Government whether the day population was not, after all, a better representation of the constituency than a night population. The time at which man's brains were most active, and at which man was most useful to his fellow man and to himself, was during those 10 or 12 hours of work in which the citizens of London were engaged during the day. Those people who remained in London all night were, for the most part, care-takers and others employed by those who used the houses for business purposes and who themselves went miles away. It must be evident to everyone who thought about the matter that the day population alone could represent the absolute feelings of the people of the City. But there were many other reasons why the City should be specially dealt with. Its rateable value, for example, which had been referred to by the hon. Alderman who had just sat down Mr. Alderman Cotton, was, for its area, larger than that of any other place in the world. The people who frequented London, and who up to the present time had had the honour of filling these four seats, represented larger interests than any other people in the world of the same class; and it seemed the most extraordinary thing to find the Government taking away representation from them and giving it to other parts of the country, which they chose to call London, such as Mile End, Kensington, and so on. That to him seemed like giving to the fingers and toes and taking away from the heart. The commerce and the finance of the whole world centred in London; and the population during the day ran up to five times what it was during the night. These 260,000 people who were in London, day by day, as he had said, did not confine their connection or their business to London alone, or to the Metropolis, but extended it to India, to America, to Africa, and to all Continental countries; they were the agents of, and did the business of, people living all over the world. How could even such towns as Liverpool, Birmingham, and Manchester compare with London? There was one other point which was worthy of consideration. London had for over 800 years returned her four Members; it had always been specially represented in that House; and when they knew that they were taking away Members from small towns, and when Liverpool would be represented by nine Members, Manchester by 9 or 10, surely it was not too much to ask that London should remain specially represented as it was at present. Manchester might represent cotton, Liverpool shipping, and Birmingham the metal trade. These were all special trades; no doubt important ones, but still individual trades. Well, the whole of these were represented in London. All the trades of the other towns had their representatives in London, and outside itself London represented an enormous connection. It represented, he might say, almost the whole world. That being so, it seemed to him that there was a very fair case made out against the proposal of the Government; and he certainly believed that if the Prime Minister and the right hon. Baronet the Head of the Opposition Sir Stafford Northcote in that House could be got to sit down together for a few minutes to consider the question quietly and calmly they would be inclined to accede to the appeal of the City. Even if the question were withdrawn now from the vote of the Committee and allowed to come on again on Report, he believed that these right hon. Gentlemen, having heard the debate that had taken place that night, would consent to drop the proposal in the Bill. He was well aware of the difficulty the hon. Member for the City (Mr. R. N. Fowler) had to face in bringing this question to a vote at the present moment. The hon. Member had against him not only the Government and its present supporters, who seemed to forget that the highest honour they could have in the House was the position of an independent Member, but he had also against him his own Leader, and those who sat with the right hon. Gentleman and were pledged to act with him. He did think that if the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, who had been induced to go into this unholy alliance, could be induced to confer with the Government upon the point at issue, they would find it easy to propose that the question of restoration in the Bill of four Members to London would be considered before the Report.

Mr Alderman Cotton

SIR GABRIEL GOLDFNEY said, he was rather loth to rise in his place for the purpose of continuing this discussion, because he should have liked very much to have heard some Member from the other side of the Committee in answer to the arguments which had come from hon. Members interested in the City.

[Fourth Night.]

As, however, no one had risen to answer those arguments, he would endeavour to offer the Committee a few observations which had occurred to him in reference to this Bill, and the particular portion which proposed to deprive London of half of its representation. Now, the first part of the Bill was what might be termed a disfranchising portion. They had already passed Section 1, putting into the Schedule those places which were not for the future to return any Members. They had included certain cities and counties in the same category. They had disfranchised the small boroughs found guilty of corrupt practices, and now this last disfranchisement section, Section 4, came before them, proposing at the commencement to disfranchise the City of London, and then taking from other boroughs, which were in another Schedule, one Member each. When the Bill was introduced, or rather before it was introduced, when the Prime Minister shadowed out to the House in consequence of some accident which had occurred by which the general process and course on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was made known to the country, and when a certain occasion was taken in "another place" with regard to the Act for giving to the counties household suffrage, the Prime Minister announced to the House his views relative to the distribution of seats which had become necessary in consequence of the Franchise Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, after enumerating certain particulars, had stated that the City of London had a considerable claim, and a special claim to be recognized on account of its ancient character, and on account of the position it enjoyed, not only in this country, but in the world at large. The right hon. Gentleman stated at the commencement of his observations, with reference to the principle on which the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill would be passed, that he took the Census as a rough and ready mode, though not the very best mode, of determining the allocation of Members. But there were certain exceptions, and that if exceptions were to be made at all the City of London was fairly, and fully, and specially entitled to have the benefit of them. What was the Census to begin with. If they took the general application of the word a Census was a mere enumeration of the families living in a certain place at a certain period. The enumeration was effected all over the area in which it was desired to ascertain the numbers at a certain time, so that it could be done as correctly as possible; and they endeavoured to extend that Census to a variety of other subjects beyond mere enumeration—beyond the mere calculation of numbers—namely, the proportions of so many males, so many females, so many children, so many residents in towns, their avocations, their callings, how they were engaged in the day, how they were classified with regard to servants, with regard to agricultural employment, and with regard to trade and manufacture. Returns giving these details were required for special purposes. They wanted them to guide their views as legislators with reference to the administration of the revenues and taxation of the country, and with reference to the general government of it, and by merely taking in that case numbers without any consideration as to the other points on which Censuses were directed they did not arrive at much valuable information. If they looked at the origin of the Census they would find that it was not a mere compilation of numbers, but that it referred to the various duties that the old Roman Censor had to perform, and embraced the physical and general arrangements of the community. The old principle of Census taking had been adopted in nearly all European States during the Middle Ages, and in later times as one of the means of ascertaining how taxation could be fairly imposed upon the community. In the Census of 1881 in this country they had gone further, and had endeavoured to take a religious Census. That had been objected to by the House, and no such attempt had been made since. The Census imposed by Parliament, and which was required to be taken throughout the United Kingdom, had had for its object other purposes than the mere enumeration of the people separately, the classification of professions and occupations, and the amount of property that they were possessed of—it had other objects than the mere counting of heads in order that it might be said how many millions of people there were at such a time in such an area. In the case he was now dealing with, the position of the City of London, the amount of wealth for which its citizens were responsible, to a certain extent, justified them in coming to the House of Commons when a Redistribution of Seats Bill was being discussed, to see that its wealth and its trading interests were adequately represented. It was necessary that the City of London should have good representation in that House, so that her interests might be carefully attended to in connection with subjects which were coming before the House almost every day, with reference to the wealth of this country and their dealings with foreigners, in reference to the shipping interest especially. That was one of the matters that the Representatives of the City were specially interested in, and it was a matter which had occupied the time of the House during the last two or three Sessions in an especial manner. It was necessary that the City should have power in that House in order that foreign countries would know that in the all-important Court of Parliament in England the interests of traders and business men were fully represented. Let them look at what the position of London was as one of the great trading communities of the world. Not only geographically, but commercially, London was the centre of everything connected with Europe and with the trade of the East. It had almost exclusively the trade with China and the East; it had an enormous amount of Atlantic trade notwithstanding the position of Liverpool, and the amount of tonnage of vessels during the last year had exceeded 10,000,000. The trade carried on by those vessels amounted to no less than £200,000,000. Well, did they wish it to go forth to the world that a great City like this, which had received the confidence of all nations, was to be deprived of half of its representation? He looked upon it as a most monstrous proposition to deprive a community of 261,000 people of half their representation in the House of Commons for the simple reason that they only left caretakers on their premises at night. The Encyclopædia Britannica said that in London there was a sleeping population in 1871 of 70,000, but it had diminished in 1881 to 80,000 odd; but, at the same time, that the actual number of occupants of the City, as ascertained by a careful enumeration—by a careful statistical calculation taken by papers sent round to the different residences—amounted to 261,000 odd, and included men of the highest commercial character, of great wealth and integrity and business habits.

Sir Gabriel Goldney

MR. FIRTH: The hon. Member would not voluntarily, I am sure, state that which is contrary to the official Census; the figures he gives are—
[Cries of "Order!"]

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, that in order to be quite accurate he was quoting from a new edition of The Encyclopædia Britannica, an edition published in 1882.

MR. FIRTH: I have here the City Census—
[Cries of "Order!"]

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, that what he was quoting from was accepted as an authority. He could refer to a variety of private statistics; but he thought it to be more satisfactory to the Committee to give figures from such an authority as that. The Encyclopædia Britannica was published in 1882, and could have had no possible connection with the present Bill. The Return was obtained before the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was thought of, and, indeed, before the extension of the franchise was brought to anything like a practical issue. The day Census, according to The Encyclopædia Britannica was 261,061; although in 1871 the night Census was only 74,897, and in 1881 80,536. Now, the rough and ready basis the Prime Minister took in announcing to the House the scheme on which the redistribution of seats would be arranged was most objectionable. The right hon. Gentleman had said that taking the boroughs and counties together it would give, as near as possible, a ratio of 54,200 per Member, but that London, from its position, should be exceptionally considered, not only with regard to numbers, but also as to the surrounding circumstances which were likely to affect its general claim to legislation. If it was to be exceptionally considered and to have all its surroundings taken into view, this day population must be borne in mind. If the population of the City were taken at this real figure of 261,000, its number of Members would not be four, but five or six. He did not ask for an increase, but he protested against a decrease, and maintained that if persisted in it would be a great slur upon the first City of the world. It was not only prejudicial to the citizens of London, who were composed of all classes, of all politics, but a disparagement to the whole nation. The citizens of London wished to have their ancient status retained; and it would be a disparagement, even with regard to their financial and banking arrangements, to have their representation reduced one-half, when there was no decline, but the reverse, in all the important interests which were involved in its business transactions. The citizens of London considered that it would be a slur not only upon their City, but upon them and their financial and commercial arrangements, to have their representation, which they had enjoyed for 500 years, reduced by one-half. The commercial population of London had, so far as their dwelling were concerned, emigrated to the suburbs and the country, so as to give greater facilities for the carrying on of their commercial arrangements at their places of business in the City. By living outside they allowed greater room and scope for their businesses, and it was for doing that that the Government proposed to reduce their Parliamentary representation. It was said that the Metropolis itself was to have its number of Members largely increased, and that, therefore, the City should not complain; but he objected to the case of the City being considered on the basis of population. Although the rest of the Metropolis might be justly entitled to their increased representation, the case of the City of London should be considered upon different grounds. Had not the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself said that they could not in the case of a place like London apply hard and strict mathematical rules, but that they must give weight to various considerations, some of them, no doubt, conflicting, which would come before them when they were fixing and allocating the large number of Members who would fall to them from the different small boroughs which were to be disfranchised? The places disfranchised had probably shown that they had made no progress, had probably retrograded in numbers and position, and had ceased to be entitled to Parliamentary representation. All these things had to be considered. He (Sir Gabriel Goldney) represented a comparatively small borough (Chippenham), and he was quite content that it should be merged into a county, and that a larger district should be formed more fitted to return a Member to the House than the present constituency; but his contention was that the population of London materially exceeded the basis upon which they had founded their scheme of representation. As he had said, he did not ask for an increase to the representation of London; but he demanded, and thought he was entitled to demand, from the hands of the Committee and Parliament that London should remain in the same position that it had been in for so long—for one reason, because the City of London had increased enormously in its wealth and importance. The merchants of the City had heavy responsibilities to fulfil to the trade of the whole country, to the customers who came to their ports; in fact, to the trade of the whole world, which centred in their City. Their shipping had increased and the produce of their ships. It would be well for Parliament to take into consideration the important position of the City. They had France bidding against them, and very successfully in a great number of matters, both in regard to commercial arrangements, but more especially in regard to banking arrangements. It was necessary, therefore, that no slur should be cast upon their City. How could they show to their customers and the world that they were maintaining their position for integrity, and that the City of London stood as high or higher, if possible, now than it had ever done before, and in as high a position as any other capital in the world, when foreigners would see their own Parliament reducing the Parliamentary importance of the place? Most of the great financial arrangements of the Empire were carried on, not in the various parts of the Empire generally, but by the large number of traders and merchants who congregated every day in the City—by gentlemen whose foreign relations enabled them to undertake the largest transactions. Their feeling was that they deserved their present representation, not merely on account of their numbers or on account of the heavy taxes they paid, but because of their being citizens of London; and they desired that representation without reference to the sleeping numbers within the walls of the City. He did not know that he could say more. If it were said—"We do not care for your numbers in the day time, what we want is your sleeping population," it amounted simply to this—that so long as people were in their beds they might be represented in the House of Commons. That was the only logical conclusion. How could that sleeping argument be put to the world? Supposing this partial disfranchisement of the City of London were carried out, and he went, say, to a German, and discussed the question, what would the foreigner say to him? Why, naturally he would say—"The position of your great City seems to be disparaged very much in the eyes of other nations; what is the matter? Have any of your great bankers failed? Have any of your mercantile community brought discredit upon you? Is the commercial morality of the City as high as it was?" Foreigners regarded the City as a place to whose men of business they could intrust their money and their commissions in dependence on their character for integrity; and those gentlemen would not be able to understand the Parliamentary representation of a place, which was the centre of the world's commerce, being reduced by one-half, because the machinery of election was being revised. When was the City alive? In the day time. Foreigners did not come in the dead of the night to transact business, especially on a Sunday night; they came in the daytime, and it was therefore by her character as she stood during the day that she was to be judged. He felt this matter very strongly as a citizen of London and as an Englishman, who had endeavoured to uphold the greatness of the City, and he maintained that a slur and disparagement of the kind he was denouncing would be difficult to explain away to their foreign customers. The slur would travel much more quickly than hon. Gentlemen might believe. It would be said that London had been shorn of half its political power and was injured for centuries, and it would take a very able man to account for what had taken place. He hoped, therefore, that the Prime Minister would look on the matter from a much wider point of view than the question of the mere machinery of numbers, and that for the advantage of the City of London and the country generally he would show that confidence in the City that Parliament had been wont to repose in her.

[Fourth Night.]

Sir Gabriel Goldney

MR. R. BIDDULPH MARTIN desired the indulgence of the Committee while he made a few observations in favour of the existing representation of the City of London. Admitting, for the moment, that the Bill was founded entirely and absolutely on a numerical basis, and that in future numbers were to be the foundation of their Constitution, there were, and must be, in the Constitution a certain number of anomalies. The City of London could make out a good case for being one of the anomalies. Except on the mere bald statement of numbers, the City of London had an absolute right, so far as right could be insisted upon by any body, or any number of people, or any constituency, to return more than its ordinary share of Members. It was well he should call the attention of the Committee to the day Census of the City. The Report of that Census, which could be taken as a very authoritative statement, disclosed some remarkable facts. There were in the City, for instance, 57,000 employers of labour, and 162,000 persons employed. There were 500 bankers save one, and of dining-room and restaurant keepers there were 593, and there were brewers and distillers in large numbers. A more anomalous state of things in a city it would be difficult to imagine. Certainly, the same state of things could not prevail in any other city of England—Liverpool, Glasgow, and the other large cities included. He mentioned these figures to show that it was hardly just to apply the principle of the numerical basis to the City of London. At the end of the Report it was shown that as many as 78,000 persons entered the City every day by one gate, and 66,000 by another gate. The City was in an altogether anomalous position, and it was for the very reason that the City had grown to be so important and the land so valuable that people could not afford to make their homes where their avocations took them, and where their business centred. He had a home in the City which he inhabited; but everybody was not so fortunate in that respect. City people, as a rule, had to go miles away to find a proper home, and, therefore, he did not think the mere fact of numbers ought to be pressed in this instance. He hoped the Government might be able to see their way to reconsider the question. There was one other fact—he did not know whether attention had been called to it previously—which ought to be borne in mind; and that was, that if they looked at the City of London not simply as the City of London, but as an integral and the most important part of the Metropolis, the number of Representatives it had hitherto had was not in excess of the number to which it was entitled. He trusted that if the City was now deprived of two Members, it would be competent for Parliament, when it came to deal with the Bill for the redistribution of the local political power and local self-government of London, to give back to the City its two Members. He did not think there was anything at all unreasonable in asking the Committee to reconsider the question, and to allow the City, which was the heart of the whole Metropolis, to retain the right of sending four Members to the House of Commons. He did not think it was necessary to go into the mere sentiment of the subject. What they had to consider was, what was fair and just and right; and, in his opinion, the justice of the case would permit of the anomaly. It was perfectly true, as had been stated over and over again, that the people who had votes in the City had also votes in the suburban districts in which they resided. But the interests of the people were really in London; their interests in the place where they resided were nothing as compared with their interests in the City. There were Members of the present Government who were not ashamed to be seen occasionally in the City when they were not in Office; it was surely not too much to expect that they had a little sympathy with the City. Of course, he admitted that if they only took the sleeping population of the City there might possibly be no claim to four Representatives; but there were anomalies, and there always would be anomalies. Hard-and-fast lines very often created greater injustices than those they were supposed to cure. The whole of the day Census was full of interest, and it showed how necessary it was to be careful in arriving at the facts figures taught. He thought if the Government would consider the value of the figures, they would find an anomaly of a nature to be received with every consideration—a claim that might fairly be allowed. A great many Members had a greater right to speak on the details of the subject than he had, and who, no doubt, would give the Committee the benefit of their experience. He, speaking with the knowledge he had, feeling and thinking simply from a Liberal point of view, believed this was a case where an exception might be made by the Government to their hard-and-fast “resident” line.

[Fourth Night.]

SIR JOHN HAY said, perhaps the Committee would forgive him for saying a few words, both as a citizen of London, an honour of which he was extremely proud, and also as one who had paid considerable attention to the details of redistribution of seats. So far as the debate had gone, all the argument had been in favour of maintaining the old number of the City Representatives. Neither from the occupants of the Treasury Bench, or from the great guns opposite them who had betrayed the City to the enemy, had he heard one argument in favour of reducing the number of Members from four to two. It was true, four Members had represented the City of London so long as Parliament had existed; it was also certain the Bill proposed to give to Edinburgh four Representatives; and while reducing London from four to two, the Capital of Ireland, with other favours shown to Ireland by the Bill, had its representation increased. Those arrangements were consequent upon the unfortunate compact by which an enormous increase of representation was given to Ireland and Wales, while that of England and Scotland was reduced below the number to which they were fairly entitled. It was quite well known that if 103 Members were given to Ireland there ought to be 770 for the whole House. Even with 658 Members the Representatives of England were six below the number to which the country was entitled, and of these two should go to the City of London. The fact of the Census being taken on a Sunday night fully accounted for there being so many persons absent from the City on that occasion; but the time at which votes would be given was surely the time at which it was natural a Census should be taken in regard to the electorate. He had had the honour of recording his vote at Guildhall occasionally for his right hon. Friends; and he would venture to say that no City in the world was so densely populated as the City of London at the time of an election, 26,000 recording their votes in a population of 270,000 of the most orderly character in a City whose business was quadruple that of any town in the world. By the arrangements now pending it was proposed—he supposed because the City returned three Conservative Members—to reduce the number of Members by two; and he had not heard one single argument in favour of the proposal offered by the hon. Gentlemen who silently advocated the Bill, or the absentees who had deserted the Front Opposition Bench. Something should be said at least to support the intention to deprive the Capital of England of two Members, while, at the same time, two were added to the Radical City of Edinburgh, and two to the City of Dublin. It was quite impossible by any argument to justify such a change. In fair arithmetical proportion five Members should be allotted to the City; but that did not seem to enter into the calculations of those who framed the Bill. He was glad to see his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) had not deserted the discussion, and should be glad to hear what his right hon. Friend had to say on the subject—why should the Capital of England have its Members reduced, while the Capitals of Scotland and Ireland received additions. In the proposition he recognized one of the great evils that resulted from an agreement delivering them over bound hand and foot into the hands of the enemy. It must be quite obvious to those who recognized how Parliamentary affairs were conducted that this great misfortune to the Metropolis of the world would not have occurred if his right hon. Friend and those who acted with him had stood their ground firmly. He felt strongly that a grave injustice was threatened which the Committee ought at once to remedy.

Mr. R. Biddulph Martin

Mr. FIRTH said, he spoke as a City elector with a certain amount of difficulty. He had been anxious—and that was the reason why he had been waiting—to hear the whole of his four Representatives uphold their cause. The second worthy Alderman who represented him as a City elector said that the City that night was pleading for its life, and no doubt, to a certain extent, that was so. To those who had had the advantage of so large a representation as had City electors it was somewhat of a "Self-denying Ordinance" to ask to have that representation reduced by half; but after giving it the best consideration he could, just as the other night he voted to take away a vote from his University, so that night he proposed to vote with Her Majesty's Government to reduce his representation in the City. There were points certainly that might be urged that had not been urged yet in favour of the retention of four Members. The time would come, and that before long, when the Metropolis would claim and probably receive its adequate quota of Members. The borough for which he at present had the honour to be a Member (Chelsea) would have five Members; it had a population of 423,000, being an average of 80,000 odd to each proposed Member. It was idle to pretend or suggest that they were going to be content with that share; they would accept this Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill to-day, but they would contest it to-morrow; by to-morrow he meant the morrow of the day on which it passed; and when the time came for London to have its fair share of Members, if the City were left with four there would be three seats on the shelf for the rest of the Metropolis; but if the City Members were reduced to two there would be only one on the shelf. Again, it was possible that City Aldermen would lose the last refuge for that interesting class of the community; he did not think that any other borough would do itself the honour of returning them. He had his share of three, and if half were taken away he found it difficult to conclude which half he would be more sorry to lose. He would not enter upon their many virtues, but the Committee would credit him with an adequate amount of regret at the prospect. He interrupted his hon. Friend (Sir Gabriel Goldney) in speaking of the population of the City because his hon. Friend quoted The Encyclopædia Britannica, while he (Mr. Firth) founded his information on a much higher authority—he went back from the treatise to the original authority. He always found difficulty with City figures in settling their reliability; and, therefore, he went to the original Report as drawn up and presented by the City authorities, and that showed that those who stated there were 261,000 occupiers stated something that the City did not contend for in its own Report. But first one word on the Census of population, for, as he understood it, the basis of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was population. Hon. Members on the other side suggested that the day and not the night population should be taken; but taking the night population as 50,276, of that number more than 41,000 were women and children, therefore the first point to which he drew the attention of the Committee was this—that when the day came—and he apprehended it would come before long—when it would be the case of “one man” and “one vote” there would not probably be 5,000 electors in the City, very likely not 2,000, because of the balance of 9,000 who were men most of them not being in a position that at present conferred the vote. Statements had been made that in a history of 550 years the City had always returned four Members; but that was not absolutely correct, there was a period when the City actually returned two Members. But to go back for 300 years, when Queen Elizabeth promulgated an Ordinance against the building of houses lest there should be too many people to serve God and honour the Queen, there were then three times the number of men who had votes for the City and had votes for no other place; now the men had votes for other places, and those who would preserve the same number of City Members must justify the duality of representation. The great depopulation had taken place almost entirely in the present century, and had arisen from two main causes—natural and artificial. The natural cause was the great increase in the value of City land, the much larger profit that accrued from the building of offices, and the consequent extradition or exilium of the inhabitant population. The other cause was artificial—first, the action taken by the Corporation in driving out the poorer population, which had had an enormous effect upon the poor rate in certain districts, and a serious effect upon 50,000 people to whom time was money; and, secondly, the cause was referred to in the City Census itself, the incidence of the Inhabited House Duty. The Corporation of the City itself—he would be corrected if he was wrong, but he generally took care to be correct in what he said about the Corporation—the Corporation, he believed, inserted clauses in their leases that houses should not be inhabited, and in consequence there were 5,000 houses within the City of London wherein, if the Inhabited House Duty did not exist, there would be a population of some 30,000, for many of them were extremely large buildings, in which hundreds of people were found during the day, and which had plenty of accommodation on the top floors, not lived in because of the incidence of the House Duty. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were present this might be commended to his notice. It was a fact well known in the City, and to which the Report alluded, saying large sums would have to be paid on account of these buildings if they were inhabited. This had tended to reduce the population to 50,276; but the gentlemen who took part in the carrying out of this policy he now found pleading the facts brought about by their own action. But he was about to refer to the Census. It was proposed that the Census in the City should be taken under exceptional conditions, that it should be surrounded by all the authority that attached to a Census taken by order of the House, but that the Corporation should carry it out. But that the House would not agree to, and the only authoritative Census was the night Census giving the figures 50,276. For many reasons the day Census taken was unreliable. As an instance, he was in one Census himself counted four times. True, he had, as a City elector, four Representatives in the House; but that was no reason why he should be counted four times. That occurred not in the figures 261,000, but in the larger table setting out the number of those frequenting the City. He had apartments in the Temple, and it so happened that on the day in question he went in and out four times, and on the fourth occasion he noticed as he passed a man making an entry in a book. Then it occurred to him this man was assisting in compiling the figures for the Census, and speaking to the man the latter admitted he must have counted him four times. That was in respect to the figures bringing up the 800,000 total, and which set out more cabs and vehicles than ever frequented the City of London in a day. Another figure was supposed to set out the number of occupiers, something over 261,000; but that was really not the number of occupiers. He should be very sorry to say anything of that kind unless he could support it with an authority the City would respect. He had their own Census, the very Return itself printed by the Corporation, among whom he had many valued friends, and who supplied him with such documents. According to the Return the figures 261,000 included reporters, composers, printers, agents, messengers, porters, clerks, shopmen, cabmen, servants, errand boys, police, and shoe-blacks. It included shoe-blacks, these and police being set down at 3,348. The point he made was this—that though 261,000 was put forward as the figure representing occupiers, there were 44,000 adults and their families, and 21,000 children under 15 years of age. Now, another set of figures had reference to how many of these were employers of labour. One statement the City had sent round to Members—but which, as was the case with other statements, they did not think fit to send to him, though any unjust criticism or comment he might make upon it would recoil upon himself—in that statement it was set out that 51,000 were employers of labour—the number was rather over that as they made it out, but they admitted they made an average, as the actual number could not be ascertained; but even that was unreliable. To take an illustration from a community of which he had some considerable knowledge, there were set down as employers of labour 2,116 barristers. Now, there were not 600 sets of chambers in the City at all, and of the gentlemen of the Bar many a half-dozen had a boy between them. These figures in the Return were unreliable. There was as much justification in reckoning clerks, porters, and others who frequented the City as inhabitants, as there would be in counting the mill hands and others who went in from Salford and other places to Manchester every day among the Manchester population. If the principle were applied to the City it was equally applicable to other places. Then to turn to an entirely different argument. It had been stated that London had an exceptional number of electors—the number had never been actually stated, but sufficiently near—that this exceptional number ought to be taken into account. Well, he had endeavoured to point out that when the time came for the “one man, one vote” principle, the number of electors would be found extremely small, certainly under 5,000, probably under 2,000. Take the case of anyone who had a vote in the City for the four Representatives for whom he had adequate respect, for one of whom he had special respect—take anyone who had a vote for an office or chambers—he would leave his office each day for some other part of London or the suburbs, where he probably owned his house, was it to be expected that he would not vote in the district where he lived? His larger interest would be outside the City. In his own case, he (Mr. Firth) paid a considerable rent for chambers; but he had a much larger interest in his own house in which he lived, and that, he supposed, was the case with other people. He gave this as an illustration of what he apprehended would be the ultimate result. If plurality of voting were abolished the number of voters for the City would be small indeed. A third of the City electors, some 8,000, were members of City Livery Companies, and of these the vast majority did not come into the City at all except for one purpose, to dine. They had the turtle qualification. These Livery votes must sooner or later be abolished; a Commission had recommended it, and the recommendation would ultimately become law. He did not put it upon that ground, but because the system was inherently contrary to the spirit of the age in which they lived. Those votes were purchased. He had had himself the membership of eight City Companies offered to him for money, and any reasonably respectable man could purchase membership of a City Company—that was to say, purchase votes for the City of London, because the one followed the other; and if that were so, it was not a franchise that would long survive the advent of a Democratic Parliament. Now the proposition was that the City should be dealt with in a different manner from other constituencies because of its ancient history, its wealth, and because of its advantages in many other respects; but he apprehended the proposition the Government had made was one that, however some might regret it, as regarded the loss of Members, would commend itself to the sense and judgment of the House of Commons. Indeed, personally, he should have preferred that the representation of the City should have been reduced to one, and that would have been a very equitable allowance on the basis of the Bill; but because he thought the proposal in the Bill was a fair and just compromise he supported it. It would gradually let the friends of the City down to what would ultimately be their level, while it recognized in full all that prestige of which the City supporters had made quite sufficient.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. Firth

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. GORST said, he was, like the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth), an humble City elector; but he represented rather the working class element, for he had a vote for the chambers where he endeavoured to earn an humble livelihood for himself and family. He did not belong, like his hon. and learned Friend, to the wealthy class—the great Merchant Princes associated with ideas of the City. Like his hon. and learned Friend he viewed these great ones at a respectful distance, his admiration for their grandeur being not altogether unmixed with a feeling of that envy of which the hon. and learned Member was the admitted exponent in the House. As far as he was going to trouble the Committee with a few remarks, he stood upon the bare central principle of justice—that the City of London should be treated in the same way as any other constituency having its exceptional character ought to be treated. He supposed that the hon. Member would admit that the City was entitled to some representation, the only difference of opinion being as to how many Members it was entitled to. Everybody knew that to look upon those who slept in the City as its population was absurd. If they adopted that artificial method of calculating the population of the City it was only entitled to one Member; but everybody knew that to call the population of the City of London 50,000 was an absurdity. It was true that only that number actually slept in the City; but they ought to take into consideration all the people who exercised their calling there and were there all day long. He had watched the conspiracy which had been going on in some quarters of the House against the population of the City ever since the beginning of the present Parliament. He remembered the arrangements made for the Census of 1881, and the strong Party feeling shown by hon. Members opposite, and especially by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in their desire to secure a Census which would reduce the Census Return of the City to a minimum. He remembered the Corporation coming down with a most modest proposal—namely, that there should be taken by the Census authorities of the United Kingdom a day Census of the City of London, according to the principles that they might approve, and that all the expenses of this Return, which would have been most interesting, should be borne to the last shilling by the Corporation. But that proposal was scornfully rejected by that House, and he admired the effrontery of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Firth) and his associates when they now came down to the House and abused the Census that was taken because it was not quite as reliable as it might be. It was not as reliable as it might be because the President of the Local Government Board, the hon. Professor, and many others who wanted to reduce the Return as far as they could, gave the matter a factious opposition.

Mr. FIRTH said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman; but, as a matter of personal explanation, he desired to say that he regretted he was not in the House at the time the division was taken on the question referred to, and he did not take part in it. Therefore he could not have offered a factious opposition.

Mr. GORST said, if the hon. and learned Gentleman was not there in the flesh he certainly was in the spirit. Whose fault was it that the Return was not so reliable as it might have been? It was the fault of those who prevented the arrangement which he had mentioned. The City of London was the most remarkable example at present in the country of a movement which was going on in every great town, and which the Legislature of the future would find itself compelled to ratify. That was that in great towns people were ceasing to sleep and have their families and their domestic homes in the place where they carried on their business. And the City of London, although the most remarkable instance of this, was by no means the only one. In Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds the practice was also beginning to be adopted, and the centres of those towns were inhabited at night by an exceedingly sparse population, which by no means represented the people who had their business there during the day. So it was in the City. Could it possibly be contended that the Gentlemen elected by the people who slept in the City would adequately represent the commercial interests of the City? If they wanted the first City in the world to be adequately represented they must allow the vote to those who carried on their business there, and who worked there throughout the day. He would tell his hon. and learned Friend who did not know the number of electors in the City that there were 26,636; and, according to all the principles of the Bill, 26,636 were entitled to more than two Members. The City of Bristol, which, under this Bill, was allowed four Representatives, had almost identically the same number of electors. This was not a case of giving additional representation to the City. The City was not asking for additional Members, which the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think, but was simply asking to retain the same number of Members they had had for the last 550 years. The City of London was only asking to be treated in the same manner as other large constituencies, but with the additional argument in its case that the number of electors it had entitled it to the number of Members it at present enjoyed. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chelsea had stated that, when duality of voting was done away with, the electors of the City would be only 2,000. He thought that was rather begging the question. Speaking for himself, he thought he should be inclined to exercise his franchise if he only had the right of voting once, not in the place where he had his house, where he had practically but few public interests, but in the place where his business was conducted; and where, although he had no domestic home there, all his public, all his mercantile, all his commercial interests were situated. The hon. and learned Member had expressed an opinion in regard to the City, and it might be true that the hon. and learned Member was right in anticipating the decadence of the City; but when that decadence took place it would be time enough to take away its representation. He did not know whether the Government made this a question of the existence of the Bill. He had made up his mind generally to vote in favour of all points in the Bill which were vital, on the ground that his Leaders had entered into a sort of arrangement with Her Majesty's Government, and he, for one, was prepared to do his best to carry out the arrangement; but if he was at liberty to give a vote for his hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), his sense of justice would compel him to go into the Lobby, and say that, according to all the principles of this Bill, the number of registered electors in the City of London was entitled to at least four Representatives.

Mr. Firth

MR. GLAISTONE: In regard to the appeal which the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has made to me, I can so far answer it: as to say that, undoubtedly, this arrangement, we think, is one by which a very considerable indulgence has been given to the City of London. That is our opinion; and it was, undoubtedly, one of the points which formed the subject of communication before this Bill was introduced to the House that this community of 51,000 persons, according to the Census, should return two Members to this House. I need not go further than to say that it was so considered, and so disposed of, in order to give the hon. and learned Gentleman an indication as to the direction in which he should vote. It has been said that we have been actuated by pique in this matter. I can very well excuse the hon. Alderman who moved this Amendment, and those like him, who have been closely associated with the City for many years, and have held high office in it, for certain statements which they may make. But it is not so easy to excuse the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay), who has not been in the habit, I think, during his Parliamentary career, of becoming connected with great communities, but who, I believe, has rather been remarkable for his wanderings among small ones. It is said by these hon. Gentlemen to be pique that has influenced us in this matter. In the first place, if it be pique that has led the Government to be parties to this arrangement, I think it cannot be pique that has led those with whom, however, that arrangement has been made to concur in it. I would also point out that if we were to be influenced adversely to the City of London by the fact that it returns a majority of two Members opposed to the Liberal Party, a thing which it has hardly ever done, except in the last few years, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman might well ask himself why pique did not lead us to a similar course in the case of the Universities, where we have never had a majority, where out of nine seats seven are held to be perfectly secured to the Conservative Party, and no Liberal seat can be regarded at best but as precarious, and where the whole mass of University Members may be considered as nearly forming an unbroken phalanx from generation to generation opposed to the principles of the Liberal Party. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman must see that the same motives of pique must have entered here. Our Bill rests on the basis of certain principles, and we should have had an easier argument against the present Amendment if we had applied those principles to the City of London with unflinching rigour. It is because we have deviated from those principles in favour of the City of London that we are now challenged by our opponents in this debate. If we have been actuated by pique, I suppose that it has been to bring some benefit to ourselves that we have made this reduction in the number of Representatives to be allotted to the City of London. But this change will not be beneficial to us. The balance of votes, supposing the balance of opinion to remain as it is now, will remain unchanged. At present the City returns three Tory Members against one Liberal Member, and, taking one from three, leaves a balance of two Members against the Liberal Party. Let us suppose that this Bill becomes an Act, and that the City returns two Members, there is little doubt that each voter being allowed two votes, two Tory Members will be returned, and a balance of two against the Liberal Party will remain undiminished. I must say I have been much struck with the course of this debate. If I understood the argument that has been used on the other side of the Committee, a great deal of it rests upon this principle—that the basis of this Bill is a bad basis, and that the Bill ought to be mainly constructed, not with a view to the representation of persons, but to the representation of property. That, indeed, appears to be the desire of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). He says there are 26,000 electors in the City of London, and complains that we only propose to give them two Members. But how came there to be 26,000 electors? The speech of the hon. and learned Member was a direct challenge to extreme politicians on this side of the House never to rest until they have established the principle of population, pure and simple. How came there to be 26,000 electors in the City of London? On account of the astonishing indulgence with which the City is treated in respect of the Livery votes. Is a constituency so made up entitled to be considered man for man as the constituency of other towns? The hon. and learned Member says we shall not find elsewhere a constituency of 26,000 voters with only two Members. But he is mistaken in this. Newcastle has 27,000 voters, all of whom, with the exception of a very limited number, are real men of flesh and blood, who live in Newcastle and nowhere else. It is a genuine representation of men who have a single vote each, and where the persons having a double vote form a perfectly insignificant proportion of the constituency. But in the City of London the persons having a double vote, and, in some cases, a treble and quadruple vote, are the general rule of the constituency; and when we are told that they ought to be considered as voters for the City of London rather than as voters elsewhere, that is an argument directly against the principle of the Bill, because it amounts to this—that commercial interests and property are the first things to be represented, and men are a secondary consideration. The hon. and learned Member complained of the night Census; but the night Census is the universal principle of the Bill, and the universal principle of the Bill is, forsooth, to be overturned because it operates unfavourably to the City of London. But it does not, because those who form the day population of the City of London have their vote elsewhere. ["No, no!"] What does the hon. Gentleman say? [Mr. BAKING: I say no! Sir. Well, I would suggest to the hon. Gentleman that it may lead to inconvenience if all of us express conflicting opinions at the same moment. Let us bear in mind the manner in which the principles of this Bill are applied to London and to other places. London is given this extraordinary advantage—first of all, it is favoured with a radius of 25 miles, instead of a radius of seven miles, as in all other great towns; and, secondly, it is allowed to form ad libitum a large proportion of its constituency of close and irresponsible Corporations. I must observe also that the Amendment is one that would involve a further increase in the numbers of this House. None of the hon. Gentlemen who have supported the Amendment have indicated where the additional Members are to be obtained from if London is to continue to have four Members. One hon. Gentleman said that Wales was over-represented. Are we to take Members from Wales, or from Ireland? These hon. Gentlemen have not considered that if the 12 counties of Wales, the national existence of which has not been recognized for the purposes of legislation for the advantage of Wales until within the last year or two, are now to be recognized for the purpose of inflicting a penalty on Wales, the Principality is not the district of the country with which they will have to begin. If Wales is to be deprived, because it is, as alleged, somewhat too highly represented—I do not now wish to enter into the case of Ireland—hon. Gentlemen opposite will have to begin with the South Western counties of England, which are more highly represented than Wales; and when they look about for additional Members to be given to the City of London, they will have, I am afraid, to be obtained by withdrawing some of those Members which, according to this Bill, are intended to be allotted to that portion of England. I will for a moment compare the City of London with the City of Liverpool. Some hon. Gentlemen appear to have rather a mean idea of Liverpool. I would observe that the City of Liverpool has been quite as remarkable a supporter of Conservative principles as the City of London. But hon. Gentlemen speak of Liverpool and other towns as if you only required to go a very short distance and you are out in the country. Hon. Gentlemen do not know the town. I am conversant with a district which is five miles from the Liverpool Exchange, and that district was exclusively held by villas until within the last six or ten years—so exclusively that I remember well in the ecclesiastical district the clergyman had not the means of distributing his alms, and he had to send them elsewhere in order to find people to receive them. That district is now being broken up for a dock population, and the former inhabitants are, of course, going out to greater distances. It is a great mistake to suppose that a radius of seven miles includes the whole population of Liverpool who transact their business in that place. No very small number of persons belonging to Liverpool actually live in Chester and the neighbourhood, and there is a continual tendency to further dispersion. I am sure that a much larger radius than that which has been mentioned will be required to include the whole of that population. But to that population we give no benefit whatever. We apply to it with the utmost rigour the principles of the Bill. Whereas in London a population of 51,000, by the Census, is to have two Representatives, in Liverpool, in the Exchange Division, a population of 72,000 persons, exactly analogous in its constant pursuits, is to have one Representative, the only difference being that in the Exchange Ward of Liverpool there are no Liverymen, and there is no advantage to be drawn from their living within a radius of 25 miles. To dwell on this figure of 51,000 is quite idle, because it is well known that the radius has an enormous effect in London in the multiple or double vote. We have done our best to maintain that double vote; but the pressure that is now made for so extreme a case as to allot four Members for the City of London makes it extremely difficult to expect that if such a demand is granted the double or property vote could for any length of time be maintained. If we grant this claim it is plain, in my opinion, that the granting of it would raise discontent in other large towns to a point such as would disturb the general structure of the Bill. I do not think that the 72,000 in the Exchange Ward of Liverpool are particularly well satisfied now by having no regard paid to the situation of that population. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheer, and I take that as virtually an expression of assent to my proposition that like demands would be advanced on behalf of populations in an analogous situation in other great towns. But, as I have said before, principles have been inverted for the convenience of argument. Another instance occurs to me. What is one of the arguments for this Amendment? It is that London, as a whole, is under-represented; and because London, as a whole, is under-represented, according to the provisions of this Bill, therefore the City of London is to be largely over-represented relatively to its numbers. If London is under-represented the proper remedy is to give more Members to London at large, and not more to the City of London, if the arrangement is to be a just and equitable one. Therefore, when I say this Motion is a Motion for the further increase of the number of Members of this House, I say it not only because there are two seats to be found which you will have great difficulty in finding, but also because I am satisfied that those other great communities would not rest satisfied with the arrangements of the Bill were we to recognize in the case of the City of London certain considerations, and then deny entirely to those other communities the benefit of such considerations. And it must be remembered that, great and extraordinary as has been the increase of London, the increase of some of these other communities has been more rapid still. In my boyhood the population of the town of Liverpool was certainly not more than one-twelfth part of the population of London. I am not sure that it was so many. But if the population of Liverpool were now to be counted in the Liverpool district on both sides of the river, in the same way as the Metropolitan district is counted, the population of Liverpool would be more than one-sixth part of that of London—and perhaps very considerably more. All these things must be taken into view. We have desired to recognize the primacy of London. We have done so by a deviation from the general principle of the Bill, in which, on the whole, I trust the Committee will be disposed to acquiesce. But we cannot afford to give that excessive recognition to the old arrangements of the City which might lead to a disturbance of the general provisions of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) complained that we were inconsistent in refusing to give four Members to the City of London, while boroughs of small population were retaining their separate representation. I suppose he referred principally to boroughs of 15,000 and upwards. [Mr. Gorst: Boroughs having two Members.] But why is that done? It has been done because in those cases where towns have constituted historical communities, with a distinct local and municipal life transmitted through many centuries, it has been thought wise to sanction that principle, and to allow that element of common life, as well as the element of population, to enter into the consideration. But I am sorry to say there is no case in which the element of common life is so little applicable as the case of the City of London; because, although you have a Municipality in the City of London, that Municipality is perfectly distinct and separate from all the greatest interests of the City of London. The great powers that are concentrated in the City of London, the vast knowledge, the vast command of commerce, the eminent men who have grown up in connection with its commerce, have constituted a class distinct and apart from the Municipality. The Municipality has had ample honours of its own; it has established a high and honourable place in the history of the country. Still, that is a character that does not in the slightest degree admit of its being compared with the other great communities, so far as regards union between the municipal institutions and the leading classes of the community such as you will find in Glasgow, Manchester, Birmingham, or elsewhere. If the hon. and learned Member will urge the argument that the City of London ought to have four Members, rather than that any town of under 50,000 inhabitants should have one, or that any town of upwards of 50,000 should have two, I can only say that if he applies that he will find it go very far—so far as to alter essentially the provisions of the

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. Gladstone

Bill. He will find that that principle will be ruthlessly applied in the case of the City to the double vote, and to the influence given by that double vote to property, and that the final result of the operation would be not that the City would benefit, but would far worse than under the moderate arrangements of this Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I have heard several times in the course of the discussion observations made by some of my hon. Friends on this side of the House as to the position in which we, who were parties to the arrangement before the Bill was introduced, now stand in reference to the question before us. I have heard several references to myself, which I cannot consider as very complimentary. At the same time I feel very well assured that if my hon. Friends will take the trouble to consider the arrangement, as a whole, they will form a somewhat more favourable opinion as to the merits of that which we agreed to with the Government. The speech of the Prime Minister has been one of so exhaustive a character, that it hardly leaves me much to say in the way of fresh argument. But I wish strongly to impress on my hon. Friends how very important it is to us to preserve many of those things in our Constitutional system which are preserved under this Bill, and which we are not at all sure would have been preserved in the face of a strong Radical majority, if it had not been for the agreement to which we came. I will take the point referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham Mr. Gorst, and he put the point as clearly and powerfully as anyone I have heard speak. I observed that he and others said—"We consider the position of the electors of the City, and we find that those electors are many of them men who are deeply interested in the commercial and mercantile welfare of the country. They do not spend their nights in the City; they spend their nights elsewhere; but they spend their days in the City, and their principal interest is not in the house in which they sleep, but in the house in which their business is conducted. Would you rather, under all the circumstances, give your vote in the constituency in which you happen to live, or in the constituency where you have your principal business to do?" Well, my answer is, I should like to give my vote in both, and under this Bill you will have the power to do so. Every man who has a vote for the City of London at the present time will continue to have a vote for the City of London; and if he has a vote elsewhere—in Surrey, or Brighton, or anywhere else in the country—and if he combines with his interest as a mercantile man some share in landed property, he will preserve the right to those votes, which, if you had simply the "one-man one-vote" system, he would lose. It seems to me that in that respect we have made an arrangement under which we have secured the retention of this important franchise—a right of voting which gives us so large a Conservative element, and of which, but for the agreement, we should have been deprived. The Prime Minister has used another argument which also occurred to me—that this is really not a question of a Party character, because what you may expect to do under the Bill is exactly what you do at present. At present you have got three Members on one side, and one on the other. There are now three Conservative Members, and I hope that will always be the balance of opinion in the City. But whether the majority be Conservative or Liberal, you would generally find, if the existing state of things were to continue, that there would be three on one side, and one on the other; and, as the one Member must be told off to balance one on the other side, the result would be that the majority would have an efficient balance of two. You will have exactly that now. Under this Bill, if the Conservatives are in a majority in the City they can secure both seats; but if you introduce four Members you raise the question of the minority vote—a system which will be applied to that constituency, and to no other. That of itself would be an inconvenience we ought not to subject ourselves to without some good reason. A point which has been strongly urged to-night, and which was urged upon us when we were considering this question before the Bill was prepared, was the position in which other great centres of commerce and industry would be placed. In none of them is there made this distinction which is made in the case of the City of London. Neither in Liverpool nor Birmingham, nor in any of the seven constituencies that were enumerated by the President of the Local Government Board do you find any distinction made between the central district which answers to the position of the City of London and the other parts of those towns. You find that Liverpool, Birmingham, and the other places are divided into single-Member districts; and upon no other grounds than respect for the greatness and historical position of the City of London and its undoubted importance is an exception made in its case, which exception is in exactly the same proportion as the representation of the City of London now bears to the representation of some other large cities—that is, it has twice the number. It will still continue to have twice the number, and it will have that representation on account of the desire to preserve its primacy. Under these circumstances, it seems to me we should be acting unwisely if we were to jeopardize and break up the whole machinery of the Bill—unless you are dissatisfied with the machinery as a whole. [Ironical cheering from the Conservative Benches.] Some of my hon. Friends cheer that; but if you are dissatisfied with the machinery, the issue before us will be somewhat different. Undoubtedly, the effect of passing this particular proposition would be to make the retention of single-Member constituencies more difficult. It would make the whole scheme of the Bill unworkable, unless it were recast, and you were to find the seats you propose to add to the City. Remember, again, the great importance which has been given to the Metropolitan representation by the large increase in Metropolitan Members. The Metropolitan Representatives are raised from 22 to, I think, 59—not very far short of three times the present number. That is a large increase, and no doubt many of the new Members will represent the mercantile and business interests which you desire to see the City of London represent. It is no use attempting to add to what has been so well said by the Prime Minister. It does appear to me that his argument on the subject is a strong argument in itself, irrespective of considerations having reference to the arrangement that has been entered into. I should be quite prepared to support the Bill founded on those lines, and including this provision, even if I had not been concerned in any previous arrangement. When I take the whole arrangements of the Bill together, and see how one part hangs to another, it seems to me that we are making an exceedingly good arrangement.

[Fourth Night.]

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS said, it was a remarkable thing that the proposal of the Bill to reduce the representation of the City of London by one-half was supported by the argument that what was left of its representation was still much more than was in accordance with the principles on which the Bill was framed. He did not mean to go into the general position of the City of London, in comparison with other towns, though he thought the speech of his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister rather implied that there ought to be some other alteration besides the one sought to be made by the Amendment. The one point to which he would invite the attention of the Committee was this—that the night Census arrangements were made purely for the convenience of enumeration, and did not touch any principle. The fundamental principle of the Bill was population; but it was no part of that principle that the population should be enumerated at midnight. Wherever in any town in England the mere question of the apparatus or machinery for taking the numbers interfered with the substantial principle of the Bill it ought to be discarded. There were a few towns and cities in England besides London where the night population was a most inadequate representation of the real population of the place. What was the argument to be derived from that fact? After the machinery of the Bill, wherever the question of machinery came in to interfere with the principle of the Bill and defeat its very object, which should give way? Was the substantial principle of the Bill to give way? Were they not to represent numbers because they took it into their heads that, for the convenience of counting, it was easier to count sleeping people than waking people? He thought the better plan was to save the principle of the Bill by sacrificing in individual instances the machinery for estimating the population. In every case where the mode they had chosen for the convenience of counting the population was a mode which defeated the object of the Bill, they should vary it. In this particular instance they should allow another mode of enumeration. By that they would not interfere with the principle of the Bill; but, on the contrary, would more successfully carry it out, and secure a more truthful representation. What magic was there in counting people when they were asleep, especially if they were the nobodies in the district in which they slept? In Liverpool and other great towns, in proportion as they progressed and became more successful, the more would the people sleeping there be nobodies. Yet it was argued that the representation of those great cities, instead of being increased, ought to be diminished, because they had adopted a rule of enumeration which did not apply to all cases. He should have no fear of the result of this division if it were an open question. When, following the Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition argued in favour of a Bill about which they were both agreed, and about which both the great Parties were agreed, he and those who advocated this Amendment stood in a very disadvantageous position. But he would simply ask the Committee to consider this question—would they let a subordinate rule as to machinery upset and defeat the very principle which was the foundation of this Bill?

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. J. G. HUBBARD observed, that if the ideal intelligent foreigner so constantly appealed to were asked to put his finger on the most surprising feature of this Bill, he would assuredly place it on that clause which cut down to one-half the representation of the City of London. He might imagine they had reached the period which Macaulay prophesied when the New Zealander should stand on London Bridge and survey the ruins of the City of London; and he might suppose that, out of pure pity for its antecedent greatness, the Government of the day had condescended to give it an appearance of representation. But when he came to understand that the result was the result of a principle avowed and acted on through the whole of this Bill he would be more astonished. The principle of the Bill was based on population and a particular scheme of enumerating numbers. That principle was one which lay at the foundation of incipient society.

It was the only rule which could be followed among uncivilized peoples. If a Zulu Chief were to call a meeting of his people, he would say—So many spearmen shall send so many Representatives. If the Mahdi were to convene a Parliament in Khartoum, he might require every 10,000 spearmen to send one Deputy. But in civilized countries they had long since passed over the idea that population was everything. Population was not everything. What, till the last year or two, had been the condition of their representation? It had depended, not on the growth of population, but on the growth of wealth and science. If it were to be said that the growth of wealth was a vulgar ingredient to introduce into such a subject, he should answer that wealth was what constituted the safety of this country. It was nothing but the wealth of this country that the country could rely on in all emergencies when it had to fight for its rights and liberties. In the City of London, beyond any other city in the world, these variety of interests were to be seen. Not only was the City of London the great centre of the trade and manufacture of the whole world, but it was the centre of the trade of their extensive Colonies. Beyond that even, it was the centre of all financial operations; and that was the pivot upon which, more or less, all the commerce of the world was practically transacted from one end of the year to the other. Then, again, he asked, independently of the interests which had to be represented, what were the duties of the Representatives of the City? They were not simple, and they were multifarious. They had not only to give their advice and assistance to the Government, but they were especially charged with the cares and interests of the constituency which sent them there, and it was their duty to see that the interests of the fund-holders were not affected by an adventurous Chancellor of the Exchequer. In a great crisis like the present, moreover, they were bound to act not only in reference to the interests of their immediate constituents, but with regard to the interests of the whole country. The Prime Minister and the President of the Local Government Board had both remarked upon one feature of the case, with regard to the electors of the City of London, that, as now constituted, they had double votes. But that was no compensation for reducing the number of their Representatives. If they had a dozen votes each that would not increase the number of Representatives in the City, and that was a grievance with regard to the diminution of the representation, not as to the treatment of the voters themselves. It was quite true that they might have special privileges as voters for places other than the City; but that did not affect the number of Members they were entitled to return for the City. Having regard to the importance of the City of London, not only population, but taxation also, ought to be taken into consideration. If they took the question of taxation they would come to this important result—that of the whole sum upon which Income Tax was paid under Schedule D, amounting to over £240,000,000 for the whole country, the City represented £38,000,000—that was to say, about one-sixth, or 16 per cent of the whole Income Tax levied. If property were to have its due weight in the representation of the country, the City, instead of four, would have 100 Representatives. They did not ask for quite so many as that; but they did ask that they might keep their own; and that, he maintained, was a perfectly reasonable demand. It was not the sleeping population that formed the real population of the City, but the waking and the working population. This was a question which touched not only the City of London, but it touched the whole world. All the world was interested in the City of London as the seat of commerce and the centre of finance. In the face of all England, in the face of all Europe, in the face of all the world, it was the greatest indignity they could offer, to lower the representation of the City from four to two Members. He regretted the words which had been used by his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote); and, speaking at a time when he could have no interest in the matter except the interests of the country and the City itself, he maintained that the mischief and the insult inflicted upon them, if this proposal was carried, could not be compensated for by any clauses which the Bill contained. He would rather that the whole Bill went overboard than that it should be carried with this clause in it. He would close his remarks with the expression of his most intense grief at the position in which they had been placed by the arrangement entered into between the two Front Benches, and with the hope that hon. Members would be sufficiently independent to act in this matter quite apart from any instructions which they might have received, and that they would vote in accordance with what they believed to be best for the interests of the country at large.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, it appeared to him that the Committee had been placed in a very extraordinary position. He had thought that they were now considering the clauses of that Bill, and that it was really open to them to discuss them. He had had no idea that by any provisional arrangement between the Leaders on both sides of the House the House of Commons was to be manacled and fettered, and its deliberations turned into a kind of solemn farce. When it was first rumoured in the City that the number of its Representatives in that House was to be reduced from four to two the report was not believed. Even when it appeared in the Bill it was never for a moment supposed until they had just heard it from the Prime Minister and from the Leader of the Opposition, that by this agreement, covenant, or treaty, come to between the Leaders of the two great Parties, they were to endeavour to solve any difficulty in which they might find themselves involved in connection with that measure by taking away from the City of London one-half of its present representation. The supporters of the Amendment had been asked whether they had any scheme to propose by which the two other seats they sought to retain for the City could be provided; but he said that if, as he contended, injustice would be done by the Bill it was not their business, as the responsibility of devising the means of correcting this monstrous injustice devolved entirely upon the Government. The interests of the citizens certainly ought not to be sacrificed in consequence, or in fulfilment of an arrangement to which they were no parties. Many Reform Bills had been brought in before this one, but in none of them had it ever been suggested that the number of Members for the City should be reduced from four to two; and if no agreement in this case had been arrived at between the Leaders of both Parties he believed that no such proposal as that contained in this Bill would ever have been made by the Government on their own responsibility, as they knew full well that hon. Gentlemen opposite would have strongly opposed the proposition, and that there would have been no probability of its becoming law. They had had a great many reasons advanced as to why this reduction in the representation of the City was to be made; but he desired to offer some arguments on the other side. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had that night exhibited a surprising want of knowledge when he had spoken of the City of London, which he had said was confined to certain limits. He had admitted that the City had an immense amount of trade; but he said the ships were down the river. The right hon. Gentleman did not appear to know that the Thames itself, from the Nore to Staines, was actually under the control of a Body the greater portion of whom were appointed by the Municipality of London, combined with certain other authorities. The River Thames was really under the control of the City of London. There was no city in the Empire, and there was no city in the world, that could be compared to the City of London. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth), who had an imagination which never lost an opportunity of displaying itself, told them that the City of London was losing its population, and implied that it was diminishing in importance, the fact being that whilst the sleeping population was less the active working day population was rapidly increasing. The City of London was not only the centre of the commerce and finance of the United Kingdom and its Colonies, but it was also that of the whole world, and contained within its boundaries numerous Markets, as the Money Market, the Stock Exchange, the Royal Exchange, the Bank of England, the great Import Market in Mincing Lane, the Corn Market, the Coal Exchange, the Book and Newspaper Markets, the Wool and Dry Goods Markets, and the immense Provision Markets, most of the Insurance Offices, all the London Joint Stock Banks and Branches or Agencies of every Bank and Banker throughout the United Kingdom. There was no combination of varied interests such as was found in the City in any other place in the world. It was, in fact, the combination of these varied interests which gave the City its peculiar character. Liverpool had a large amount of shipping, but London had gone ahead and far exceeded it; and he believed this was mainly owing to the changed current of commerce caused by the completion of the Suez Canal. London was the centre, and held the control and direction of nearly all the shipping of the world. He was not finding fault with cities elsewhere; all he said was, that the City of London had no rival. It was true it had been decreasing in regard to its sleeping population; but he could explain the reason of that. For instance, there was a Bill before Parliament to provide sites for the enlargement of the Post Office and the Post Office Savings Bank. The people who were living and sleeping in the houses would be dispersed in order to make way for these extensions. There were 18 or 19 Railway Stations in the City of London. Was there any other city in the Kingdom where there was such a large number? In order to obtain sites for the Railway Stations houses had to be removed, and those who slept in them had to sleep outside the City. Then, again, in connection with the completion of the Inner Circle Railway, and the consequent improvement of the streets, a large number of houses had been removed, and the population cleared away. As a matter of fact, the houses of the City of London during late years had been raised to such a height that he believed the present City was equivalent to three or four of the old cities piled one on top of the other. He was surprised at the argument which had been used by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. It seemed to him that the bargain between the Party Leaders had been made in reference only to the nature of the vote. It was a case of agreeing to divide the votes like in olden times, when there were a number of Election Petitions presented at the commencement of a new Parliament. The two Party Whips threw a Petition against a Petition across the Table to each other, until there were only four or five left, and then they would fight those out. In this case it was no question of having a majority of two votes on either side of the House, or simply two on one side and none on the other; for, as he had already pointed out, what they wanted was such a number of Members as would adequately represent the varied interests which were involved in the City of London. There was no question at all as to whether the City Members were Tory or Liberal; for, to whatever Party they belonged, they felt themselves bound to do their duty to their constituents in furthering their commercial interests in every shape and form. Hon. Members who represented counties knew nothing whatever in regard to the duties of a Member of Parliament for the City of London. The Representatives of the City of London from 1832 downwards had been merchants, bankers, and members of the commercial classes. They had never found that the City of London had selected a Lord. [An hon. MEMBER: Lord John Russell.] Except in the case of Lord John Russell, when he was Prime Minister. The City had never elected a Colonel, an Admiral, or a Lawyer, and, least of all, it had never elected a Professor. The City of London wanted men who understood its commercial interests. It would be to the citizens a matter of deep regret that the two Parties had found it necessary, in order to carry out their arrangement, to sacrifice them. It was a singular thing that throughout this debate there was only one Member on that—the Government—side of the House found to support this proposal, and that was the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth). That hon. and learned Member had stated that this was a generous arrangement, because, according to the sleeping population on a Sunday night, the City was only entitled to one Member; but why had not the Government limited the representation of the City to one Member, as that would have been logically correct according to their theory of population? Because they found themselves landed in a reductio ad absurdum. They had taken away two Members, and now they wanted to be considered generous for not taking away three. The electors of the City wished to know where they could find their Representatives in the City, and it had rarely been the case that, during the last 50 years, they had been unable to find them in the City when they were wanted. Apart from these considerations, and viewing the question as a whole, it having been admitted that the City was placed in an exceptional position and ought to be treated in an exceptional manner, the subject of the sleeping population ought not to have entered into the question. He considered that this was simply a discussion upon an Amendment from which no result could be obtained, because the whole matter had been settled behind their back some time ago by the Government and the Opposition.

Mr. J. G. Hubbard

(Fourth Night.)

Mr. Alderman Lawrence

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD expressed his profound regret that he was unable to take any real part in this debate. He had put an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect as that of the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler); but he desired to explain that he had done so in complete ignorance that it was part of the bargain which the Prime Minister had confirmed that evening, and that it would be inconsistent with the preservation of that bargain that the Members of the Front Opposition Bench, at all events, should vote for the Amendment. Therefore, he could take no part in this discussion; and he wished to say distinctly that he considered a bargain ought to be kept in its spirit as well as in its letter. He wished to explain this, because his name appeared on the Paper to a similar Amendment to that at present before the Committee; but it was put there in complete ignorance of the spirit of the bargain. He, at all events, hoped to keep any bargain made on his behalf in the spirit as well as in the letter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 162; Noes 117: Majority 45.—(Div. List, No. 53.)

Mr. ACLAND, who had given Notice that he would move to insert the words "and University" after the word "borough," in page 2, line 8, explained that the object aimed at had been to put all the Universities in Great Britain and Ireland on the same footing, but that as it might be possible to deal separately in another Bill with this subject, and as the subject was so thoroughly discussed a few nights ago, he had no desire to re-open it, and therefore he should not propose his Amendment.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Boroughs to have additional Members).

Clause 6 (New boroughs).

Clause 7 Boroughs with their boundaries altered).

Mr. ARNOLD MORLEY moved the omission of the 2nd sub-section from page 2, line 29, which dealt with the four boroughs—Bristol, Exeter, Norwich, and Nottingham—which formed counties of themselves, and the freeholders in which were entitled to vote, as such, for the borough, with the view of inserting the following sub-section in its place:—

"(2) From and after this present Parliament the several divisions of counties named in the first column of the Schedule to this Act shall respectively include, for the purpose of Parliamentary Elections, the several boroughs or parts of boroughs respectively named in conjunction therewith in the second column of the said Schedule, and freeholders, as such, shall cease to vote for the Election of Members for the said boroughs."

The hon. Gentleman said his Amendment referred to four boroughs which were counties in themselves. Before the passage of the Reform Act of 1832 there were 19 boroughs in the same position; but by that Act 13 of those 19 boroughs were merged in the surrounding counties, for the purposes of Parliamentary election. He had tried to discover why only 13 of the 19 were so treated in the Reform Act of 1832; but he had failed to find in the Parliamentary debates of the time any reason for it. At all events, 13 were merged in the counties, and it was provided that from that time the freeholders of those 13 boroughs should vote in the counties. The present Bill as it now stood dealt with two of the remaining six boroughs, and treated those two in the same way that the Act of 1832 treated the 13 that were merged in the counties; and the object of the Amendment which he now proposed was to treat the remaining four boroughs in the same manner. He could best explain the position of the freeholders in these four boroughs—Bristol, Exeter, Norwich, and Nottingham—by comparing the position of affairs in two such boroughs, say, as Nottingham and Derby. If a manufacturer or other resident in Derby was the owner of freehold property and also resided in the borough, he was entitled to vote for the borough on a residential qualification, and he also had a vote for the county through his property qualification. But in Nottingham a man situated in the same position did not get a vote for the county. His (Mr. Morley's) proposal was to assimilate the practice of the four towns he had mentioned to the practice which prevailed in every other town throughout the United Kingdom. The first ground for this proposition was that an anomaly of this kind, affecting only four boroughs in the United Kingdom, should be removed; but he admitted that the opinion of the inhabitants of the four boroughs themselves was entitled to very considerable weight, and so far as he was aware there was no strong feeling in these four boroughs for the change he proposed. But he thought there was another reason of greater weight which deserved considerable attention at the hands of the Government, and that was that the Bill as it now stood had a disfranchising effect. The Committee were probably aware that in the two cases of Nottingham and Bristol a considerable area was included in the Parliamentary borough from what, up to the present time, had been within the county, and in which the freeholder had had a right to vote for the county. The effect of including that area within the Parliamentary borough for the future would be, to a certain extent, to disfranchise certain freehold voters who up to the present time, had had a vote for the county. It might be said that they could vote for the borough instead of for the county; but the right of a freeholder to vote for the borough was limited by restriction of residence within seven miles, so there would, to a certain extent, be some measure of disfranchisement, though no doubt it would not be large. The Amendment which he had the honour to move was in no sense one hostile to the principle of the Bill, because, on many of the Amendments which had been moved both to this and to the Franchise Bill, the Government had used arguments which had been of very great weight, but which had been mainly based on the desire which had governed the framing of both those measures not to bring about any disfranchisement of any sort or kind. He was therefore entitled to ask that the careful consideration of the Government should be given to the Amendment he proposed. It might be said that this Amendment was one which should have been proposed rather upon the Franchise Bill than upon the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill; but he would say with regard to that that the 7th clause of the present measure—the clause to which his Amendment applied—did in effect create a change in that very respect, because it added to the areas of the boroughs as they stood, making a change in the very opposite direction to that which the present Amendment proposed to bring about. The Bill proposed to add to the boroughs, and therefore not only to disfranchise, but also to enfranchise, in another way; and his proposal was that instead of adding to an anomaly which at present existed by increasing the area, they should do away with it altogether by throwing the area of the four boroughs, so far as freeholders were concerned, into the counties, and giving the freeholders a right to vote for the counties. He moved the Amendment in order to hear what arguments the Government might use. The matter was one which, at all events, deserved the consideration of the Government.

[Fourth Night.]

THE CHAIRMAN: How does the hon. Member propose to fill up the blank in his Amendment before the word "Schedule"?

MR. ARNOLD MORLEY: It should be "the ninth Schedule."

THE CHAIRMAN: Then the hon. Member proposes a new Schedule?

MR. ARNOLD MORLEY: Yes; a new Schedule. It is an Amendment to the existing clause; but, of course, it introduces a new Schedule which would have to be moved subsequently, if my present Amendment were adopted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 29, to leave out sub-section (2), and add "(2.) From and after this present Parliament the several divisions of counties named in the first column of the ninth Schedule to this Act shall respectively include, for the purpose of Parliamentary Elections, the several boroughs or parts of boroughs respectively named in conjunction therewith in the second column of the said Schedule, and freeholders, as such, shall cease to vote for the Election of Members for the said boroughs."—(Mr. Arnold Morley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. Arnold Morley

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I suppose, Sir, that this Amendment is in Order, as you called upon my hon. Friend to propose it; but I should have thought that it was not in Order. It is true that a certain section of this Bill deals with area; but this Amendment is really a disfranchising Amendment, and it is a matter which should have been dealt with, not in the present measure, but in the Franchise Bill. I understood my hon. Friend himself to say that that is so. We are not answerable for the legislation of 1832. If we had to justify it, probably we could not do so in all particulars. But we found that the ownership vote was maintained in these six constituencies; and in the Franchise Bill we determined what we should do with certain franchises—as, for instance, the freehold franchise. In order to retain as much as we could, we retained the freehold vote in these boroughs, and agreed not to disturb the existing right of the freeholders to vote in them. It was not our legislation; but we wished to disturb existing rights and privileges as little as possible, especially where they related to the ownership of property. This is a disfranchising Amendment which we did not introduce into the Franchise Bill, and we cannot accept it. Our objection was mentioned when we were discussing the Franchise Bill; and if we took any other course, we should be re-opening now, in the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, what was settled and accepted by both sides of the House before. Of course, we could have tried to get rid of the ownership vote; but as we did not try to get rid of it in the Franchise Bill, we ought not to endeavour to get rid of it in the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

MR. LEWIS FRY, as representing the largest of the four boroughs affected by the Amendment, wished to point out that his constituents were quite satisfied with the present state of things, which had existed for many centuries. His hon. Friend had argued that the present state of things was an anomaly; but that was scarcely a very cogent argument, unless the hon. Gentleman was prepared to abolish the existence of these boroughs as counties. He (Mr. Fry) was opposed to the Amendment, because it would increase the area of the dual or plural vote, and he believed that that would not be in accordance with the general feeling of the House. He was glad to hear that the Government were not able to accept the Amendment.

Mr. ARNOLD MORLEY said, that, under the circumstances, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. LEWIS moved that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Lewis.)

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE thought it was an unusually early hour (12 o'clock) to move that Progress should be reported, and he suggested that the Committee should go on further.

Mr. E. STANHOPE suggested that, at any rate, they should not take the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), as that raised a very large question, and a great number of Members, he understood, desired to take part in the discussion upon it.

Mr. GORST said, it was necessary that they should get as early as possible to the Report of Supply. The Supply Votes which were to be reported that night were only passed at 4 o'clock in the morning; and when the Government were obliged to force Supply through at that rapid rate, it was only right that they should give some time for the consideration of the Report.

Mr. GLADSTONE said, the Government were so entirely satisfied with the spirit in which the debate had been conducted, and thought the request, under the circumstances, for an early consideration of the Report of Supply was so reasonable, that they would assent to the Motion to report Progress after the clause now under discussion had been agreed to.

Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS thought the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman was a most reasonable one.

Mr. LEWIS said, his only reason for moving to report Progress was that he understood it to be the wish of the House to get to the Report of Supply.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, there was no reason to believe that the next Amendment on the Paper would take up much time

Mr. HEALY said, he hoped the Government were not disposed to yield everything in this matter. When the Supply Votes were taken at 4 o'clock this morning there were only three Members of the Opposition present—the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), a noble Lord, and the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler). Where were the rest of the Opposition, then? Why, they were at home, in their beds. They now proposed, at 12 o'clock, to move that Progress be reported simply for their own amusement, in order that they might have the pleasure of talking about General Gordon, who was dead and gone. Did the Opposition give the Irish Members any assistance last night? No; the Irish Party had to fight the Government alone and unaided. The fact was that the Tory Party wished to thrust this money Vote for Gordon's relatives down the throats of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS said, he had no objection to the withdrawal of his Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. HEALY moved, in page 2, at end, add—

"Provided, That no right of freeman franchise shall be acquired or acquirable by any resident in any part of the new area so added."

He said his proposal was one of a very slight character; and, so far as Ireland was concerned, it would not affect that country at all. But the freeman franchise was peculiar and undefined; and his notion was that if the present borough area, with the right of freeman franchise contained within it, were extended to the two-mile radius, there would be new rights springing up within that two-mile radius which did not exist there before. If there was the right of freeman franchise within the mile radius, he thought it should not be extended, by reason of the extension of the borough limits, to the two-mile radius. Perhaps he should be met by the statement that all rights of freeman franchise were heritable, and descended by birth. But, in his judgment, that was not so; and there was at least one borough in Ireland where a man could acquire the freeman franchise by serving in a particular trade. His view was that there were certain boroughs in Ireland and in England where the free-man franchise was obtainable by residence and by the practice of certain trades; and it was indefensible that the area of such an indefensible franchise should be extended outside its present limits. If the borough of Galway had its boundaries extended by this Bill for 100 yards, or half-a-mile, or half-a-dozen miles, it would be an unfair thing to give an extended right of free-man franchise within the new area. He did not care whether the Government accepted his Amendment or not; he had only put it down because he thought it was a fair thing to do. He should be happy to withdraw it if it did not meet their views.

[Fourth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at end, add "Provided, That no right of freeman franchise shall be acquired or acquirable by any resident in any part of the new area so added."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): We quite sympathize with the desire of the hon. Member not to encourage the extension of these old privileges; but, so far as the freemen are concerned, I must say that the Amendment is not wanted, and that it would have no effect at all. In England you have a certain number of freemen existing by virtue of birth. Although you may extend the boundaries of a borough, you cannot extend the number of people who have been born, or who will be born, freemen. Only those people who got the freeman franchise by descent would have it. The hon. and learned Member puts another case, with which I am not so familiar, where persons acquire rights by exercising particular trades. I will only say that we will consider that point, and see whether it is necessary to deal with it in any way. At the present moment, I must confess that I do not see how we could deal with it. If it is good for one part of a borough, I do not see why it should not be good for the rest. It would be impossible to say that a person on one side of a street should, by following a particular trade, become a freeman, while another person on the other side of the street, under the same circumstances, should not become a freeman. All I can say is that we will consider the matter.

Mr. HEALY said, he desired to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

ELECTIONS IN COUNTIES (HOURS OF POLL) BILL.—[BILL 85.]

(Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Grey, Mr. Stafford Howard, Mr. Cochran-Patrick.)

CONSIDERATION. THIRD READING.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Mr. WARTON moved the insertion of the following clause:—

(Amendment of Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1883.)

"Part II. of the First Schedule of 'The Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1883,' shall be read and construed as if the words following were not contained therein, viz. 'not exceeding the amount authorised by the Act of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth years of Victoria, chapter 84.'"

The hon. and learned Gentleman observed that Parliament was now about to extend the hours of polling; and the effect of such extension would be, of course, to throw extra expenses upon those who had to go through Parliamentary Elections. That being the case, he would invite the House to consider what was the position in which hon. Members or candidates would be placed under the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act. It would be found that they would run a very great risk of losing their seats by reason of exceeding the maximum expense allowed by law. There would be found in the Schedules of the Act what appeared to be a thorough inconsistency. As the Act passed through Committee it was consistent enough; but on Report an Amendment was introduced which was adopted without consideration, and without proper attention being called to its effect. In the second part of the first Schedule to the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, under the head of legal expenses, were the words "sums paid to the Returning Officer for his charges." He stopped there for a moment, because those were the words of the Schedule as the Bill passed through Committee; and in accordance with those words the Schedule contained an account of the expenses payable by the candidate to the Returning Officer for his charges at the election. But the effect of the introduction of those words which he now asked the House to strike out would put the candidate into this position—that he was exposed to the danger of the Returning Officer asking for more than he was entitled to give; and the Returning Officer, if not paid, might refuse to act. The candidate might very innocently pay a little more than was quite right; for anyone who looked at the first Schedule of the Act 38 & 39 Vict., c. 84, would find that there were 30 or 40 items, all of which were to be charged for. It would be easy, then, for the Returning Officer, by accident or design, to make a miscalculation of the items to be charged. For instance, the scale of charge for a clerk was one guinea. But the Returning Officer might say—"That was all very well when the poll was only open for eight hours; but now that the hours have been extended I cannot get a clerk to do the work for that money." The candidate, therefore, would be no longer free from the danger, when paying what was demanded by the Returning Officer, of paying 1s more than the expenses which were allowed by law; and if he did he would lose his seat for exceeding the maximum. Such a thing would be most unjust, and he (Mr. Warton) therefore preferred the insertion of this new clause, which would remedy the defect or evil that he had pointed out.

Mr. Healy

New Clause (Amendment of Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1883.)—(Mr. Warton.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I must say that I have heard with a great deal of satisfaction the speech in which the hon. and learned Gentleman has just proposed this clause. I remember the circumstances under which the Amendment to the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of which he complains was made. I endeavoured at the time to point out that it was scarcely fair to the candidates or to the Returning Officers; but a majority of the House voted for it, and it was inserted in the Bill. Under these circumstances, therefore, I am able to regard with very much satisfaction the views which the hon. and learned Gentleman has now expressed. As to the proposition now before the House, I may point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is not really germane to the measure which is now under discussion; but we have undertaken to introduce a Bill in relation to Returning Officers' expenses, and we have so framed the title of that Bill that it will be open to the hon. and learned Member to propose his Amendment during the progress of that Bill. This Amendment will have a much more direct relation to that Bill than it has to this, and it will give an opportunity for discussing the question and allowing the House to decide whether it will or will not do as the hon. and learned Gentleman suggests.

Mr. HEALY expressed a hope that the Government would not assent to any proposal for increasing the expenses of Returning Officers at Parliamentary Elections. It appeared to him that the subject might be germane to the 8th clause of the present Bill, because that clause dealt with points in connection with the expenses of Returning Officers, inasmuch as it provided that at a General Election the polls for all the divisions of a divided borough should be taken on the same day. He would like to know whether the Returning Officer was to get as much out of each of the unfortunate candidates for a constituency with four seats, as he did out of each of the candidates for a constituency with only two seats? If the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) would move his Amendment upon the next clause it would be germane to the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill; and he (Mr. Healy) hoped the Government would not agree to anything which proposed to increase those expenses, for the inclination of the Irish Party was to see such expenses cut down to the utmost possible limit, as they were, at the present time, unfair and extortionate.

Sir R. ABSHETON CROSS: I forget what were the exact circumstances under which the Amendment to the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, which it is now sought to upset, was passed; but I understand the Government to give an undertaking that they will meet the difficulty.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; we only undertake to insure that an opportunity shall be given for the submission of such an Amendment as this.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): All we undertake is to bring in a Bill in which it will be germane to deal with this question. We promise that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) shall have ample opportunity to raise the question.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I quite understand. But then comes a question which I think is rather serious. We do not know what are to be the provisions of the Bill which is to be introduced. Now, my impression is that the expenses of the Returning Officer are quite high enough as they are, and they are upon a great scale. It is quite true that the Sheriff or Returning Officer under the new arrangements will have to incur more expenses; but then he will be able to charge upon the old scale. I do not know why the scale should be raised, and if the Bill which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General proposes to introduce is to raise the scale of the Returning Officers' charges.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I did not say so.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Well, I do not know whether it is to do so or not, because the Attorney General has not told us what is to be the scope of his measure. But if it does, I am sure it will have no chance of being read a second time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We are in the rather awkward position of arguing this matter on a Bill which is not before us. It is obviously entirely out of Order to discuss it now. But all we undertake is to give the assurance for which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) asked last night, that there will, for certain, be a Bill to which this clause will be fairly and closely germane.

MR. GORST said, he did not wish to discuss the matter now, as another opportunity was to be given for raising the question; but he regretted that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) should have got rid of those admirable principles which he espoused two years ago.

MR. WARTON: I beg your pardon.

MR. GORST said, that the object of the Amendment to the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of 1883 was not to deal with the question of scale, but to protect candidates at Parliamentary Elections from having expenses in addition to the scale imposed upon them by the Returning Officer. Although the candidate was legally responsible, he was perfectly helpless in the hands of the Returning Officer, and would have no chance of being returned otherwise.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No Amendments having been made, I ask that, by leave of the House, the Bill may be read a third time.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [12th March] reported.

Resolution 1 agreed to.

(2.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £14,750, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that under this heading there was an item of £1,680 for the Afghan Boundary Commission. He did not propose to go into the question of that Commission now; but a very remarkable statement had been made in the House that evening, and he thought the House and the country would look for further information from the Government on the subject. Those who sat on the Opposition side of the House had refrained from pressing the Government for information, as they had been told that it would be contrary to the public interests to produce any. But they had refrained for this reason and upon this condition. They understood that Her Majesty's Government had insisted upon, and were endeavouring to do their best to obtain, the withdrawal of the Russian Forces from certain positions which they had occupied upon Afghan territory. So long as they understood that Her Majesty's Government were determined to maintain the integrity of Afghanistan, and to uphold the pledges which they and the Government of Russia had given to that country, so long were the Opposition content to sit in silence and wait until Her Majesty's Government were disposed to give them information. But from the statement which had been made by the Prime Minister that evening, it appeared that there had been a new departure—a recognition that the Afghan troops had made some advances forward upon their own territory—[“Oh, oh!”]—well, upon “debateable or debated ground,” which the whole country understood to be Afghan territory, and that those advances, recognized as made upon “debateable or debated ground,” were put upon the same footing as the Russian advances upon Afghan territory. That was very much the same as the old complaint against the lamb for aggressions upon the wolf. He wanted to know what was the position in regard to certain points. Was the agreement, of which the Prime Minister had spoken as affecting the Afghan territory, a new one or not? If it was a new one, he wished to know the date of it; and he also wished to know whether there had been any advances upon Afghan territory—any further advances—on the part of the Russian troops since that agreement was made? One point which he wished to impress most earnestly upon Her Majesty's Government was the deplorable effect upon the Afghans themselves—upon the Afghan Government and people—of any signs of weakness on the part of Her Majesty's Ministers. It was now 12 years since the former Ameer of Afghanistan was driven into the arms of Russia by an act of weakness similar to that which it was suspected Her Majesty's Government were now committing, though he hoped those suspicions might prove to be unfounded. The Ameer of Afghanistan in 1873 was driven into a Russian alliance by the refusal of the present Prime Minister and of the then Indian Secretary to give the support the Ameer asked for. That refusal rendered the late Afghan War inevitable, and, it might almost be said, necessary. A similar weakness now would drive the Ameer of Afghanistan and the Afghan people again into the arms of Russia, and the fate of India would thus be placed in the hands of their enemy for use against England whenever she might be in a most critical position. Without saying anything in the nature of aggravation as to the action of Russia at this moment, though that action was certainly most aggravating to them, he would impress upon Her Majesty's Government the terrible danger in which they would place their Indian Empire and their vast Imperial interests if they showed the slightest weakness or hesitation about supporting the Ameer and people of Afghanistan. He wished to make this protest, and to ask for some further explanation of this new agreement, and of the statement that there was some arrangement on foot between the two Powers as to the settlement of the boundary of the territory in question. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would be able to see their way to give the House some further information on this important subject.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I should like to ask one or two questions on this subject. We understood the Prime Minister to make an appeal to the House the other night, and to suggest that in the present critical state of affairs we should not put any questions to the Government as to matters of policy. But he said he was willing to answer any questions relating to matters of fact. Now, upon matters of fact, we want to know what is the date of this alleged verbal agreement? That is a pure question of fact which cannot affect policy. We have a right to ask that question, and to have an answer to it, under the express promise of the Prime Minister himself. Next, we wish to know whether any advance has been made by the Russian troops since that agreement was determined upon, whenever that might have been? That also is a pure question of fact, and not of policy. Then we want to know whether this verbal agreement—and this is another question of fact, and nothing else—recognizes in any way, or shape, or form whatever the present position of the Russian and Anglo-Afghan troops—that is to say, does it assent in any way to the position which the Russians now hold against our protest and against the promises which the Russians themselves have always given us that they did not mean to go forward? These are all pure questions of fact which we have a right to have an answer to. The country—the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) may not be so well aware of it as we are—is becoming very anxious about this matter. People have got a notion—and whether rightly or wrongly, it is necessary that it should be cleared up—that by this supposed verbal agreement something has been conceded to the Russians by the present Government as to the position of the troops. If that is not the case, it is just as well that that notion which has got abroad should be altogether disposed of; and, therefore, I venture to ask these questions—namely, what was the date of the alleged verbal agreement; has any advance been made by the Russian troops since that agreement was made; and does that agreement recognize the present position to which the Russians have advanced?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had alluded to a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister earlier in the evening with regard to a distinction between statements of policy and statements of fact, and taking advantage of that distinction, he had, at that late hour of the night (12.30), put to him (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) a long string of questions. [Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS: Only three.] Now, it had very often been stated by the Prime Minister, and by other Members of the Government, that whenever questions were put in regard to policy or fact, it was desirable that Notice should be given. It was only fair that he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) should ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross), if he desired information upon questions of fact in relation to such a very delicate and important matter as this, to take the usual course, and place his Questions upon the Notice Paper for Monday next.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was understood when they were discussing the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was remaining in his place for the express purpose of discussing this question on the Report of Supply.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he was perfectly unacquainted with any such arrangement, although it was true he was not in the House at the time the right hon. Gentleman spoke of. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was speaking, however, in the presence of several Cabinet Ministers, and he believed he would be borne out when he said that they were not aware of any such understanding. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the Government was unaware of the great importance and interest which attached to this subject in the country. As a matter of fact, the Government were fully alive to the great importance which was attached to this subject, not only in this country, but in all foreign countries. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had repeatedly pointed out to the House the great danger of plunging, either at Question time or on occasions such as this, into discussions upon matters in regard to which every single word that was said in the House was carefully noted and weighed, not merely in England, but everywhere abroad. He (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), therefore, hoped that the right hon. Gentleman, and also the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), would not in any way think him discourteous if he refused to be drawn, at that hour of the night, into a discussion upon this subject. All he could say was that the statement made earlier in the evening by the Prime Minister was made by the right hon. Gentleman with all the authority that attached to his high position; and he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) felt that he could not, even if the occasion were opportune, contribute anything whatever to the elucidation of the question. Certainly, at that hour of the night, he ought not to attempt to make what, in all probability, would be an imperfect addition or extension of the statement which the Prime Minister made at Question time, knowing, as hon. Gentlemen did full well, the importance which attached to every word which fell from any Minister of the Crown upon important questions of this kind.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he thought that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), if he did not choose to answer questions which he ought to be able to answer, might have abstained from reading a lecture to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) and other hon. Members of the House. It appeared that the noble Lord was not in a position to defend his Estimates—that, in fact, he knew nothing about them. Earlier in the evening the Prime Minister volunteered a statement to the House. It was not a statement in answer to any question asked by hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, but it was a statement in answer to a question upon a totally different matter, put to him by one of his own supporters. The right hon. Gentleman, in a very careful manner, volunteered a certain amount of information, which seemed, on reflection, to be merely throwing dust into their eyes. The Prime Minister told them that an agreement had recently been made with Russia. He entered, to a certain extent, into the details of that agreement; but he never told the House what the agreement actually was, and he avoided informing the House what was the date of the agreement. Now, the date of the agreement was of paramount importance. They knew that there had been differences and divergencies since the old agreement was made; but if an agreement of a peaceful character had been come to within the last few days—if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, or any other Member of the Government, would inform them that a peaceful agreement had been arrived at within the last few days—the alarm of the country would be greatly allayed, because the people would know that, at any rate, a kind of truce had been arranged for a short time. He appealed to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) to re-assure the House on the subject, if it was in his power to do so. The noble Marquess was really the only Member of the Government who gave the House frank and straightforward answers, and he Sir H. Drummond Wolff appealed to the noble Marquess to tell them whether the agreement alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was an agreement recently entered into—entered into within the last two or three days—or whether it was an old agreement on which they were to rely? He thought that hon. Members were entitled to an explanation on this subject; and he trusted the noble Marquess would not shelter himself under the peculiar plea that had been put forward, evidently to a certain extent in ignorance, by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, desired to express, in a few words, the sincere pleasure with which he heard the observations which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made earlier in the evening. It seemed to him (Sir George Campbell) that the right hon. Gentleman's words were as plain as they could possibly be; for he had distinctly said that an agreement had been made that neither party should advance until something further was settled. That seemed to him (Sir George Campbell) to be of the nature of what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth Sir H. Drummond Wolff had called a truce, and he (Sir George Campbell) was very glad to hear it, because it gave time for reflection. He did not intend to justify the actions of the Russians. He thought their conduct was as bad as it could possibly be; but, after all, it was well that they should not rush into war. In his opinion, the arrangement which was hinted at by the Prime Minister was the best that could possibly be made, because, if the agreement was fulfilled, and neither party wished for war, they could not have war. It was impossible to imagine a more fitting case, if there was on either side a desire to avoid war, for arbitration than a case which concerned the boundaries of a country. He hoped that there would be a peaceful settlement of this disagreement, and that it would turn out, as he hoped it would, that the Russians had not determined on war. If it should happen that Russian officers had exceeded their instructions, there was yet room to hope that peace might be maintained.

MR. ONSLOW said, that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House ought to take heart at the words and attitude assumed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire Sir R. Asheton Cross. At last it was found that the Front Opposition Bench were taking an interest in this subject. Many hon. Gentlemen last Session did all they could to induce some Members on the Opposition Bench to take a deeper interest in this question than they had hitherto done; and last night, when many hon. Members remained to discuss this most important Vote, the Bench below him was as bald as the palm of his hand. He was glad to see his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross) come to the front and take an interest in this question, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would continue to do so. After the remarks of the Prime Minister earlier in the evening, in reply to a question put, not as regarded the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the Afghan Frontier, but upon a side-issue, by an hon. Gentleman whose honesty of purpose everyone in the House appreciated, but who belonged to what was called the "Peace-at-any-price Party"—a Gentleman who put a particular question to the Prime Minister, not with regard to the policy of the question, but merely for the sake of obtaining, if possible, peace at any price—he (Mr. Onslow) thought the House ought to have more definite answers from one or other Member of Her Majesty's Government to the questions which were put in the course of the afternoon. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was in his place, and it was due to the country that they should know exactly the position of affairs at the present time. The announcement of the Prime Minister was of the gravest importance; but was there, after all, anything in it? Would the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War come forward, and, if it were possible, appease the anxiety which had been raised in the country lately on account of the aggressions of Russia—would he come forward and say that Russia was behaving nobly in this matter? [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed at the idea of Russia behaving nobly. So did he. Would the noble Marquess come forward to say that Russia was behaving honourably in this matter, and that she had at the last moment given way? He (Mr. Onslow) deprecated the kind of answers which were given by the Prime Minister. There was no doubt that Russia had advanced. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had said he was glad there was a truce. Why, the Afghans had not advanced. If there was a truce, he (Mr. Onslow) supposed that both parties must be aggressors. Had the Ruler of Afghan been the aggressor? The hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) knew as well as he (Mr. Onslow) did—and, perhaps, even better—that the Russians had been the aggressors, and therefore it was absurd to say there had been a truce. In the interest of India he hoped that before the debate closed some remark from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) would go forward to corroborate what the Prime Minister had said earlier in the evening. He hoped that it was in the power of the noble Marquess to tell the country, in even stronger words than those used by the Prime Minister, that after all there was no cause for anxiety, that the state of affairs was as calm and as peaceable as possible. He trusted that in the negotiations the Ameer of Afghanistan was not being forgotten. The Ameer was a most important factor in this question, and if Her Majesty's Government signed away his territory, and allowed Russia to take any part of the ground which was alleged to belong to the Afghans, did Her Majesty's Government suppose they would retain the friendship of the Ameer? If they did that, did they suppose they would get the Ameer to say—"I will support you, and do everything for you in preference to Russia?" Let him (Mr. Onslow) tell the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) and the other Members of the Cabinet who were present, that unless they behaved honourably to the Ameer of Afghanistan, they would make him and all his successors eternal enemies of this country. He (Mr. Onslow) therefore maintained that on all these matters the Government ought to consult the Ameer. He knew the difficulties of the question; he foresaw them many months ago, and he warned the Government of what really would happen. The Government seemed to have done nothing at all. They had tried to blink this question entirely, and now it had come upon them with one fell swoop, and at a time when they did not expect it. He hoped something might be said that night to allay the anxiety of the country. London had been placarded that night with—"Concessions made, and peace restored between England and Russia." Was there any truth whatever in that report? It was due to the country that it should know at the earliest moment. This was not a question of truce between Russia and Afghanistan; it was a question of peace between Russia and England; and he earnestly hoped that the noble Marquess would see his way that night to give the House and the country the assurance that there was no cause for anxiety.

Mr. Onslow

Mr. T. C. BARING quite agreed that a distinction ought to be made between matters of policy and matters of fact. He did not think that Her Majesty's Government were called upon to give the House at this time any information on matters of policy; but he listened very closely to what the Prime Minister said on this subject, at the commencement of that day's sitting, and he was unable to discover what was meant by the agreement made between Russia and England—England, the right hon. Gentleman distinctly said, not the Ameer of Afghanistan—that neither party should advance from the position they then occupied. If any Member of Her Majesty's Government was able to tell the House that this agreement had been made within the last three or four days, he could assert on his own positive knowledge that the news would be received in the country with the greatest feelings of relief. If the statement of the Prime Minister only referred to an agreement which was made before the Russians took up the positions they now occupied on the borders of Afghanistan, the statement was one which would not give any confidence to the country. This was a plain matter of fact. All he and his hon. Friends wanted to know was whether there had been any arrangement made—whatever arrangement it might be—within the last few days; had there been a temporary suspension so to speak of what threatened to be active military operations?

Mr. TOMLINSON desired to revert to a matter to which he drew attention late last night—namely, the ratification of the Congo Treaty. The effect of what he stated last night had been, in some quarters, misunderstood. In Committee, the previous evening, he drew attention to the fact that the Government had, in substance, failed to fulfil a promise they made to the House with regard to the discussion of the Treaty before its ratification. He did not wish it to be understood that he accused the Government of having intentionally ratified the Treaty after having promised that it should be submitted to the House before ratification; but the point he wished to enforce was that, having promised to submit the Treaty to the consideration of the House before ratification, they went to the Conference of Berlin, at which the Treaty was treated as being binding upon this country, without its ever being submitted to the House. The country was by this means bound by the Treaty before Parliament had had the opportunity of discussing it. In corroboration of the view he took that the Government had not, during the negotiations, kept their promise in view, he noticed that, on the 6th of May last, Earl Granville, speaking in "another place," spoke of a formal Resolution approving of the Treaty having been arrived at in the House of Commons. Earl Granville seemed to have imagined that the Treaty in which England waived a right she had long enjoyed had been submitted to the House of Commons. As a matter of fact, that was not so. He (Mr. Tomlinson) thought that, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister said last night, this was a matter deserving of attention. The Government distinctly promised that the Treaty should not be used to the detriment of what some people considered the interests of this country, until the House of Commons had had an opportunity of discussing it; but, without affording the opportunity they promised, they went into a Conference, and their Agents, acting upon instructions, were ready to make the Treaty binding upon them.

Mr. R. H. PAGET said, they were placed in a rather peculiar position. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had put very simple and plain questions on matters of fact to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington). Earlier in the evening the Prime Minister asserted that he was ready to answer any questions on matters of fact, though he deprecated—"Oh!"—Yea, he was in the recollection of the House. The Prime Minister distinctly said he had no objection whatever to answer any questions on matters of fact, though he deprecated, and, as he (Mr. R. H. Paget) thought, very rightly deprecated, any attempt to ask questions on matters of policy. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire had put questions on pure matters of fact, and how had the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) met those questions? He had entirely evaded answering any one of them. He had not said it would be inconvenient or injurious to the public interest that he should answer them; he had not said he was not in possession of information which would enable him to answer them; he had made no such reply, but had, in a cloud of words, evaded giving any simple straightforward and plain answers to what were plain questions on matters of fact. Now, he thought that the House had a right to ask Her Majesty's Government that they should either say that the information in their possession did not enable them to answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions, or that it was not convenient in the public interests that any reply should be made. Let them have one thing or the other. As it was, the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had simply endeavoured to blind the House. There was no attempt on the part of any hon. Gentleman to force Her Majesty's Government to disclose anything which would be injurious to the Public Service. All they desired was plain and categorical answers to one or two very plain questions.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope the House will not be disposed to push this discussion very much further. The House has been informed on two very recent occasions that it is not by any means desirable in the present state of the negotiations between this country and Russia upon the affairs of the frontier of Afghanistan to discuss the policy which is being pursued. We are asked to make certain declarations as to matters of fact. It might be possible on some occasions to draw distinctions between matters of fact and matters of policy; but in such a discussion as this it is impossible to distinguish between them. I was not in the House when the Prime Minister gave his answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) this evening; but it is now asked of me somewhat to extend the declaration which the right hon. Gentleman made. I feel that I should be taking a great responsibility, affecting not only the Government, but interests far transcending those affecting any Government, if I were to attempt now to extend any answer given by the Prime Minister, the purport of which I am not sufficiently acquainted with. If hon. Gentlemen think it is desirable that this question should be discussed, it ought to be with due Notice, and with such Notice as will enable the Members of the Government to give such information as they think desirable. The Government should have the opportunity of weighing carefully what can be said and what ought not to be said at a moment like the present. Not having heard the discussion this evening, I really feel I should be doing that which I should not be justified in doing if I were to attempt to extend the declaration of the Prime Minister. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) has asked me to say whether, in our opinion, Russia has behaved nobly, and to give an assurance that there is no cause for anxiety. Well, Sir, whatever else I might say, that is precisely what I cannot say. There is cause for anxiety; and it is because there is cause for anxiety that I think it is extremely undesirable that any attempt should be made to lead the House into a discussion that cannot possibly, on the present occasion, do good, but might, if any unguarded word were used, do a great deal of harm. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is perfectly impossible to make a distinction between matters of fact and questions of policy; and I think it is extremely desirable that this discussion should be closed.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he was sure the House had no desire whatever to discuss questions of policy or to engage in any discussion which might be considered to be injurious to the public interest. He must, however, remind the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross) did not ask to discuss the question of their relations with Russia at the present moment in any degree; he simply put a few questions as to matters of fact, and as to the date of the agreement referred to by the Prime Minister, as to whether advances had been made on either side since that agreement had been come to, and as to whether the agreement recognized the positions already taken up by the respective Forces. He could only say this —that if it was impossible for the Government to give answers to those questions on matters of fact, the anxiety in the country would undoubtedly be very greatly increased. Personally, he thought that the statement of the Prime Minister was not so precise, so clear, and so distinct as to render questions of this kind unnecessary. The questions of his right hon. Friend Sir R. Assheton Cross were intended to evoke, if possible, answers which would give confidence to the country which the country desired to have; and while he had no wish to push the matter further that evening, he trusted the Government would be prepared on Monday to give distinct information on the questions which had been put by his right hon. Friend—put with no wish or desire to discuss the policy of the Government, but simply to re-assure the country as to the actual position of affairs.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had only one word to say, and it was in support of the observations of his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith). He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) could not conceive even in the interests of peace why the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) could not answer this one plain and simple question—"Is this a new agreement, or is it an agreement which was made some time ago?" It was a plain question, it was a simple question, it was a question which the noble Marquess, he was sure, could answer; and his answer, if satisfactory, would unquestionably produce a feeling of great relief in the country.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 3 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

(11) "That a sum, not exceeding £20,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for a Grant to the Family of the late General Charles George Gordon."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he did not desire to raise any discussion at all upon this Vote; but he did not wish it to pass by without some remarks with regard to the great services of the late lamented General Gordon. Little, very little, had been said of the services which General Gordon had rendered to the country; and he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) presumed that this Vote of £20,000 was intended as some acknowledgment by the Government of the extraordinary work that this great and good man had done by his unselfishness, by the Christian feeling he had shown on every occasion, by his singleness of purpose, by his strict determination to do his duty, and by those unparalleled resources which he had shown in maintaining the honour and dignity of this country under the most trying and most difficult circumstances. His defence of Khartoum would fill a great page in the history of the world; and he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) presumed that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and those who were associated with him, had thought that, at any rate, his family did deserve at the hands of this country some recompense for his great and extraordinary services.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers) said, that it was at a very late hour last night when this Vote was brought on in Committee of Supply, but when it did come on, he ventured to say a few words to show how much the Government felt the great loss of General Gordon. He gave then the reasons why they thought that this Vote should be passed. No one could deplore and regret General Gordon's loss more than he did, particularly as he had the honour of his friendship. He trusted, however, that at that hour of the night 1 o'clock, the House would not expect him to say more upon the subject.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he thought the House was indebted to the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) for having elicited, even at that time of night, a few remarks from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this matter. The Vote was one of an exceptional character, and therefore it ought to have been brought on at a time when the House was full, and when the debate would find prominence in the ordinary channels of information. General Gordon was no ordinary man, and to give this Vote to his family was, after all, but a meagre recognition of his services. He thought that Her Majesty's Government was distinctly at fault in having forced the Vote on when it could not receive other than the most scanty consideration.

Resolution agreed to.

(12.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £292,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to make good the deficiency in the provision made for the service of the Army during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, owing to the Non-payment by Egypt of the extra cost of the Army of Occupation."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he did not intend to detain the House more than one minute; but here, again, they had a very large Vote to be devoted to a very peculiar purpose, brought on at a time when it was utterly impossible to adequately discuss it. He remained in the House until very late last night, only leaving at an hour after which he thought the Government would not attempt to take this Vote. As a matter of fact, the Vote was brought on somewhere between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning. It was a Vote which at any other time would have led to a considerable amount of discussion. When it was considered that this money ought to have been paid by the Egyptian Government, and not by the taxpayers of this country, it would be generally considered that it was but fair there should have been an opportunity of debating the great and serious question involved. He would not now enter into the question when they were to have the Agreement before them; but it was a very remarkable fact that very nearly two years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that Egypt was on the point of bankruptcy, and that it would be impossible for the then Egyptian financial arrangements to be carried on. Two years had since elapsed, and nothing had been done to settle the Egyptian financial difficulties; but they were called upon to pay a sum which ought to have been paid by Egypt. The fault, in his opinion, laid at the door of Her Majesty's Government; and, in one sense, he was glad that the Egyptian financial matters had not been settled. He hoped that for some time they would not be settled, except they were settled by England, because England, who had spent her blood and her treasure in the interests of that country, ought to have the sole determination of what should be done in Egypt.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he would not enter into the political question to which the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) alluded. He wished, however, to make it quite clear to the House that this Vote would not, as was stated, fall upon the taxpayers of this country. The Egyptian Government ought properly to have paid before the 31st of this current month of March a certain sum of money towards the expenses of the Army of Occupation. That payment for this year had been postponed from time to time in consequence of the financial condition of Egypt. It was hoped, until within a week or two ago, that this money would have been paid before the 31st of March. It would not be paid, however, until the financial year beginning in April, because until then the loan would not be raised. When the loan was raised the money would be paid, and the taxpayers of this country would not have to pay one single farthing of the amount. He thought he had made the point clear last night, for he answered several questions which satisfied hon. Gentlemen. He had only now to repeat that this was not a proposal to charge the taxpayers of the country one single farthing; but in consequence of the failure of the Egyptian Government to raise a loan in the present month, this money was required to be voted now. When the money was paid, which it would be by the Egyptian Government next financial year, it would be paid into the Exchequer.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he could not agree with the view of this matter which was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and therefore he could not allow the Vote to pass without protest. It was all very well to say it was only a question whether this money was to be paid before or after the 31st of March. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that they ought to have got this money from the Egyptian Exchequer, and that when the Egyptian Exchequer did have it, it would pay it over to them. Would the Egyptian Government have the money after the 31st of March? What he understood was that they were to raise money to pay themselves; they were to take money out of one pocket in order to put it in another. It might be that the taxpayers of this country would not have to pay the money at this moment; but there would be a liability in the matter which he had every reason to suppose would last. He would not so much mind if that were the only sum they would have to pay; but it seemed to him that this was a continuing sum. It might be, by raising a loan on their security, that this particular sum would be repaid; but what was to happen in the next year, and in the years after that? What he had understood was that the Egyptian Exchequer was only to meet what might be called a nominal sum—something like £100,000. The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers: No.) He (Sir George Campbell) was very glad to hear that that was not so; and he only hoped and trusted that the financial arrangements might be something entirely different. This country, and indeed all the countries in Europe, had been led to believe that the financial condition of Egypt was of such a character that the main burden, or almost the whole of the charge, for the defence of Egypt would fall on this country. There was no prospect that they would ever be relieved of the charge. It seemed to him that this had been a very radical error in regard to their arrangements in Egypt. All their troubles arose from the failure to take into consideration the necessity of the defence of the country. They dismissed the Egyptian Army, and what was the result? Their troubles in the Soudan had been the result. Indeed, all their troubles had been the result of such a policy; and unless the financial position turned out to be something very different from what it was supposed to be, they would have a continuing burden for the defences of Egypt thrown upon the taxpayers of this country, while the creditors of the sequestered estate went scot-free. He hoped the financial arrangements of the country would turn out better than he imagined; but, at present, he protested against this Vote, and would not accept the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had done good service in calling attention to this matter. The House was now asked to vote a sum of money to insure the payment to the bondholders of their interest. The plain English of the matter was that the Egyptian Treasury was in default, and that Her Majesty's Government were putting a burden upon the taxpayers of this country, in order that the Egyptian bondholders should be paid in full. Unquestionably, this was a bondholder's question; and, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy had pointed out, the question which not only that House but the country at large would have to face was, whether or not the bondholders were to be paid in full? If they were, it was the taxpayers of England who would have to make good the deficit. The House was told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he hoped in future Egypt would be able to pay this sum. But the right hon. Gentleman alluded to some visionary loans and agreements to which, as hon. Gentlemen well knew, no sanction had been given. Even yet the settlement of Egyptian finances was in abeyance; and for the moment they were face to face with this state of things—that they were now paying out of their income a sum of money which they were led to expect would be found by Egypt, and which could not be found by Egypt, because the bondholders had to be paid in full. It was just as well that the people should know what this Vote which was hurried through the House at 4 o'clock yesterday morning really meant.

Resolution agreed to.

Remaining Resolution agreed to.

REGISTRATION (OCCUPATION VOTERS) BILL. —[BILL 63]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir Charles Dukes, Mr. Hildart, Mr. M. H. Fowler.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES said, he wished to move the second reading of the Bill. It was a purely technical measure, and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope, who took an interest in it, had suggested that when it was read a second time it would be well to refer it to a Select Committee. He (the Attorney General) would be very pleased to accept that suggestion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. WARTON asked the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he himself would move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Yes; at once.

Motion agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I now beg to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

PEASANT PROPRIETARY AND ACQUISITION OF LAND BY OCCUPIERS BILL.—[BILL 43.]

(Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. George Palmer, Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading upon Wednesday next read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

M O T I O N S.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel COLTHURST, Bill further to facilitate the building, enlargement, and maintenance of Industrial Schools in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel COLTHURST, Colonel NOLAN, Mr. SHAW, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. THOMAS DICKSON, and Mr. BLENNERHASSETT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 96.]

PEASANT PROPRIETARY AND ACQUISITION OF LAND BY OCCUPIERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Bill to facilitate the creation of a Peasant Proprietary and the acquisition of Land by Occupiers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Mr. ROBERT REID, Mr. GEORGE PALMER, Mr. BURT, and Mr. BROADHURST.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock till Monday next.

H O U S E O F L O R D S ,

Monday, 16th March, 1885.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Elections (Hours of Poll) * (43); Educational Endowments (Ireland) * (44).

PRIVATE BILLS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, Whether he could not give a little longer Notice than he now did—some reasonable Notice—of his intention to move forward with Private Bills? At present, Notice was only given to noble Lords on the very morning of the day on which the Motions with regard to Private Bills were to be made, and unless noble Lords happened to read the Notice Papers very carefully they lost the opportunity they might desire of making any remarks they thought necessary. He himself intended to show that some of the provisions of the Vauxhall Water Bill were not in the public interest; but he found on Saturday morning that the Bill had been read a second time.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that he would take care that a little longer Notice was given.

CENTRAL ASIA—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, perhaps the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will answer a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, with respect to the very remarkable statement made in "another place" by the Prime Minister as to the state of the negotiations with Russia. It was stated that an agreement had been entered into of which the effect was that neither party should advance their outposts from the positions which they occupy at present—that is to say, that the Russians should not advance beyond where they are now, nor the Afghans advance on their side. There was great doubt in the language used as to the time when that agreement was contracted, and I wish to clear up that doubt, and to ask the noble Lord whether it is an entirely recent agreement, contracted during the last week, or whether it was contracted before that time; and whether he can give us the date of it? There is another and much more important Question—what the duration of that agreement is; how long this undertaking on both sides is to last? The third Question which I put to the noble Earl appears to me the most important of all, and that is, whether the Afghan Government is a party to this agreement entered into with Russia?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the noble Marquess, I believe Mr. Gladstone stated that—"It has been agreed between Russia and England that no further advance should be made by the Russian or Afghan forces respectively to points within the debatable or debated ground."

Mr. Gladstone spoke on the strength of telegrams from the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, the latest of which was dated March 5. On Saturday, to obviate any possibility of misapprehension, I telegraphed this passage to St. Petersburg, and asked Sir Edward Thornton to ascertain whether M. de Giers agrees that the assurances contained in the telegrams referred to constitute an agreement to the effect stated by Mr. Gladstone. Under these circumstances, I abstain from going further at present into the question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I beg to give Notice that I shall renew the Question to-morrow.

AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES—COLONIAL NAVAL FORCE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in rising to move for Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of any of the Australasian Colonies relative to the formation and maintenance of a Colonial Naval Force, said, he understood that a great deal of Correspondence had passed between the Colonial Office and the Admiralty on this subject. He wished to point out how very essential a Navy was almost to the existence of our Colonies. The Naval Force which we now sent out to the Colonies was totally inadequate at present, and we had done very little indeed towards helping the Colonies to establish a Naval Force of their own. The First Lord of the Admiralty seemed the other night to be under the mistaken impression that he had charged the Admiralty with being hostile to the establishment of a Naval Force in the Colonies. He had not the slightest intention of making any accusation of that kind against the Admiralty; but he did maintain that the effort made by the Colonies in providing themselves with ships did impose on the Admiralty some obligation to meet the natural wishes of the Colonies. The noble Earl the First Lord of the Admiralty had, he believed, said that some kind of assistance had been already given to the Colonies, and that several naval officers were already there. He did not want to underrate that assistance; but it had never been definitely stated by the noble Earl, and the information he possessed on the subject had been picked up piecemeal here and there. The Colonies were extremely anxious for their self-defence, and were more or less waiting for the Admiralty to make some proposal to them. The noble Earl was of opinion that the initiative should come from the Colonies; but for his own part he ventured to think that they had already taken a step in advance, and it was therefore now open to the Government to make some proposal which would lead to the formation of a Colonial Force. It appeared to him that two courses lay open to the Admiralty. They might either send out an experienced officer to organize the whole of the local Marine—and it so happened that an officer who would command the highest respect had been named as quite willing to go out and organize a Naval Force, and if he were to do so it would not be long before there was a Force in existence—or they might name a certain number of officers to serve in the Colonies for a limited number of years, their pay being defrayed by the Colonies and their promotion being allowed to go on in the same way as at present. The latter course would be acceptable to many naval officers who were now in a state of enforced idleness. Looking at the Navy List, he found that there were 70 captains, about 75 commanders, and between 80 and 90 lieutenants at present unemployed. As to the first proposal, there was a precedent for it, as in former days, when the East India Company maintained a Navy of its own, the Admiralty used to send out a distinguished naval officer who had the sole management of the Bombay Marine. What the Colonies now required was a body of trained naval officers to enable them to form a Navy. The Colonies had a certain number of men who might easily be trained to the management of torpedo vessels to be used for the protection of their harbours. Such a torpedo force would be of the greatest value in protecting the local commerce of these Colonies, which amounted to some 10,000,000 tons per annum, and their enormous coast-line.

If the noble Earl would take the initiative for the purpose of forming a federation of the Colonies in the matter of defence, he would find the Colonies most ready to receive any suggestion he might make. He urged the Admiralty to place cadetships at the disposal of the Colonies with the object of developing the maritime spirit of the Colonists. In conclusion, he begged to submit the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Address for—

"Copies of or extracts from Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of any of the Australasian Colonies relative to the formation and maintenance of a Colonial naval force."—(The Viscount Sidmouth.)

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I have been requested by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) to answer the Questions of the noble Viscount opposite. The noble Viscount asked whether applications had been made by the Australian Colonies of Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia, for advice and assistance as to manning vessels of war. I have to state in reply that such applications have been received, and that they have been in every case freely and fully complied with. I may further say that the Admiralty have received warm thanks from the Agents General for the way in which they have acted in the matter. I can assure the noble Viscount that many officers of merit in Her Majesty's Navy would be glad to go out to the Colonies in the capacity of training officers, and if any applications are made from the Colonies for further assistance your Lordships may be satisfied that the Admiralty will give them every assistance. I can also state that suggestions have been made by the Government as to the general scope of the Naval Force in the Colonies, and much assistance has been rendered by the Construction Department of the Admiralty in the supervision of the ships which have been built for the Colonies. During the last few years there have been constant communications between the Agents General for the Colonies and the Admiralty on the subject, and the Naval Commander-in-Chief in Australia has also been in frequent communication with the Governments of the Colonies in reference to their Naval Forces. In reply to the next Question of the noble Viscount, I have to state that there have been proposals made by the Admiralty as to a scheme of organization of a Colonial Naval Force; but the Admiralty are of opinion generally that it is not desirable that they should initiate any such scheme, but should leave the Colonies themselves to initiate it. In order, however, to facilitate the initiation of such a scheme, Rear Admiral Tryon, before he left this country as Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's vessels in the Australian waters, had communications with my noble Friend the Colonial Secretary and myself, in order that he might be able to lay before the Australian Governments the views of Her Majesty's Government on this matter, which has been very carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government during the last three years. The next Question of the noble Viscount, being based upon the supposition that nothing has been done in the direction it indicated, falls to the ground, inasmuch as the Admiralty have already stated that they will be most happy to assist in every way those Colonies who wish to form a Navy, if their Agents General will be so good as to communicate with them upon the matter; and I now publicly invite such communications to be made to us. As to the Question referring to nominations to cadetships in the Navy, I have to say that a certain number of nominations have been thrown open to the Colonies for many years, and the Colonial young gentlemen are admitted to the Navy upon passing a qualifying examination. These cadetships are annually given on the recommendation of the Colonial Secretary, so that the noble Viscount's suggestion upon this matter has been met by anticipation. With regard to the Motion, I assent to it, with the qualification that such Papers as can properly be given shall be laid on the Table.

Viscount Sidmouth

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that his noble Friend might congratulate himself upon having elicited from the Government a very important statement, and one which was well worthy of the attention of the House, and their Lordships would read the Papers moved for with very great interest, because he understood that many applications had been made, and that they would show what it was that the Colonies wanted and what the Government were willing to do. It seemed to him, however, from the statement of the noble Earl opposite, that the whole burden of initiating a Colonial Naval Force had been thrown upon the Colonies instead of Her Majesty's Government taking it upon themselves. It was in the memory of many Members of that House that some few years ago an Act was passed for the purpose of establishing a Colonial Navy, and it was a question of no small interest why that Act had failed to answer the expectations and intentions of those who desired that it should be passed. That Act had, however, failed to secure that amount of naval discipline which was not only desirable, but absolutely necessary, in a Colonial Force, and to bring it into close connection with the British Navy. One objection was that the Australian Colonies were either unwilling or, at all events, unprepared to accept joint liability for the defence of the Empire. The facts had disproved this, and there could now be no doubt as to what the disposition of the Colonies was. But there was also another objection which claimed great consideration, and that was that Australian ships must never be removed from Australia for Imperial purposes. He was bound to say there was great reason in that objection. His own view, however, was that, first, they should be able to secure that any ship or ships created by Australian expenditure should be maintained on the Australian Coast; and, secondly, that those ships should be brought into connection with the Empire, and, where practicable, interchanged, becoming part and parcel of the Imperial Naval Force. He owned he was disposed to go a step beyond his noble Friend. He thought there would be no harm in arranging that every Australian officer in the Australian Naval Service should directly hold the Queen's commission; secondly, that they should give to the Australian Government or Colony the same number of commissions as would be represented by ships which they established and maintained. These ships should be placed—and he would admit of no compromise on this point—under the direct control of the English Admiralty. Nothing short of this would secure the incorporation which they wished to see effected between the Colonial and Home Naval Forces of this country. Either these Colonial ships should be maintained on the Colonial station or rendered available and interchangeable in time of extreme peril. It had been his lot to watch the growth of feeling in the Colonies on this subject. In 1878 he made proposals to these great Colonies with regard to incurring joint liability with the Mother Country in various matters, and, among others, in naval matters; and if his proposal had been adopted much of the trouble which had since arisen in the South Pacific would have been prevented. Still later he was Chairman of a Colonial Commission; and there was then much more practical co-operation than before. That was four or five years ago. Since then they had advanced nearer to a common ground. He deprecated the conduct of the Government in not taking the initiative in this matter; and he sincerely trusted that the result of recent communications between the Imperial Government and the Colonies would be to further advance that most desirable of objects—a closer co-operation between those great Colonies and the Mother Country.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, everybody was agreed as to the desirability of the object referred to by the noble Earl. It was the wish of the Colonies as well as that of the Imperial Government. They were also all agreed that it was desirable the Colonies should assist in providing for their own defence; but there would be no disposition on our part to drive a hard bargain. On the contrary, the disposition would be to deal liberally with the Colonies. But he was free to say that he went further than this, and that he agreed with his noble Friend that the time was very auspicious for the consideration of these questions. There was no doubt various circumstances had arisen to develop a stronger feeling of self-defence and desire to co-operate with the other parts of the British Empire than had existed before. He did not, however, think they could bring forward any plan of naval defence until after the creation of a Federal Authority, which should be able to represent and speak in the name of the Australian Colonies collectively. They could not deal with a question of this kind with several divided Authorities. Then his noble Friend said that this was a question as to which the Imperial Government ought to take the initiative, and that the Government ought not to leave the matter to merely local action. The question of securing joint action between the Australian and Imperial Navy was one that had been carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government; and he was able to say that the Admiral who had lately gone out to that station was in possession of a plan carefully prepared and considered by the Admiralty in concert with the Colonial Office. He hoped that the result would be to create an arrangement which, whether permanent or not, would, at any rate, meet the necessities of the time. He was unable at a moment's notice to pronounce any opinion upon the plan sketched out by the noble Earl opposite; but, to show that the subject was not one easy to dispose of, he might point out, on the one hand, that the Colonies had a right to ask that the funds locally raised should be expended for the purpose of local defence; while, on the other, it was obvious that local defence could not be effectually provided unless it was dealt with as part of a general plan. How to reconcile these apparently conflicting requirements was the problem to be solved. It would be much simplified when they got a Federal Authority to speak in the name of all these Colonies; in the meanwhile, he could only assure their Lordships that the matter was not neglected, and that Her Majesty's Government were making overtures on the subject, and that Papers on the matter would be laid on the Table without unnecessary delay.

Motion agreed to.

EGYPT (THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE)
—ARMY CHAPLAINS IN THE SOUDAN.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return of the number of the chaplains attached to Her Majesty's forces in the Soudan, and the distribution of them," said, he had noticed that Army chaplains had not been present with the Soudan Expedition: but he was sure there was no wish on their part to be absent from any place where their services might be required. He perfectly understood that the distribution of both combatants and non-combatants must be left to the discretion of the General in command, and he was also aware that no General desired to attach to his Force any more non-combatants than necessary. Still, it must not be forgotten that the ministrations of the chaplains to the wounded, the sick, and the dying were just as essential as the medicines served out from the ambulance tent. If the chaplains were absent from the front, he was sure it was from no wish of their own. The post of the chaplains was naturally that of duty and danger, and they wished nothing better than to accompany the officers whom it was their business to attend. The noble Earl concluded by making his Motion.

Address for—

"Return of the number of the chaplains attached to Her Majesty's forces in the Soudan, and the distribution of them."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that he had not the slightest objection to grant the Return asked for. He could tell the noble Earl the number of chaplains now in Egypt and the Soudan. There were now in Egypt, independently of those at Alexandria, Cairo, and other points on the Lower Nile, 12 Army chaplains; of these five were Church of England, three Roman Catholic, two Presbyterian, and two Wesleyan. At Suakin the number of chaplains was as follows:—Two Church of England, two Roman Catholic, one Presbyterian, and one Wesleyan. As regarded the distribution of the chaplains, there was such a constant change going on that he was unable to give their present distribution. There was no wish that the chaplains should be kept away from the front or wherever their duty called them, and he was quite certain that it would be the earnest wish of the chaplains themselves to be present wherever required, no matter what the danger might be. As his noble Friend had stated, the distribution of the chaplains rested with the General commanding the troops, and he could only say that the Authorities at headquarters were most anxious that the services of the chaplains to administer the consolations of religion to the wounded and the dying should be available whenever required.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that it must have been noticed that the funerals of some of the most eminent persons who had been unfortunately killed in the Sudan had been performed by laymen—it might be presumed, because no clergy were at hand. He had also seen letters speaking of the want of chaplains to attend to the sick and dying at the front. The chaplains had no duty on foreign service with an Army more important than attendance on the wounded, the sick, and the dying; and those who had gone to Egypt earnestly desired to exercise their ministrations to the utmost and not to be kept idle. He might add that chaplains had often proved useful on other occasions, as well as in attending the sick and dying. The responsibility of the distribution of the chaplains, he was well aware, must rest with the General in command; but it seemed to him that to forbid the chaplains to carry out their special work—that of attending the wounded—would be the same thing as the sanitary authority of a town in which cholera prevailed, forbidding the clergy from exerting themselves for the relief of the sufferers, at the very time when they were most able and most anxious to be of service. The chaplains were few in number, and, few as they were, their services were most important, and the men devoted to their work.

The Earl of Derby

Motion agreed to.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SUDAN. — COLONIES' MILITARY SERVICE

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty humbly thanking Her Majesty for having graciously accepted the loyal offer of military service from New South Wales, and expressing the satisfaction with which this House has heard the announcement that the like loyal offers of military service from other Colonies, and also from India, will, should occasion arise, be duly accepted."

said, that his Motion appeared to be a natural supplement to what had already been said in the House that evening with reference to a Colonial Navy. Happily for their Lordships, he was incapable of lengthened speech; but, happily for himself, he believed the Motion to be one that would commend itself to the favourable consideration of their Lordships. Amid the innumerable troubles that had recently come upon them they could, at least, look with pride and satisfaction at the general conduct of their Army in the field, and at the courage, the discipline, the endurance and dash of their troops under the most trying circumstances. They could also look with pride at the enthusiasm with which all ranks and all conditions of their soldiers had left for the seat of war, accompanied by the cheers of a sympathetic people. But if there was one thing at the present time more than another which was a just cause for national pride and satisfaction, it was the love for the Mother Country shown by their great Colonies in their hearty, loyal offers of military service in the Sudan. There was a section—happily, but a small section—of politicians, unrepresented, he was confident, in their Lordships' House, who held that England would be happier and more prosperous if shorn of her Colonies, and even if deprived of her Indian Empire. As regarded their Indian Empire, the answer to those who would wish to see India separated from the Empire was given in the hearty offers of assistance which had come from the Native Indian Princes, and the ready services of the Indian troops in the Sudan; and within the last few days the Prime Minister himself had stated that, however disunited England might be on other questions, she was united in her determination that India, the Koh-i-Noor of the British Crown, should not be struck from off it. But as regarded the separation of the Colonies from England, there had never been a time in their history when the ties between them and the Mother Country had been so strong and so hearty as at the present time. Why, what had they seen lately? A League for the federation of the Colonies had been formed in this country, at the head of which was Mr. Forster, and of which his noble Friend the most recent addition to the Government the Earl of Rosebery was a distinguished member. The object of this League was to draw closer the ties and means of defence as between the Colonies and the Empire. This question of the federation of the Colonies was one upon which there was considerable difference of opinion as to how it should be effected; and as in the few remarks he intended to make he did not wish to enter into any controversial question, he would not discuss the best form of federation. There was, however, nothing which could contribute more to the strength of the Empire than a defensive union of the Colonies with the Mother Country. The dream of his life had been to see his country strong. He wished to see England strong, not that she might go hectoring, bullying, blustering through the world, unnecessarily seizing unoccupied territory, or treading on the susceptibilities of other nations. He wished to see England strong, because he wished that Empire which had been handed down by those who had gone before them to be transmitted, unimpaired, to those who were to come after them. Especially did he wish to see England strong in the interests of peace, because he thought that nothing would contribute more to the peace of the world than the knowledge that England was united and strong. And, as he had said, if there was one thing more than another which would make their Empire strong, it was a defensive union between the Colonies and the Mother Country—the good of all being the care of each, and the good of each the care of all. Nothing could strengthen the hands of a Foreign Minister more than the knowledge that any foreign country would have to deal not simply with these little storm-beaten Islands in a Northern Sea, but would be face to face with an Empire, or rather a congeries of Empires, scattered over the whole habitable world. The Colonies by their action had in a great measure solved the question of federation. If he was rightly informed, Members of the Cabinet had been in communication with the Agents General of the Colonies for the purpose of discussing the question of mutual defences; and little more was necessary in the matter of federation than the systematizing in the future what had now been done. But, be that as it might, he held that the offers made by the Colonies formed a great event in our history. No doubt, the Colonies had on previous occasions come forward with offers of assistance, one instance of which was commemorated in the name of what had formerly been the 100th Regiment, now the Royal Canadians. They had heard, too, how the Australian Colonies had offered naval help; but this was the first time that such offers had taken so concrete a form. It was an event pregnant with a great and untold future. Seeing, then, the unanimity throughout this country in appreciating the action of the Colonies in this matter, he thought it was desirable that their Lordships' House should give expression to this universal national sentiment, and that there should be some record on their Journals fuller than the casual reference made to the subject in the debate on calling out of the Reserves. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would now unanimously agree—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty humbly thanking Her Majesty for having graciously accepted the loyal offer of military service from New South Wales; and expressing the satisfaction with which this House has heard the announcement that the like loyal offers of military service from other Colonies, and also from India, will, should occasion arise, be duly accepted.”

And when they remembered the gracious words addressed by Her Majesty to the Colonies with reference to this matter, they had the satisfaction of knowing that in carrying such an Address to the Queen they would be acting in unison with the sentiments of their Sovereign.

Moved, “That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty humbly thanking Her Majesty for having graciously accepted the loyal offer of military service from New South Wales; and expressing the satisfaction with which this House has heard the announcement that the like loyal offers of military service from other Colonies, and also from India, will, should occasion arise, be duly accepted.”—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

LORD NORTON said, that he yielded to none in high appreciation of the loyal offers of military co-operation on the part of the Colonies; but he thought that it would be a poor compliment to such revived loyalty to treat it as something new. By doing so they could only show how soon they would forget such loyalty, and that they had already forgotten that the same loyalty enlisted Colonists a century ago to fight by the side of British troops against great French Armies in America, and even to acquire fresh territories for the Crown—by troops entirely equipped and paid for by themselves, as much as our own were. He believed the Australians would take it as an affront if this House or Her Majesty were in any way to thank them for the military services which they now offered, as if it were a contribution from allies, and not from fellow-subjects. It was in that spirit they had made the offer, and the enlistment was made in the desire to be part of the Imperial Army, and their pride was now to fight side by side with fellow-subjects in the Sudan. That was a much better kind of Imperial inter-community than any of the vague and impracticable notions that had been thrown out lately about Imperial federation. The relationship between this country and her Colonies had gone down to zero, and was becoming little better than that of Imperial patronage and Colonial dependency. A few years ago we had been taxed at home to the amount of £4,000,000 a-year for Colonial Military Expenditure, to which the Colonies had contributed not a shilling, either for local or general defence. This sort of connection by patronage must have soon gone on from degradation to separation. But this event showed a return of healthier relations, which alone could make connection permanent, relations in which they all alike shared in the burdens as well as privileges of citizenship. Wars were called Imperial, as if the Colonies were not part of the Empire. But they wished to be so. Peace and war were in the breast of the common Sovereign only checked by refusal of Supplies. Their Lordships knew as little of the meaning and intention of the present war as the Australians themselves. They could refuse Supplies, as the House of Commons might, towards it, but in the spirit of common citizenship they had nobly voted them, and the Crown might thank them, as well as the House of Commons. The interests of world-wide commerce were the originating cause of this present war, equally affecting all the British Empire. He wished the Colonial Defence Act of 1865 had more largely drawn out Colonial Naval Service to Her Majesty, as ships of war were furnished a century ago by the Colonies to George III. He cordially joined in the satisfaction expressed in the Motion, but would add a hope that the offered services might not be so soon forgotten as similar former services had been, and that they might take them as services rendered to the Crown in common with those of Her Majesty's subjects at home.

The Earl of Wemyss

VISCOUNT BURY said, he hoped that it would be understood that on both sides and in every quarter of the House the Motion made by his noble Friend on the Cross Benches was accepted with enthusiasm. That was a Motion which ought to be passed with entire unanimity; and they would only be expressing the feelings of all classes of the community when they gave expression to the sentiments of pleasure to which his noble Friend had referred. He could not but feel somewhat sorry that his noble Friend had thought it right to diverge from the main subject on which they were all agreed to that of the question of a federation of the Empire which his noble Friend behind him had taken up. For himself, he believed that the federation of the Empire was a fait accompli now; that what they now witnessed was really the habitual feeling on the part of the Colonies; and that whenever any danger arose to England that sentiment would always come to the front, and would animate all their English-speaking Colonies. He confessed that he was sorry that the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial Office did not accept the services of all the Colonies in a somewhat different manner. It would have made all the difference in the world if all the offers from all the Colonies had been accepted, and if they had been informed that it was merely a question of military expediency when those offers should be made to take effect.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS explained that though he had made a passing allusion to the Federation League he had carefully avoided going into that question at all.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I quite agree with the noble Viscount who spoke last (Viscount Bury) that this is a Motion which it is eminently desirable that we should assent to with absolute unanimity, and without the introduction of any controversial matter. It is a Motion to which the Members of the Government can entertain no objection, because it is one approving of the course which they have thought it right to advise Her Majesty to take; and for that very reason it is obviously a Motion which we could not have initiated, its chief importance arising from its being the expression of an entirely independent feeling on the part of the Members of this House. If the Motion had been likely to lead to any discussion of a controversial character, I certainly should not have advised or encouraged the noble Earl on the Cross Benches

(the Earl of Wemyss) to bring it forward, and I think that he himself would have been actuated by the same feeling. Although the Motion is in its terms an expression of approval of the course taken by the Government, I consider that the compliment involved in it to be only in form addressed to us, and to be really intended, as we all understand, for those Colonies whose patriotic and public-spirited offers we are anxious to recognize. We have only had to accept those offers; we have done it willingly, and we have in both Houses of Parliament endeavoured—I myself in your Lordships' House, and the First Lord of the Treasury in the other House in far more eloquent language than any I could command—to give expression to what I believe is the unanimous feeling of every Party and every class in this country—namely, our cordial gratitude for, and admiration of, this display of loyalty and public spirit. This Motion only confirms and emphasizes the language held on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The noble Earl touched very lightly on an expression of regret that somewhat different answers were sent to different Colonies. On a former occasion I explained—and I would explain it again if it were necessary—that that difference in the answers arose simply from the different conditions on which the various offers were made. I do not think it is necessary that I should refer now to what the noble Earl on the Cross Benches said as to the existence of a school whose object is to get rid of the Colonies. I have heard a great deal of denunciation of that school; but having sat for a considerable time in this and in the other House of Parliament and watched the course of opinion on the question, I cannot remember to have heard that sentiment expressed by any person of the slightest importance or consideration. What I know many people did say 30 years ago was that if the more important Colonies which had obtained free institutions should show themselves, as many persons expected they would, unwilling to remain in the Empire, it would not be our duty or our interest to retain them by force; but I never heard anyone in this or the other House of Parliament contend that it was our duty or our interest to turn out of the Empire Colonies which desired to remain connected with it of their own free will. We have seen that the effect of the grant of those free institutions and of leaving those Colonies to manage their own local affairs in their own way has not been, as some predicted it would be, to weaken, but rather to strengthen, the ties between the Colonies and the Mother Country; and I do not believe that there was ever a time when they were more closely connected with or more warmly attached to the Empire than they are at this moment. Neither shall I go into the very interesting and difficult question of federation to which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Norton) alluded. Federation is a word of many meanings, which is used by different speakers in different senses. We have proof of that in what we have heard this evening; and no one who has paid any attention to what has occurred at public meetings can fail to have noticed that when men express their wish for federation on the one hand, or their disbelief in federation on the other, they are talking of quite different things, and that they have no one definite plan before them. If federation means only a voluntary co-operation for purposes of defence—which is the interpretation put on it by the noble Lord opposite—then I agree with him that we have it now, and I hope that we may have it for long. If, on the other hand, it means a system of federal union founded on fixed and settled rules such as those which exist in the case of the United States of America, then I think that we had better wait to discuss propositions of that kind until we have them before us in some practical shape. Expressing my own personal and individual opinion, I do not think that that will be very soon. I will not go into the subject; but an obvious difficulty in the way of any scheme of formal federation lies in the immense disproportion between the number of inhabitants of the British Islands and the number in the Colonies. In these Islands you have a population of some 35,000,000 or 36,000,000, whereas there are only 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 in all the English-speaking Colonies; and if you form an Imperial Council, call it by what name you please, and if in that Council every part of the Empire is to be represented in proportion to its population and its importance, the result would be that the Representatives of the British Islands would carry everything their own way, and the Colonists, even if they were united to a man, would be absolutely outvoted and absolutely powerless. If, therefore, such a body had powers of taxation, I do not say that you would altogether have a system of taxation without representation; but you would have what was practically very nearly the same thing. And, further, with reference to some of the proposals which have been made, with a view of bringing about federation, it is obvious that they could not be carried out without introducing changes in the Constitution as regards the relations between the Executive and the Legislature far wider than any which have yet been attempted in this country. But let me add one proviso. It ought not to be considered that those who do not see their way to any plan of federation are, on that account, indifferent to the extreme importance of consolidating, as far as may be, the various parts of the Empire. But, returning to what is immediately before us, I do not think I ought to sit down without mentioning what more properly belongs to the Department of my noble Friend the Earl of Kimberley—namely, the loyal assistance which has been offered by several of the Native Princes of India. Such expressions of loyalty and good feeling, on the part of persons situated as they are, are of the highest possible importance, and not merely as a matter of sentiment, but of practical service. I anticipate that your Lordships will, without opposition, accept the Motion of the noble Earl; and when the news is telegraphed out, as it will be, to those distant Provinces which are most concerned, I have no doubt that the mark of respect and gratitude which you have paid to the Colonists will be received by them in the same spirit in which it is offered.

The Earl of Derby

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I only rise to confirm the statement of the noble Earl, that, as far as I know, the assent to this Motion is unanimous in every portion of the House. I shall not travel into any of the adventitious and somewhat controversial matters which have gathered round this Motion, and which, I think, were unnecessary to its discussion. I shall not even attempt to emulate the feat of the noble Earl opposite of arguing against a plan which he himself acknowledged was not in existence. All I think it necessary to say is that there has been very strong feeling in this country in response to the exhibition of affectionate sympathy which has reached us from the Colonies; that there is no subject on which this country feels so strongly as their desire that cordial relations of amity and goodwill should exist between them and those of their own race in other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions. That feeling has been eminently gratified by the exhibition of loyalty and patriotism which the Colonists have shown. We are very grateful to the Native Princes of India, as the noble Earl has said, for having also exhibited their affection for the Empire under which they have so long been protected, and to the people who have done their utmost to maintain their interests and promote their welfare. But, of course, we feel still more strongly such indications of good feeling when they come from our own blood—from those who have so lately quitted our own shores. I think the feeling is universal that in acting as they have done the Colonists have shown that they are true Englishmen, and have behaved in a manner worthy of the race from which they have sprung, and the splendid Empire of which they form so important a factor.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS wished to make it clear to their Lordships that he had put the Motion down without consulting any Member of their Lordships' House.

Motion agreed to, nemine dissentiente.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

EAST INDIA EXPENSES. MILITARY EXPEDITION TO THE SUDAN.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in rising to move—

"That Her Majesty having directed a military expedition of Her native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Sudan and Nubia, this House resolves that the ordinary pay of such troops as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable; Provided that, if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said expedition," said: Your Lordships are, no doubt, aware that the small Contingent of Indian troops which has proceeded to Suakin consists practically of three regiments of Infantry and a regiment of Cavalry. That measure was taken at the request of Lord Wolseley, and the reason why we have now to move this Resolution is to be found in the 5th section of the Act "for the Better Government of India," 1858, which requires the consent of both Houses of Parliament before Indian troops can be employed for any other purpose than to prevent or repel actual invasion. The other House has passed a Resolution similar to that which I am about to propose. It has been necessary for us to consider which precedent on this subject we are to follow. The first occasion was that of the war in China in 1839-40. In that case all the ordinary charges were borne by the Government of India, and the extraordinary charges by this country. Then came the war with Persia in 1856, in which the ordinary expenses were borne by the Indian Exchequer, and the extraordinary divided equally between the Indian and the English Exchequers. In the next case—that of the Abyssinian War, which precedent we have followed on this occasion—the whole ordinary charges were borne by India, and the extraordinary by England. In the Expedition to Malta in 1878 the whole of the expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, were borne by the British Exchequer. In the last case—the Expedition to Egypt—the whole of the ordinary expenses were borne by India, and the extraordinary charges were divided between India and this country in the proportion of six to four, India contributing the larger share. The exact effect of following the Abyssinian precedent is that India will stand exactly in the same position as if the troops had never left her shores. England undertakes all the extraordinary expenditure, direct and indirect, so that if it were necessary to replace any of these

The Earl of Kimberley

Forces the expense would fall upon this country. In the case of the war in Abyssinia, I confess I am not able to see what special interest India had; but there is no question that Egypt is a country in which India has a special interest, and the war in the Soudan has arisen directly from the necessity of protecting Egypt. I will merely mention that we have every confidence that, in this as in every other service which they may be called upon to undertake, the Indian troops will well and faithfully and nobly discharge their duty. The regiments which are being sent are all well known. They are the 17th Bengal Infantry, the gallant Sikh Regiment, the 28th Regiment of the Bombay Army, of which General Hardinge speaks in the highest terms, and also the regiment of Bengal Cavalry, the 9th, called Hodson's Horse. Neither is the Madras Army without representation, for it has sent 150 Sappers, who have a high reputation. Although the force is small, there is every reason to suppose that it will be able to render most important and valuable service to the Suakin Expedition.

Moved to resolve—

"That Her Majesty having directed a military expedition of Her native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Soudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable: Provided that, if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said expedition."—(The Earl of Kimberley.)

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA said, it appeared to him that the proposed arrangement was eminently just and fair. Those who advised the Government of India to reduce the Indian Army below the strength which the most experienced officers considered necessary for its defence relied on being able to demand immediate assistance from England on any danger arising in India; and it was only just and fair that India should return that assistance when necessary.

Motion agreed to.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND)

BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to reorganize the educational endowments of Ireland—Was presented by The Lord President, read 1^o (No. 44.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 16th March, 1885.

MINUTES.—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Thomas Russell, esquire, for Glasgow City.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES, CIVIL SERVICES—(CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS, CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS—£3,633,650, VOTE ON ACCOUNT, CIVIL SERVICE EXPENSES.

PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading—Local Authorities (Expenses of Conferences) * [88].

QUESTIONS.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—ARKLOW BREAKWATER.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he has received the special report called for on the subject of Arklow Breakwater, the foundations of which have given way, and whether he can state its purport; whether it is the fact that the grant of £15,000 and loan of £20,000 barely cover the contract and purchase-money paid to the Wicklow Copper Mining Company for their interests in the harbour; whether he can now give any estimate of the probable cost for extra work consequent on the failure; whether the ratepayers who guaranteed repayment of the loan, and who, through their representatives, condemned the plans of the Board of Works from the first, can now be held responsible or be called on to pay anything outside the amount guaranteed; and, whether the Government will fulfil their part by completing the harbour works in a satisfactory manner without further cost to the ratepayers?

MR. HIBBERT: This matter is still under inquiry, and, pending the receipt of a definite Report, which will be made as soon as possible, it would be premature to make any comment on the specific statements and Questions of the hon. Member. I can only assure him that the subject shall have my best attention.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—HORSES FOR OFFICERS.

MR. CURRY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the privilege of keeping a private horse, or otherwise, which was granted some years ago to the resident magistracy, will now be extended to the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not quite understand the Question of the hon. Gentleman. The officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary are, and have been for many years, required to keep a private horse, for which they draw forage allowance.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS—CLOONCLARE DISTRICT, CO. LEITRIM.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the extensive parish of Cloonclare (county Leitrim), within which are held the Petty Session Courts of Manorhamilton and Kiltyclogher, there is only one resident magistrate, Mr. Algeo, and whether Mr. Algeo is now prevented by old age and feeble health from discharging magisterial duty, and the business of the Courts of Manorhamilton and Kiltyclogher is left to depend upon the casual attendance of justices living outside those districts; whether three resident gentlemen, Mr. Michael Maguire, Mr. Laurence M'Dermott, and Mr. John M'Grimes, junior, have been recommended by Catholic clergymen, Poor Law Guardians, ratepayers, and others in North Leitrim, for appointment to the Commission of the Peace, and whether the Lord Chancellor will appoint them; whether Mr. Thomas Corcadden, of Hollymount, has been recommended; and, if so, by whom; whether his position is that of tenant of grass farms; whether he has been continually under police protection for a long time past; and, whether there is any intention to appoint him?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I find that 20 Petty Sessions were appointed to be held in this district in the six months to the 31st December last, and that only one fell through for want of magistrates. Mr. Algeo attended 13 of these. He is the only local magistrate who attends at Kiltyclogher; but there are four others who attend at Manorhamilton. The names of the gentlemen mentioned have been before the Lord Chancellor and the Lieutenant of the county; but it has not been found possible to appoint them. Mr. Corscadden, who has a property of close on £600 a-year, has been appointed on the recommendation of the Lieutenant of the county. He had been under police protection; but it was withdrawn, at his own request, in August last.

NAVY—WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF WARRANT OFFICERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Board will now consider the question of compassionate allowances to the widows and orphans of Warrant Officers who have not died on active service?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: The widows of warrant officers who do not die from the effects of injuries received on duty receive pensions of £25 a-year. It is not proposed to alter these pensions, or to make special provision for children.

NAVY—NAVAL PENSIONERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended to give to Naval Pensioners employed on the Permanent Staff of the Steam Reserve, and to Non-Commissioned Officers and men of the Royal Marines, employed on the Permanent Staff of the Auxiliary Forces, the advantages now accorded to Army Pensioners on the Permanent Staff?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: It is not intended to give pensioners employed in the Steam Reserve any additional pension for such service. The system on which pensions are given in the Navy is not analogous to that in force in the Army. Marine pensioners employed on the permanent Staff of the Auxiliary Forces will receive the same rate of extra pension as is accorded to Army pensioners.

SCOTLAND—INSPECTION OF RIVERS UNDER "THE RIVERS POLLUTION PREVENTION ACT, 1876."

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether there is at present in Scotland any Inspector of Rivers under "The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876;" and, if not, when it is intended to appoint one?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said there had been an Inspector of Rivers; but he understood his appointment was not to be renewed. The proper method of making the inspection of rivers in Scotland was at present under consideration.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPH STATION AT LEITRIM.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Postmaster General, If the Post Office authorities have as yet decided to establish a telegraph station in the town of Leitrim, taking into consideration the fact that twelve fairs are held annually in that town, and that a most influential memorial calling the attention of the Post Office authorities to this subject, and signed by the entire of the Leitrim Grand Jury, and by traders, farmers, and cattle dealers, was forwarded, several weeks ago, to the Post Office authorities?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Memorial alluded to by the hon. Member, which was addressed to the Acting Secretary of the Post Office in Dublin, did not reach his hands until the 2nd instant. Inquiries are being made on the subject of the Memorial, and as soon as they are completed I will look into the matter, and see whether it is possible to meet the wishes of the Memorialists.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—INADEQUATE SENTENCE—CASE OF CHARLES FOSTER, LEEDS ASSIZES.

MR. BARRAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a prosecution conducted on behalf of the Treasury at the Leeds Assizes in November last before Mr. Baron Pollock, when Charles Foster pleaded guilty to charges of forgery under aggravated circumstances, in reference to two sums of £12,000 and £3,000, and was sentenced by the learned judge to two months' imprisonment without hard labour; and, whether the existing law is adequate to deal with so grave an offence, or if he is aware of any circumstances, in law or otherwise, which would account for the light character of the sentence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the Crown had the power of remitting a sentence which might appear to be excessive; but it had no power to make a sentence more severe. All he could say was that the ordinary law was quite sufficient for the punishment of offences of this character.

MOROCCO.—FRAUDULENT CLAIMS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS AGAINST NATIVES.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the inquiry made into the alleged fraudulent claims of British subjects against Natives of Morocco, and the assurance he gave, in November last, that the matter would not be allowed to drop. Whether he will lay Mr. Payton's Report of the Casablanca investigation upon the Table of the House?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Mr. Consul Payton reported on the conduct of a Consular official for the information of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State, on receipt of the Report, discharged the official concerned; but it is not a public document, and could not properly be laid on the Table.

MOROCCO.—JUDICIAL CRUELTY.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to a statement in The Globe of 17th February that, on a charge of having stolen a bullock, a man's eyes were cut out by order of one of the local authorities in Morocco; and, will Her Majesty's Government continue to protect the Sultan of Morocco from Foreign aggression without insisting on the reform of his administration?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have no official information of such an outrage having been committed; but Her Majesty's Minister will be instructed to report upon the facts of the case. Her Majesty's Representative at Tangiers exerts all the influence which he can bring to bear to prevent abuses in the administration of Morocco, and to promote reform.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—CHELTENHAM MEDICAL OFFICER OF HEALTH

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the action of the Town Council of Cheltenham in electing, on 2nd February last, to the office of Medical Officer of Health of that town a gentleman who at the time of his appointment did not possess all the qualifications required under the Orders of the Local Government Board with respect to the appointment and duties of such officers, Section 1, Article 1; whether, in contravention of the said orders, Section 2, Article 4, a notification of the said appointment, instead of being made to the Local Government Board within seven days, was delayed until the 25th of February, by which time the gentleman elected had furnished himself with the qualification of which he was deficient at the time of his election; and, what steps the Local Government Board propose to take in the matter?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL, who replied, said: It appears that the Town Council of Cheltenham, last month, appointed to the office of Medical Officer of Health a gentleman who at that time possessed a surgical qualification only. He had since obtained a medical qualification. The appointment was not reported to the Board within the time required by the regulations. The Board have asked for particulars as to the appointment; but I may state that, seeing that the gentleman elected has now both a medical and a surgical qualification, the Board would not regard the fact that at the time of election he had one qualification only as being in itself a sufficient ground for withholding their sanction to the appointment.

AFRICA (WEST COAST).—THE CAMEROONS

MR. BARRAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the statement contained in the Central News telegram from Berlin, published in The Globe newspaper on Wednesday, March 11th, relating to proposed cessions to Germany at the Cameroons and Victoria, is correct; and, if the result of such cessions will not involve the relinquishment of the British claim to the Cameroons Mountain, and the environment of the Settlement of Victoria by German territory; and, whether the town of Bota is also to be ceded to Germany, this town being part of the district belonging to the Baptist Missionary Society, purchased from King William, of Bimbia, forty years ago by the said Society?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Negotiations for a friendly understanding between England and Germany as to their respective Protectorates in the Niger and Cameroons Districts are pending, but not concluded. Whatever may be the result, proved rights of private persons will be respected. But this is only one portion of the general scheme, by which it is hoped that all the questions which have been under discussion between the two Governments as to West and East Africa and the South Pacific may be settled by mutual concessions. The details will be laid before Parliament as soon as the negotiations are sufficiently advanced.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—CATTLE DISEASE (IRELAND).

MR. CLARE READ asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the number of cattle reported to be attacked with pleuro-pneumonia in the North and South Dublin and Rathdown Unions in January and February 1885; the number of cattle so affected in the rest of Ireland, and in England and in Scotland during those months; and, seeing the large export of store cattle that is carried on through the port of Dublin, if some more stringent and successful measures cannot be taken to eradicate that fatal disease from the cowhouses of that city?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The subject referred to in this Question is one of such importance that I think I shall be justified in going into some detail in answering it. It appears that in the month of January last the number of cattle reported to be attacked with pleuro-pneumonia in the North and South Dublin and Rathdown Unions was 138, and in February 166, or a total of 304. In the rest of Ireland during that time there were only nine cattle reported to be attacked—namely, two in January and seven in February. In the same period in England and Scotland the numbers were, for January, 89; for February, 56—a total of 145. The prevalence of this disease in the Dublin dairy-yards has been engaging the careful attention of Lord Spencer, and some time ago he directed that such members of the Veterinary Staff as could be spared for the purpose should devote their special attention to the state of disease and the working of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act in the Dublin Unions. Accordingly, since the beginning of February last, four, and sometimes five, Government Veterinary Inspectors have been occupied in making careful examination of the cattle in the dairy-yards of the city and suburbs, and have detected a considerable number of cases of disease. They have also obtained several convictions against persons for failure to report disease in proper time, and for other offences of the kind. Furthermore, an Order in Council has been passed to enable diseased cattle to be removed for slaughter in properly constructed vans to a specified slaughter-house, instead of having the slaughter carried out in the dairy-yard; and one locality, containing a number of dairy-yards in which disease has been prevalent, was, on the 9th instant, declared to be an infected area. All infected places declared by the local authorities are placed under the supervision of police, and the number of cattle thereon is carefully checked. The infected places are visited by Government Inspectors as often as practicable; and it is hoped that the efforts which are being made will result in a material diminution of the disease in the Unions named.

Mr. Barran

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he cannot now state what provisions in the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill the Government and the Leaders of the Opposition regard as vital, and thereby obviate debate on points that cannot be conceded without destroying the measure?

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked, Whether, considering the number of Amendments on the Paper, relating to the changes in the names of the electoral districts, the Government did not consider that it would tend to shorten the passage of the Bill, if one or two Gentlemen from each Front Bench were to meet and determine what alterations should be made?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: In reply to the last Question, the names excite so much interest that the House would hardly be willing to trust any Members with the final settlement of the subject; and I fear we shall have to discuss the names in the House. Still, I should hope that, on the earlier names, we might arrive at something like general principles. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen), I have to say that the answer of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—that it is unusual to state in advance what points in the measure are vital—is, I fear, the only reply which I can make. It is the intention of the Government to ask the House to adhere closely to the Bill as proposed, except where its provisions are departed from by general consent.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—THE FAMINE IN ZULULAND.

Mr. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Sir Henry Bulwer, Governor of Natal, has taken any steps to relieve the famine now prevailing in Zululand; and, what is the most recent information on the subject which Her Majesty's Government have received from His Excellency?

Mr. EVERLYN ASHLEY: Sir, the only information on the point that we have received from Sir Henry Bulwer relates to the state of distress in the Reserve Territory, mainly owing to the influx of refugees from Zululand proper. Instructions were given to the Sub-Commissioner in the district, to provide for a distribution of mealies to those who, on inquiry, might be found to be in need of relief.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN POLICE AND CLUBS.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the police ever visit those clubs in Dublin which had connected with them men who were convicted for card-sharping and betting; and, whether it is a fact that the only time the police were ever known to enter any of those betting clubs was on one occasion when they were called in to arrest one of the parties for stealing a watch?

Mr. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: Sir, the police frequently visit each one of these clubs. They are not aware that any of the members of the clubs were ever convicted of card-sharping. On one occasion a member of one of the clubs called for and obtained the assistance of a detective to arrest a member of the same club for the alleged larceny of a watch. The case proved to be one of unlawful detention without criminal intent, and the magistrate before whom it came dismissed it.

Mr. BIGGAR: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the police have ever visited the Stephen's Green Club, where a large amount of gambling goes on nightly?

[No reply.]

ISLANDS OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC—THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.

Mr. GORNT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, by a Convention of 1847, the Government of France entered into an engagement formally to acknowledge the independence of Raiatea and other of the Society Islands, and never to take possession of the said Islands, either absolutely or under the title of a Protectorate, or in any form whatever; whether, notwithstanding this Convention, the French flag has been hoisted at Raiatea; at what date this infraction of the Convention took place; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to secure the due observance of the Convention of 1847 on the part of the French Government?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the declaration of 1847 is to the effect stated by the hon. and learned Member. The French flag was hoisted over one of the Islands of the group called Raiatea by a French Naval Commander without the authority of his Government. The incident occurred in 1880. Representations were at once addressed to the French Government, who disavowed the act of their naval officer, but requested that their flag should be allowed to remain temporarily hoisted at Raiatea pending negotiations which had commenced in relation to the declaration. This request was acceded to, and the provisional maintenance of the French flag at Raiatea has been periodically renewed during the negotiations which have been carried on with a good prospect of success.

MR. GORST: Am I right in concluding that the French flag has been flying at Raiatea from 1880 to the present time—that is to say, about five years?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes; that is so.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — THE IRISH CIRCUITS.

MR. GIBSON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Is there any objection to laying upon the Table a Copy of the Report of the Committee of the Irish Judges on the subject of the Irish Circuits?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, that there would be no objection.

NAVY—THE ROYAL NAVAL HOSPITAL, STONEHOUSE.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he is aware that the nurses at the Royal Naval Hospital, Stonehouse (Devon), are often obliged to work nineteen hours a-day (even on Sunday) without remuneration for extra time; and, if he will take steps to stop these protracted hours and limit them to the time for which the nurses stipulated to serve?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: At Plymouth Hospital the nurses are on duty 15 hours a-day—that is, from 6 A.M. to 9 P.M., and when on ordinary night duty, which is three times a-week on an average, have a watch of four hours in addition, without payment for "extra time," so called, except when looking after critical cases, when they get an allowance of 1s. a-night. There are no stipulated hours of duty. Leave is granted for one day a-week and alternate Sundays.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—GOREY PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the population of the Petty Sessions district of Gorey, county Wexford, is principally Catholic; whether all the magistrates attending Gorey Petty Sessions are Protestants; whether he can state what qualifications the two most recently appointed magistrates, Messrs. Turner and Hore, had, and whether one of them has any experience or training except that to be obtained from an insurance and rent office; and, whether there are several Catholic gentlemen in the district perfectly qualified to act as magistrates, and why they have been passed over?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The population of the Gorey district is principally Roman Catholic. I understand the magistrates who attend Petty Sessions there are Protestants. Colonel Hore, who owns a property of £350 a-year, was made a magistrate by the late Lord Chancellor on the recommendation of Lord Maurice Fitzgerald. Mr. Turner, who is agent to a large landowner in the county, was appointed by the present Lord Chancellor on the same recommendation. No such names as those referred to in the last paragraph of the Question have ever been before the present Lord Chancellor.

VOTES OF THANKS—THE CAMPAIGN IN THE SOUDAN.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been directed to Votes of Thanks to officers and men who have gained victories in former wars; whether thanks were not voted for Barossa, Meeanee, the Alma, and on other occasions, without waiting for the conclusion of the campaign; and, whether, having regard to these precedents, Her Majesty's Ministers will take an early opportunity of expressing the gratitude of the House to the brave men who fought at El Teb, Tamai, Abu Klea, Gubat, and Kirbekan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; the statements made in the Question of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman are quite correct, and my attention has been called to them. At the same time, there are precedents, as I pointed out last year, pointing in a somewhat opposite direction. I think I can only repeat the answer I gave the other day—namely, that we consider, in the present state of things, it would be somewhat premature to discuss the question, but that the Government are ready to give it their best consideration, and will endeavour to act on the precedents dealing with the subject.

Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he has considered and is prepared to act on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Technical Instruction in reference to Elementary Education, and more especially the recommendation that linear drawing should be one of the subjects required to be taught in Elementary Schools, as being essential to the education of artisans?

MR. BROADHURST asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether he will endeavour to make provision in the New Code for more efficient instruction in drawing and modelling?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the whole of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Technical Instruction have been for some time past under our consideration; but we feel that it is important that those which apply to elementary schools should be first dealt with, in order that the scholars may be able, when they leave school, to avail themselves of the facilities for technical instruction offered by the Science and Art Department, the City Guilds, and other public Bodies. The recommendations as to drawing in elementary schools are now receiving special attention, and I hope very soon to be able to lay our proposals before the House. With respect to modelling in elementary schools, we are not prepared to go on with it at present, as we are watching an interesting experiment which is now going on at Burslem, on the success of which our decision will somewhat depend.

FRANCE AND CHINA — INTERNATIONAL LAW — SEIZURE OF THE STEAMSHIP "GLENROY."

MR. SUTHERLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has been informed that the British steamship Glenroy has been detained by a French man of war at some distance from Shanghai, and subjected to search, in consequence of (as reported by Lloyd's) having on board a certain quantity of lead, which is, and always has been, a regular article of export from this Country to China; and, if any intimation has been received from the French Government declaring lead, or other ordinary merchandise, as contraband of war; and, if so, whether he will state, for the guidance of shipowners, the view adopted by Her Majesty's Government on this subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have received a telegram from the Governor of Hong Kong to the effect that the British steamer Glenroy had been detained by a French man-of-war, on the 11th instant, between Hong Kong and Shanghai, in consequence of her having on board, as part of her cargo, a shipment of lead, which the French Commander treated as contraband of war. Information has since been received of the release of the Glenroy, the lead having been placed at the disposal of the French authorities. No intimation has been received from the French Government declaring lead or any other merchandise, except rice, contraband of war. Her Majesty's Government have protested against rice being treated generally as contraband of war; but the legality of seizures by belligerents of articles alleged to be contraband of war is a question to be decided, in the first instance, by the competent Prize Court. In the present case, Her Majesty's Government are informed that lead is one of the most common and necessary articles of commerce shipped to China at this season, and is used for making linings for boxes of tea. Having regard, therefore, to the assurances given by the French Government that their right of search would be exercised with forbearance and consideration for the commerce of neutrals, Her Majesty's Government trust that the representations which they propose to make respecting this seizure will result in the release of this shipment.

THE DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS — REWARDS TO CONSTABLES.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the rewards bestowed upon Constables Cole and Cox for their gallant conduct during the recent dynamite explosions, he proposes also to recognize the conduct of Constable King, who, on the night of the explosion at Scotland Yard, removed the dynamite, at great personal risk, from the base of Nelson's Column?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there was no intention to do so. The circumstances of the cases were wholly dissimilar.

NAVY—SHIPS FITTED WITH THE ELECTRIC LIGHT.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What ships we have at Suakin fitted with the electric light, with a view to its being utilised to assist the outposts on dark nights against the stealthy attacks of the Arabs, who are making nightly raids on the camp, and have, on more than one occasion, inflicted injury on the troops; and, whether, on former occasions, the electric light has been found of the greatest use in protecting the outposts from attack?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in reply, said, that some of the ships at Suakin were fitted with the electric light, and it had been in use for some time past.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — QUALIFICATIONS—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS —MR. M. KILKELLY, ATHLONE.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that, at the last Parliamentary revision, Mr. Michael Kilkelly, of Athlone, was objected to by the Conservatives on the ground that he held his premises jointly with several members of his family; whether it is true that the revising barrister disallowed the objection; whether Mr. Kilkelly has been nominated for Poor Law Guardian in Athlone Union; whether the Conservatives have raised the same objection to his qualification that they did before the revising barrister; and, what answer the returning officer intends to give?

MR. LEWIS: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to submit to you, Sir, that the Question is altogether out of Order. It relates to no public matter whatsoever, but refers merely to the claim of a private individual to be placed upon the Parliamentary Register as a voter; to the decision given by the Revising Barrister; and to a further claim made on behalf of the same gentleman to be appointed a Poor Law Guardian. If such a Question is in Order, I fail to see what Question can be held to be irregular.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I also rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask, Sir, whether the hon. Gentleman, in asking you to give a decision on a point of Order, is at liberty to express his own opinion upon the matter?

MR. LEWIS: I am submitting to you, Sir, as a point of Order, that this is simply a Question asking whether the qualification of a certain private individual has been objected to, and what course the Returning Officer intends to take in the matter? I maintain that such a Question violates everything in the nature of decency and Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I must certainly acknowledge that the last paragraph of the Question cannot come within the limits of a proper Question to a Minister of the Crown. It asks "what answer the Returning Officer intends to give;" and I must rule that that portion of the Question is irregular, and cannot be put.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY: Then I will put the Question down to the last line, which, after your ruling, Sir, I will omit.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Well, Sir, the last line is, I think, the only part of the Question I very much care to answer. The facts of the case are these. Mr. Kilkelly's nomination as a Poor Law Guardian has been before the Local Government Board, and they have advised that it should be allowed, which has accordingly been done.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN BOUNDARY.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the important letter from The Times Correspondent with Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission in Afghanistan, which appeared in that paper on the 3rd March, and especially to the following extracts:—

"I have pointed out the great strategic importance of Pul-i-Khatun, a place which has always been considered Afghan, and beyond the pale of discussion. Another important position is Penjdeh, in the Valley of the Murghab. Its inhabitants have always been subject to Afghanistan, and it is occupied by an Afghan garrison. Russia does not desire the definition of the Afghan frontier, for it will put an end to her successful system of stealthy encroachment. . . . Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Caspian were at Krasnovodak and Chikislar, 700 miles from Herat; now they are at Pul-i-Khatun, only 150 miles from Herat. Three years ago the nearest Russian outposts on the road from the Oxus and Merv were at Katra Kurghan, say 500 miles from Herat, now they are at Yolatan, 140 miles from Herat. Nearly all this progress has been made by unopposed encroachments since we evacuated Kandahar."

Sir Frederick Milner

whether it is true that the Russian troops have occupied Zulfagar, 40 miles south of Pul-i-Khatun, Ak-Rabat, and Penjdeh (all four places being on Afghan territory; whether any further advance has been recently made beyond these places, and where Sir Peter Lumsden's force is now stationed; and, whether he can now, consistently with the public interest, state that Her Majesty's Ministers intend to protect the absolute integrity of all Afghan territory, including these important positions, from Russian occupation and influence, in accordance with their own pledges and those of the Czar's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have seen the letter referred to. The Russians have occupied Pul-i-Khatun and Ak-Rabat; but Penjdeh is held by the Afghans. We have not heard of any further advance being made beyond the places above mentioned. It would not be for the public interest that I should make any statement such as that suggested by the hon. Member.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Board of Works are in a position to furnish a Return, showing in respect of each of the larger rivers in Ireland—the area of the Catchment basin; the average rainfall in each; the estimated percentage of evaporation, having regard to soil and inclination; the discharge capacity at the mouth; the capacity requisite to discharge the rainfall minus evaporation?

MR. HIBBERT: Sir, I regret to find that there is no such information in possession of the Board of Works as would enable me to give any useful reply to this Question. At the same time, I admit that the information, if obtained, would be both interesting and useful; but as it would be difficult to give a satisfactory Return, except after a considerable lapse of time, and at great expense, I trust that the hon. Member will not press for it.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE WEST OF ENGLAND BANK.

MR. H. S. NORTHGOTE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can take any steps to bring to an early conclusion the process of liquidation of the affairs of the West of England Bank, the proceedings in whose case have now been pending for several years?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 did not apply to the liquidation of Companies, and that the Department of the Board of Trade had no knowledge of, neither had they the power to interfere in, the matter.

ARMY—DEFENCE OF MILITARY AND NAVAL STATIONS.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is his intention to make any proposals to the House for improvements in the seaward defence of Portsmouth, Plymouth, Malta, and Gibraltar, which are stated, on the authority of the First Lord of the Admiralty, to have been under his consideration for some months past?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It will, probably, be more convenient to state fully the views of the Government upon the subject of the defence of the military and naval stations at home and abroad when the Annual Statement on the Army Estimates is made. I may state, however, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman, that a certain limited amount has been annually devoted to the improvement of the defence of the military ports; and we have recently, as stated by the First Lord of the Admiralty, had under our consideration proposals for providing for their more rapid completion. It is necessary, however, to look at the question of the defence of the Empire as a whole; and the protection of some of the Colonial coaling stations is considered, at present, to be the most urgent service. Having regard to the heavy demand on the War Department for armaments for the Navy and for the coaling stations, it is not probable that we shall make any large proposals for the military ports in the present Session.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, he would give Notice to call attention to the subject on going into Committee.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—EMBODIMENT OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can inform the House how long the battalions of Militia now called up will be embodied, or if it is his intention to embody other battalions of the same regiments after those now called up have gone through a course of training?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is not intended to embody Militia battalions of the same regiment in succession. Considerable expense and inconvenience are involved in embodying and disembodying Militia battalions.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—MEALS OF CADETS.

Sir HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will have any objection to quote from or lay upon the Table any Report from the Medical Officers who have recommended that so long an interval as from 7.55 A.M. for breakfast to 2.15 P.M. for luncheon is an improvement on previous arrangements for the gentlemen cadets at Woolwich; and, on what authority he states that the cadets approve of the abolition of their two intermediate meals, and of the present arrangement?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In their last Report the Board of Visitors strongly recommended a change in the mode of living of the cadets at the Royal Military Academy; and the Governor informs me that the medical officer himself fixed the hours of which the hon. Member complains. The new arrangements have been made solely in the interests of the health of the cadets. I will make inquiries whether the intervals between the meals cannot be lessened without seriously interfering with the scheme of daily studies. My authorities for the statement that the cadets prefer the new arrangement are the Governor and the Adjutant of the Academy.

INDIA—THE BENGAL TENANCY BILL.

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Mr. Mookerjee, Native Member of the Viceroy of India's Council, subsequently to the introduction last month of the Bengal Tenancy Bill, moved for a delay of three weeks to permit of the Bill being published in the vernacular Gautee; whether this Motion was negatived; whether Mr. Mookerjee then moved for delay of three weeks to give interested parties time to study altered Bill; whether Sir Stuart Bayley, on behalf of the Government, said that "he thought three weeks' delay would mean one year's delay;" and, whether this signified that during that time the annual exodus to Simla must take place?

Mr. J. K. CROSS asked what the hon. Baronet meant by "vernacular Gautee?" He apprehended it must be a misprint, otherwise he could not understand what it meant.

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL said, he presumed it was a word in the vernacular dialect of Bengal.

Mr. J. K. CROSS: I presume it really means The Vernacular Gazette, and I am told that there is no such vernacular as Gautee. In answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to say the debate in the Legislative Council on the Bengal Tenancy Bill, as reported by the Select Committee, began on the 27th ultimo. The last proceedings of the Legislative Council which have been received are dated 14th ultimo. The hon. Baronet will therefore see that I am unable to answer his Question.

Mr. GORST asked, when the Returns he moved for last Session as to the cost of the annual exodus would be laid on the Table?

Mr. J. K. CROSS, in reply, said, he would be able to give a definite answer shortly. They had the Returns for three years; but they were not consecutive, and he had asked the Indian Government to complete them before laying them on the Table of the House.

Mr. ONSLOW, in reference to the last part of the Question, asked, whether it was not the fact that the Viceroy, instead of going to Simla, was going to attend a most important gathering at Rawul Pindi?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: Yes, Sir.

CENTRAL ASIA—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the date of the new agreement between the British and Russian Governments; whether any advance of the Russian troops has taken place since the date of that agreement; and, whether this agreement in any way recognizes that Penjdeh, Ak-Kabat, and Zulfagar, are on debatable territory?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can now state the date of the agreement recently entered into between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia as to the occupation of the position at present taken up by their respective Forces?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth is this. First of all, I had better remind the House that on Friday I stated—"That it had been agreed between Russia and England that no further advances should be sanctioned on either side."

I spoke then on the strength of communications from St. Petersburg, and the latest of those to which I referred was a telegram from the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, dated the 5th of March. On Saturday, in order to obviate any possible misapprehension—that having been a telegram from the British Ambassador—Lord Granville sent to St. Petersburg, to Sir Edward Thornton, a telegram containing the words I have quoted, referring to the assurances that had been exchanged between the two Governments. Earl Granville then desired the British Ambassador to ascertain whether M. de Giers agreed that the assurances referred to constituted an agreement to the effect stated by me. To that telegram I have no doubt we shall shortly have an answer; and, in the meantime, it would, perhaps, be wise of me to go no further than to give the date, which I have done. Then the hon. Member asks me whether the agreement—though the word "agreement" is a little fallacious—arrangement I should prefer to call it—includes the position occupied by the Afghan Forces; and, if so, whether it has received the adhesion of the Ameer? Inasmuch as we cannot command the movements of the Afghan Forces in the same manner as the Emperor of Russia could command his, the expression we used was, that "further advances would not have our sanction." The whole arrangement certainly did, in our intention, include the positions occupied by the Afghan Forces. It was not, however, possible to obtain for it the adhesion of the Ameer, on account of the time it would take; and it was thought desirable that such an arrangement should be put into operation as soon as possible, while it would require a considerable time to communicate with the Ameer in order to obtain his cohesion. What we did was to urge upon the Afghan Forces not to make further advances; and that was the reason why we did not think fit to keep an arrangement of that kind in abeyance till we could communicate with the Ameer.

MR. BOURKE: Are we to understand that until the Government receive an answer from St. Petersburg this agreement does not really exist, or has not been assented to by the Russian Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I stated was that we conceived the arrangement had been assented to on both sides; but that, for fear that some "further advances" might take place owing to some ambiguity, and in order to ascertain that there is an identity of view on the points I have named—although as to that I have no apprehension as far as the substance is concerned—Lord Granville has sent that telegraphic message. I have no doubt that I shall soon be able to communicate the substance of the reply to the House.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the last two paragraphs of his Question—namely—

"Whether any advance of the Russian troops had taken place since the date of that agreement, and, whether this agreement in any way recognized that Penjdeh, Ak-Kabat, and Zulfagar were on debatable territory?"

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he did not think it desirable to reply to the particulars of the hon. Member's Question at that present moment.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it would be possible to lay upon the Table the despatch of March 5?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; most certainly not. It would be very unusual, and I think most decidedly against the public interest, to pick out a particular telegram in the course of a Correspondence for publication.

MR. GORST asked whether the telegram to St. Petersburg had been sent subsequent to the statement of the Prime Minister?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; I thought I had said so. My statement was made in this House on Friday, and the telegram was sent on Saturday.

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask one further Question of the Prime Minister, in regard to his reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), in order to clear up a point which seems to me to be doubtful. Are we to understand that it is quite clear that it is not open to Russia to depart from the agreement, or rather what now appears to be the unconfirmed arrangement, which has been referred to until the reply to Lord Granville's telegram has been received?

MR. GLADSTONE: The object of Lord Granville's telegram is not to make a new arrangement. It is simply to insure perfect accuracy as to our understanding of the arrangement which now exists.

MR. E. STANHOPE gave Notice that tomorrow he would ask the Prime Minister whether his attention had been called to the statement made by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the Autumn, that we had requested the Russian Government to withdraw from the positions they had occupied in the neighbourhood of Afghanistan; whether any answer had been received to that communication; and, if the Russians had withdrawn from the positions referred to?

POLICE (METROPOLIS)—WANDSWORTH POLICE COURT.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the acknowledged inadequacy of the accommodation provided for the Wandsworth Police Court and its defective condition, he will use his authority to prevent the continuance of this grievance?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had undertaken to give his attention to the subject of the accommodation at this Court, in conjunction with the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Gladstone

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF LEASEHOLDERS BILL.

MR. BROADHURST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the event of his agreeing to give a day for the Motion of the honourable Member for Cardiff, he will, at the same time, name a day for the Debate for the Second Reading of the Bill for the Enfranchisement of Leaseholders, which stood first on the Order Paper on the 4th March, and which lost its favourable position on that occasion through the pressure of Government business?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, there was no day that could be given for the purpose of forwarding this Bill.

PUBLIC HEALTH—PATENT MEDICINES.

MR. PULESTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the following, from an article in The Lancet, viz.:—

"Scarcely a day passes without the record in the papers of an inquest on some poor deluded victim who has been sent to his last account from an over-weening confidence in one or other of the much-belauded patent medicines. The facility afforded for obtaining a narcotic, whether it be in the form of opium, morphia, or the deadly chloral, is a consideration which cannot be overlooked. In no other country can poisons be purchased wholesale without a strict inquiry as to the purpose for which they are required; but in England they are sold openly, and without restriction, under the guise of patent medicines;"

and, whether, having reference to the proposed legislation on this subject, he will cause inquiry to be made, with a view to obviating the evils arising from such a condition of things if they are shown to be as stated?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I am afraid, Sir, that, considering the very large number of Notices on this subject in both directions which have appeared in medical and other newspapers, it is quite out of my power to give an opinion on any particular observation contained in them. I do not even know when the article to which the hon. Member refers appeared, and the Question gives no date. I have already stated that the whole question has been the subject of careful inquiry, and that legislation will be proposed either in this or next Session.

EGYPT FINANCE, &c.

Mr. BOURKE said, he wished to ask the Government a Question with regard to the arrangements for the settlement of Egyptian Finance. Information had reached him to the effect that the Agreement was to be signed to-morrow, and he would be glad to know if that was the case; and, if so, whether Papers would immediately be laid on the Table upon the subject?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I think I can give an answer to that at once. I dislike to repeat the answer I have already made, but it does appear to me to be very near its close; at any rate, I can give the House this satisfaction, that the Papers are now in the course of preparation with all possible rapidity. They are delayed by nothing except the necessity, with which the right hon. Gentleman is familiar, of communicating with Foreign Ministers as to certain reports of their conversations contained in them. These Papers are in the course of preparation with all the rapidity that the Foreign Office by its exertions can possibly command, and will be laid on the Table without delay, I think I may say, whatever happens.

PUBLIC OFFICES THE TREASURY—
MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE.

Mr. MACARTNEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the junior Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), who, it is understood, had accepted office as Junior Lord of the Treasury without salary some years ago, is now in receipt of a salary from the Treasury?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER Mr. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; such is the case. From the 1st of next month, the commencement of the next financial year, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds will be in receipt of the salary which is usually paid to each of the Junior Lords of the Treasury.

Mr. MACARTNEY: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether you have received the usual notice by a paper signed by two other Members of the fact stated by the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not in receipt of any such notice.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: If the hon. Member puts any further Question on this subject, I shall follow it by a Question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ask, whether the hon. Member for Leeds has ever been brought before the Land Commission and had his rent reduced?

Mr. SEXTON asked, whether the hon. Member for Leeds would have to resign his seat in consequence of taking Office?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: I beg to say that my hon. Friend did resign his seat when he took Office, and was duly re-elected.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SUDAN)— REPORTED FALL OF KASSALA.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask, Whether the Government have any information with regard to a matter mentioned yesterday in some newspapers as to the reported fall of Kassala?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No information has been received of the fall of Kassala, but only a telegram received from Sir Evelyn Baring, forwarding a telegram received by him from Consul Baker at Suakin, in which it was stated that it was rumoured at Suakin that Kassala had fallen, but there was no reliable news either at Suakin or Cairo.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked, Whether it was not the case that the Governor of Suakin had received intelligence from Kassala, that the garrison was still holding out, and that two more attempts upon the town had been repulsed, but that as famine was present in the garrison, and that the ammunition was failing fast, it was impossible to hold out beyond the end of March; and, whether, under those deplorable circumstances, in the interests of humanity and for the honour of England, Her Majesty's Government would not make some effort even now to relieve these heroic men, and thus to save the country from the indelible disgrace which the massacre of the garrison must entail upon us?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE, in reply, said, that with regard to the statement of fact contained in the Question, his reply was in the affirmative, that such information had been received.

THE BUDGET—REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE—PROBATE DUTY ON FREEHOLD PROPERTY.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of increased taxation being necessary for the financial year 1885-6, he will consider the advisability of charging probate duty on freehold property in the same manner as it is now charged on leasehold property?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS), in reply, said, he would take into consideration any suggestion made to him by his hon. Friend; but he could give the House no information as to the Budget until he introduced it.

EGYPT—ZEBEHR PASHA.

MR. MONK asked, Whether the Government could confirm the report of the deportation of Zebehr Pasha?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir; I have information confirming the reported arrest of Zebehr Pasha.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

NAVY—HIRED TRANSPORTS.

RESOLUTION.

DR. CAMERON, in rising to call attention to the system of chartering hired transports pursued by the Admiralty; and to move—

"That the system of chartering and managing hired transports pursued by the Admiralty officials is unbusinesslike, extravagant, and detrimental to the satisfactory working of home preparations for foreign wars," said, that two Committees had been appointed to investigate into the conduct of the Egyptian Campaign, one being that presided over by Lord Morley, and the other the Select Committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the working of the Commissariat and Transport Services. He had read the Reports, and anyone that chose to look into them would, he thought, be struck at the extraordinary number of instances in which elaborate and costly preparations at home were neutralized owing to late arrival in Egypt. The Carthage, for instance, was chartered at £7,500 per month, or £250 per day, for use as a base hospital and transport for the sick. She went out to Ismailia, and arrived late. The landing arrangements at Ismailia were extremely defective. In order to facilitate landing, a portable pier was constructed at Woolwich, but it did not arrive at Ismailia until a very short time before the conclusion of the campaign—too late to be of any use. There was a line of railway in existence, and in order to utilize it, locomotives were purchased in England and sent out to Ismailia. These engines arrived several days late. Others were purchased at Alexandria, and went round with the Expedition. It was intended to land them at Ismailia by the aid of a vessel named the Recovery, which was fitted for the purpose; but, on their arrival, the Recovery was not to be found, and when she arrived, it was too late to be of use. A telegraph corps of the Royal Engineers was maintained in this country, so as to be ready in time of war. That corps was sent out to Egypt, but arrived a week late. There was, again, the iron ration—a ration which the men were expected to carry about with them constantly, so that they should not be in want of a meal if cut off from the Commissariat Department. That ration was sent out, but it was not available until Cairo had been seized. Huts were sent out; they arrived late. A siege train was sent out, but was landed only on the day of the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. The transport animals all arrived late; and this was especially the case with 800 mules, which had been in the hands of the Government months before. This delay, some of his friends said, was owing to the Admiralty's penchant for hiring slow-going steamers. A most respectable shipowner wrote him that, in consequence of the manner in which he had been treated at the Admiralty, he had given up all attempts to treat with the Government. Commission and brokerage, another gentleman told him, was at the bottom of the whole business. A Mr. Baughan, who had the charge of giving out the charters, had a brother-in-law in the office of a firm of shipbrokers, and that firm obtained for their clients an enormous percentage of the charters given out, and so difficult was it to get a charter through any other channel that one company of shipowners, itself managed by a very old-established shipbroker, had, his correspondent informed him, thought it proper to charter their vessels through that firm. Another correspondent called his attention to evidence given by the Chief Constructor at the Admiralty Mr. Dunn before the Royal Commission on Merchant Shipping. From that it appeared that there was a rule in the Admiralty not to accept vessels which did not comply with certain requirements, and which were technically known as being on the Admiralty list. The Chairman of the Commission, in reply, remarked that, for some branches of the Government service, they took ships which did not comply with the requirements of the Admiralty. Under those circumstances, he (Dr. Cameron) asked for a Return, which he thought might give some light on the subject. He explained to the then Secretary of the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) why he wanted the Return. He told him (Dr. Cameron) that it was unusual to give such a Return; but he did not wish to conceal anything, and he gave the Return. That Return was ordered to be printed on 27th July last. It purported to be a Return of all the chartered vessels for Egypt, and to state whether they were chartered direct from the owners or through brokers. The first thing that struck one about the Return was that it omitted the names of a large number of transports. The names of the following were not contained in it:—namely, Euphrates, Latna, Neutides, Pharos, Peshawar, Thames, Omanli, Semestrin, Adona, and Belgravia. He should like the hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Caine), whom he understood was to reply, to explain why these vessels were not in the Return. Turning to the Return itself, what struck one was this—that out of the 72 vessels chartered, no less than 15 were chartered from one firm of brokers—Messrs. Ellis and Son—and out of £860,000 paid for these vessels, no less than £175,000, or a little over a fifth, was paid for vessels chartered through Messrs. Ellis and Son. Other charters were obtained through other brokers, but the amount paid for these was comparatively small, and there was nothing to compare with the transactions of the Messrs. Ellis. His object in bringing forward the Motion was, if possible, to obtain a reform of a state of things which appeared to be most detrimental to the public interest. The hon. Gentleman the Civil Lord of the Admiralty had not long been in Office, and, when on the Radical Bench, used to joke at the red tapeism that prevailed in the Government Departments; and he (Dr. Cameron) could hardly fancy that he had already been so long at the Admiralty as to have become so permeated with red tape and officialism that he would do anything rather than return a straightforward and business-like answer. He had explained to the hon. Gentleman his points, and had given him time to inquire into them; and he hoped he would reply in the frank, open manner that was characteristic of him a few months ago. He (Dr. Cameron) told him of the alleged brother-in-law arrangement. He understood he had looked into the matter, and it was true that Mr. Baughan, who had the giving out of the charters, was connected with the firm of Messrs. Ellis, or had some connection or relative in the office. That was a matter of fact. He knew that blood was thicker than water, and he should not find fault with a man who did a good turn to his brother-in-law. If, at the same time, he could do a service to a relative and the State, it might be argued that he was all the more valuable a servant of the State on that account. But in this case it was hardly so; and he (Dr. Cameron) objected altogether to the system of brokerage and commissions in this matter. There were very grave objections to the system which divided the responsibility of land and water transport between two Departments. In the first place, if they intrusted one Department with the duty of providing the money and another with spending it, they would certainly have extravagance; while, with two Establishments, they multiplied the chances of breakdowns. The only justification of which the present system was capable was this—that the Admiralty knew all about ships, their management, and chartering, and the War Office knew nothing about them. If all the inconveniences of the present system were to be encountered simply in order that an official at the Admiralty should hand over to a broker his responsibilities in the matter of hiring ships, it seemed to him that an official at the War Office might as well be intrusted with the business. He need not delay in talking to any man who had a knowledge of commercial matters of the importance of dealing with principals; when others were dealt with, the purchaser—in this case the nation—must indirectly pay the commission. But that was not the extravagance he denounced. The extravagance he denounced lay in the mismanagement of the system of transport in such a way as to render nugatory the most costly and elaborate preparations at home—mismanagement which, if we had to meet a warlike foe, might be fraught with very disastrous consequences to the nation. He had already made a reference to the very defective landing arrangements at Ismailia. It must be borne in mind that it was intended from the first to make Ismailia the base of our operations, and the Engineer officers, taking time by the forelock, fitted up at Woolwich a portable pier. This pier carried a railway and cranes, and a shears or derrick for lifting heavy weights. At this point, it was proper to remark that there could be no doubt as to the meaning of the word "late" in connection with the Expedition. The date of its commencement and completion were planned from the first. As to the end of the campaign, Sir Garnet Wolseley had stated his intention of occupying Cairo on the 15th of September; and, as a matter of fact, he entered the city on the 14th, so that the end of the war was anticipated by only one day. As to the commencement, the simultaneous massing of the English Military and Naval and the Indian Forces showed that the date of the seizure of Ismailia must have been determined on long in advance. The Engineer officer who was to put up the pier went to Woolwich and inspected it, and he arrived at the Suez Canal before the Expedition. Ismailia was occupied on August 20. The pier was not sent out in his vessel, but in three others. The first of these vessels, the Canadian, arrived on August 23; the second, the Stelling, after a 19 days' voyage, on September 5; and the third, the Lechmere, on September 8; these two last arriving 16 and 19 days respectively after landing of first troops, and eight and five days respectively before the battle of Tel-el-

Dr. Cameron

Kebir. The pier, which would have been invaluable had it been received in time, was thus rendered utterly useless; the cranes were never taken out of the ship; and as to the shears, one of its legs was left behind, so that it would have been useless if it had arrived. These preparations for the initial stages of the campaign were sent out in slow vessels of 9 to 9½ knots an hour. Both the Stelling and the Lechmere were chartered through brokers, one of them through Messrs. Ellis and Son. He had mentioned the locomotives sent out for the purpose of working the railway on which it was intended to rely for transport. These were sent in the Lechmere, a 9½-knot vessel, chartered through Messrs. Ellis and Son, and arrived only a week before the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. Happily, other engines had been procured at Alexandria, and brought round with the Expedition. These were to be landed at Ismailia by the Recovery, which was specially fitted with apparatus to lift heavy weights; but when they arrived the Recovery could not be found, and they were sent on to Suez, where there was an antiquated machine, described by Colonel Wallace as—"A crane, with a curious sort of engine with belting, not gearing, which gave way with the second heaviest engine lifted."

The heaviest lift was 20 tons, and Captain Hext, R.N., who had the charge of the crane, thus described the operation—

"The two last engines were a heavy lift, and we had to screw the safety valve of the crane's boiler before we could stir them. The Arab stoker bolted when he saw the steam pressure go above 40 lbs.; but we got it up to 52 with a trusty English stoker. I should not care to have a heavier lift; but, if you send them, they are bound to come out. I think the man who sits on a safety-valve and knows his own danger deserves the Victoria Cross."

As to the Recovery, Colonel Wallace said he never heard of her arrival. He said—"She may have come, but she was not in time to be of any use to us." It appeared, however, from a question put to Colonel Wallace by the Surveyor General of the Ordnance (Mr. Brand), that the Recovery did arrive, but she was 10 days late, arriving at Ismailia on September 1. She was also chartered through Messrs. Ellis. Being of no use for the purpose intended, she was used as a tug. There was another tug—namely, the Storm Cock, a vessel of 328 tons, which was charged at the rate of

£750 per month, or about £2 6s. 8d. per ton per month. The most expensive vessel chartered was the Catalonia, at the rate of 35s. per ton per month. The next highest was the Carthage, which was chartered at 30s., and only four other vessels were chartered at rates above 25s. Every other vessel, including the tug Racerory, was charged more than £1 per month less than the Storm Cock. She was chartered through Ellis and Son, and belonged to Mr. W. Beckett Hill. Several of Mr. Hill's vessels had been chartered by Messrs. Ellis and Son—the Tower Hill, the Ludgate Hill, for example. The Notting Hill was amongst the vessels belonging to the same owner, but she was stated in the Return to have been chartered direct from Mr. Hill. Of all the cases of mismanagement connected with this Expedition the case of the Notting Hill was, perhaps, the most gross. After the Transvaal War the Government had a quantity of mules left on their hands as surplus at Natal; and, in anticipation of their being required for the war in Egypt, a telegram was sent to Natal asking how many spare mules they could supply. The Commissary in charge of the station was also Admiralty Agent at Durban, and he had told the Committee that there was not the smallest difficulty in obtaining transport on the spot or fitting out, and that it was customary to use small vessels suited to the transport of from 200 to 250 animals each for the purpose, as being more convenient to deal with than larger vessels. He further gave evidence that, had he been intrusted with the business, he could have got the mules to Egypt in good time. On the 24th of July, when the order was given to take up the transport, the Notting Hill was at Algoa Bay, 500 miles from Natal, and laden with wool. On that day Mr. Ellis, of Messrs. Ellis and Son, called at the office of one of the great Cape Companies and asked them if they could not engage to take home the load of wool, in order to leave the Notting Hill at liberty to undertake the transport of mules. Now, in the Return, the Messrs. Ellis and Son were not given as the brokers through whom the Notting Hill was chartered. The order to procure the transport had only been given on the 24th of July, and the bargain was completed on July the 27th. Meanwhile, Messrs. Ellis and

Son had been endeavouring to arrange for the transport of the cargo of wool, and all he could say was that if the Messrs. Ellis and Son had not got their commission, it was hard lines on them, and they deserved to get it. Evidently, the Cape Liner people had their suspicions aroused in connection with the business, and on the following day, the 25th, the representative of one of the leading lines applied at the Admiralty and stated that they had an empty vessel on the spot ready to take the mules to Egypt. Their offer was refused; they were told their vessel was too small. About the same date, a telegram was addressed by the Admiralty to the "Transport Officer, Algoa Bay." Such an address was as vague as would be an address to an officer at the Bay of Biscay. Port Elizabeth was the port of Algoa Bay, but there had not been a Transport Officer there for many years. Such was the evidence given before the Committee. Accordingly, the telegram asking the Transport Officer at Algoa Bay to detain the Notting Hill went kicking about South Africa, there being no Transport Officer at Algoa Bay. Ultimately it found its way to the Adjutant General, who forwarded it to the Admiral at St. Simon's Bay. Thus, a great deal of valuable time had been lost. Now, that telegram had been burked in the Correspondence on the subject ordered by the Select Committee. Several telegrams which had been ordered by the Committee had been suppressed, and that was one of them. On July 29th, however, the Admiral at St. Simon's Bay sent home a telegram stating that the Notting Hill was not available, but that empty steamers could be had at the Cape for the transport. On the 27th of July, the regular Cape traders had apparently heard enough to convince them that they were not in the race for the transport of the mules, and they determined to take the wool cargo from the Notting Hill. It was arranged that they were to receive the entire freight for the wool, and a premium of £2,000; and on the very day on which that arrangement was concluded with those trading Companies, the bargain with the Admiralty was concluded for the charter of the Notting Hill for the conveyance of the mules, pay to commence on July 28th. The owners of the Notting Hill had agreed to give £2,000 premium on the freight for bringing home the wool, and they got £3,000 from the Admiralty for expenses of transfer of cargo, and £1,000 for the number of days allowed them to get rid of the cargo. Their charter was for £4,000 a-month. As a matter of fact, however, instead of the prescribed number of days for getting rid of the cargo, they had taken 10 or 11 days, and they did not arrive at St. Simon's Bay until August 7. Now, he wanted to know whether they had been paid for the 11 days, or for the number at first fixed? Three weeks more—for which the country paid another £3,000—were wasted at St. Simon's Bay in refitting. Upon arriving at Durban, it was found that the Notting Hill did not contain accommodation for the whole of the mules. She started on September the 5th, and did not arrive at Aden—five days from Suez—until a week after the fall of Cairo. The mules were afterwards disposed of to the Indian Government at a very high figure; but notwithstanding the good bargain with the Indian Authorities, the cost for the chartering of the Notting Hill, the forage for the mules, the equipment for drivers, and the coal expense of the transport which we were put to, more than swallowed up the total price received from the Indian Authorities. From a commercial point of view, the nation would have been a gainer had the mules been slaughtered at Natal for the sake of their hides and hoofs. Everyone must remember the bargain of Moses Primrose, which was regarded as a type of everything foolish in trading; but it was a model of wisdom as compared with this fiasco, which had cost the country from £20,000 to £25,000, without having even a gross of shagreen spectacles, like Moses Primrose, to show for it. All those preparations might have been efficiently carried out, if the transport had been ordered through either the Admiralty Agent at Durban, or through the Admiral at St. Simon's Bay. He thought he had said enough about the 15 vessels besides the Notting Hill chartered through Messrs. Ellis and Son, to show that however well their brokerage arrangements might act in practice, they did not turn out for the public interest. It appeared to him, however, that even in other cases the work of the Admiralty in hiring steamers had not been conducted in a business-like manner. The Royal Engineers Telegraph Corps, for instance, was a corps that was maintained in efficiency in time of peace to be in readiness for time of war. In the Egyptian War their services were of the first importance, and yet the Telegraphist Corps had been sent out in the Oxenholme, the champion sluggard of the Fleet, described in the Return as an 8½-knot vessel. The consequence was that they did not arrive until August 28, after the engagement at El Magfar, the capture of Tel-el-Mahuta, the occupation of Mashama and Kassassin, and on the date of the first attack on Kassassin. Meanwhile the communications had been conducted somehow. Colonel Salmond, the officer sent out to erect the pier, which arrived too late, had turned his attention to the effort of getting together a scratch band of telegraphists. Luckily, Arabi's men, in cutting the telegraph wires along the railway, did not remove them, and Colonel Salmond looked about for someone who could solder them together. He found a man there who, he thought, knew how to solder the wires and "make earth." By means of pantomime he assured himself that the man understood what he wanted, and it was upon that Arab tinker that our Army had been dependent for telegraphic communication during the first week of the war. He (Dr. Cameron) did not know whether the Government had offered him any remuneration or recognition of his services. The chief Army medical officer complained bitterly of the suffering to the wounded, because, as he had said, owing to the defective telegraphic arrangements, the wounded were arriving before the telegrams announcing their approach, and in the absence of the necessary preparations they were frequently left uncared for for some time. Take another instance. The siege train was rather an important item in a campaign, and Captain Rawson, of the Navy, the principal naval transport officer, in his evidence, had said that the Chief of the Staff wanted the siege train so badly that, directly the vessel had arrived with it, he sent a written requisition that they should land it at once, but they succeeded in landing it only on the day of the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. This siege train had been sent out in a vessel of only nine knots an hour. Then, as to the Carthage, he was not going to argue the question, as to which authorities were divided, whether she was the best sort of vessel to employ as a base hospital and transport for the sick and wounded. But she was hired for that purpose, the pay commenced on the 25th of July, and it was at the rate of £7,500 a-month, or £250 per day. He did not dispute that she was quite worth that figure; but it was a large one, and if the nation was content to pay it, it had at least the right to expect that the vessel would be available for the purpose for which she was hired. As a matter of fact, instead of hastening on to Alexandria, and starting thence with the Expedition, she left England on August 9th, wasted 26 hours coaling at Malta, although she could carry coal for three weeks' steaming, and might perfectly well have coaled at home while fitting out—arrived at Alexandria after the Expedition had started, wasted some 40 precious hours there, and did not arrive at Ismailia until after the first engagement had been fought. As a consequence, the wounded and sick were put to great suffering and inconvenience, and all the medical arrangements were upset. It might be said that all these things occurred in the Expedition of 1882, and that there was nothing of the kind in connection with the present Expedition. He was not quite so certain of that. The Authorities were just as complaisant about the management of the Expedition of 1882 before these inquiries had been held. On referring to the Appropriation Accounts for last year, he found some correspondence between the Accountant General and the Secretary of the Admiralty, in which an increase in the pension of Admiral Mordaunt—against whom personally he had not a word to say—was recommended on the ground that the Transport Department had been on several occasions—

Dr. Cameron

“Successfully tested by the severe strain of war, and this was notably the case in the last Egyptian Expedition, the success of which depended to a great extent upon the celerity of the movement of the component parts of the Force employed.”

Moreover, in connection with the present Nile Expedition, he might mention one instance which showed that the want of distinct differentiation of responsibility for given duties still existed. Mr. Koper had invented a kind of raft, which he was anxious to have tested on the Nile, and he wrote to Lord Wolseley and to the Admiralty on the subject. From Lord Wolseley he received a letter, stating that he had handed his communication to the Director of Ordnance and Stores for transmission to the Admiralty. From the Admiralty he received a letter stating that the matter was one which concerned the War Office, and that accordingly his application had been forwarded to that Department. Again, a want of business management was demonstrated by the manner in which, if he was correctly informed, the Canadian boatmen were brought over to this country. As everyone was aware, there were first-class lines of steamers running between this country and Canada, and the obvious course would have been to bring over these men by the regular line of steamers. However, if he was correctly informed, the Ocean King was chartered, and went out to Canada empty for the purpose of carrying the men here. One improvement, however, had taken place in connection with the present operations. Since the publication of his Return, the shipowners had ceased to complain of undue favouritism to the Messrs. Ellis and Co. But complaints were as rife as ever of the want of anything like open competition, and that, consequently, the best, cheapest, and most expeditious means of transport were not obtained. He begged to move the Motion that stood in his name.

Mr. PULESTON rose to second the Amendment. In his opinion, enough had already been stated to justify the House in accepting it. He was told that the Committee of last year was not going to be re-appointed. If that was so, the time of the House would be occupied in going into details which would otherwise come before the Committee. The refusal to re-appoint the Committee would be a public scandal, in view of the facts which had already been brought out. It might be said that officials and Members of the Government were busily occupied; but the Committee would not require their attendance at any time when their services were required elsewhere. He did not entirely concur with all that had been said by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Cameron); but he had no hesitation in supporting the Motion. It had repeatedly been stated in the House that the Commissariat and the Transport Departments should be specially and separately organized if we were to avoid in future a repetition of the scandals which appeared to be always occurring whenever arrangements had to be made in connection with war or rumours of war. He hoped the Government would say that they were prepared to agree to the adoption of some different system. He did not see why the system of brokerage should be maintained with such unerring regularity instead of going into the open market. It was not necessary to approach his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock (Mr. Sutherland), who was at the head of one of the largest Steamship Companies in the country, through half-a-dozen brokers. Indeed, business could often times be transacted in a much more satisfactory manner when there was no third party to intervene. This question had been so often discussed that he should have thought some satisfactory system would by this time have been adopted, especially seeing that Members on the Treasury Bench had expressed the opinion that it would be better if Transport and Commissariat arrangements were placed in the hands of one Chief with a separate Department. He considered that open competition, open tenders, and an open market would bring the Government much better arrangements than they had hitherto been able to make. The time must soon come for the abolition of the present system, which not only retarded the progress of our soldiers and sailors when fighting our battles in foreign lands, but which also resulted in a needless expenditure of money. He should like to hear whether the Admiralty had really discussed this matter at all, and he hoped that the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, when he came to reply, would be able to state what course the Admiralty proposed to adopt. He seconded the Resolution with great satisfaction, and trusted that this would be the last time that the House would hear anything of the subject.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the system of chartering and managing hired transports pursued by the Admiralty officials is unbusinesslike, extravagant, and detrimental to the satisfactory working of home preparations for foreign wars,"—(Dr. Cameron.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. Puleston

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. SUTHERLAND said, that, as one who had had something to do with shipping affairs and with the arrangement of vessels and transports for the Admiralty, he listened to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow with very great interest and curiosity. He certainly thought that his hon. Friend, seeing the notion he entertained on this subject, was perfectly right in bringing the matter before the House, and his hon. Friend was to be credited with having discharged, in a manner that few persons could have done, a duty which could not have been agreeable to him. It was no part of his (Mr. Sutherland's) business to defend the action of the Admiralty in this matter; he left that to the able and more responsible hands of his hon. Friend on the Government Bench. But having had at various times a good deal to do with transport arrangements, he should like to place before the House the result of his own experience. Before doing so he would allude to one or two points mentioned by his hon. Friend in the course of his speech. In the first place, the words of the Motion appeared to be somewhat vague in their character. His hon. Friend, in his Motion, said that—which meant that the transport work of the Admiralty was transacted in an unbusiness-like manner. That was a very easy way of bringing forward an accusation, because it was quite certain that there was a very great difference among people as to what was and what was not a business-like manner of transacting such affairs. He believed that the Admiralty could only do their work in a business-like manner when they acted as an individual would act in any business transaction for his own interest and profit. If the Admiralty had fulfilled that condition, they would have conducted their business to the advantage of the country and with as great an economy as possible. There were two or three ways in which freight on a large scale might be hired. The first method was to advertise for public faci-litica. Another was to employ a broker to hire ships. Or, thirdly, a merchant might himself have a chartering department in his own office and transact the business himself. As to the first, no merchant or shipowner who understood his business would ever put up at public tender the large amount of tonnage required for transport. In the business with which he was connected he had to find tonnage in the course of the year for between 300,000 and 400,000 tons, and his Company never invited tenders for it, but chartered it themselves. There was a time when they did invite tenders, and they found that when the market was favourable the contractor carried out the operation, and that when it was unfavourable he frequently failed. Other reasons could be adduced why, in the case of the Admiralty, this system should not be adopted. There was such a reason in regard to secrecy. It might be of the greatest possible importance that they should hire transport without the public knowing anything of it; and another reason was that transports were sometimes wanted in the greatest possible haste, and to endeavour to secure them by public competition would inevitably cause delay. Then the Admiralty might engage a broker and place the whole of their business in his hands; and he believed they could easily find a firm of sufficient credit and integrity to undertake the work. But he thought they had adopted a still better plan in conducting the business in their own Office, for he believed that they possessed in their Department all the knowledge that was required for the work. Such knowledge was not to be picked up in a single day; and if the suggestions of his hon. Friend were carried out, and the work transferred to a new Department, it could only be properly performed if the machinery which had the necessary experience were transferred with it. He had reason to complain of the Admiralty in some respects, because he thought they would do much better for the public if they confined themselves to faster vessels. But, on the whole, he thought that public opinion in all parts of the City of London was to the effect that the business of the Admiralty had been done with the greatest possible efficiency. Mistakes might have been made here and there; but it was easy to be wise after the event. The Expedition to which the speech of his hon. Friend referred was most speedily and efficiently carried out. Nor did he find in his hon. Friend's speech any suggestions as to how the work could have been better done. His hon. Friend thought that the Admiralty paid more than the market price. If his hon. Friend were able to prove that that had been done on a considerable scale, he would have made out a case which a Committee would be bound to inquire into. It might happen, without any fault of theirs, that the Admiralty would be obliged to pay 15 or 20 per cent more than they would have had to do 24 hours before. Various inconsistencies and incongruities might perhaps be pointed out in the hiring of certain ships; but the explanation did not lie altogether on the surface. It might happen, for instance, that a ship of 3,000 tons was taken up at a higher figure than a ship of 4,500 or 5,000 tons. But it might also be the case that the smaller vessel would carry out a battalion much more conveniently and at a less cost for coals and other matters. His hon. Friend had stated that a large sum had been paid for the hospital ship Carthage—some £58,000 or £59,000—which would have covered her cost.

"The system of chartering and managing hired transports pursued by the Admiralty officials was unbusinesslike, extravagant, and detrimental to the satisfactory working of home preparations for foreign wars,"

DR. CAMERON: I said nothing of the cost. I merely stated that £7,500 a-month had been paid for the vessel.

MR. SUTHERLAND: The original cost of the ship was something like £150,000, and the Admiralty paid a large sum for the Carthage simply because they could not get her for less. The most expensive ship they hired was the Catalonia, for which they paid £1 15s. a-ton per day. But the Cunard Company had that ship in regular and most valuable employment; and they could not be expected to remove her from that employment for a two months' charter for the comparatively paltry pittance of 15s. or 20s. per ton a-day. Ships now could be chartered at a very much smaller cost than they could be three years ago, because shipping had received an addition of 1,500,000 tons, and shipowners were glad to accept very low rates. His hon. Friend stated that vessels had been chartered which were not on a certain Admiralty list. To what list did his hon. Friend refer? If he mistook not, his hon. Friend alluded to something which had happened during the tenure of power of the late Government, when they were building a large number of ships and Mr. Ward Hunt was First Lord of the Admiralty. The basis of that list was a very simple one—that every ship should be divided into compartments, that in the event of one compartment being filled the ship might still keep afloat. This implied a good deal of courtesy on the part of the enemy, because it implied that he would keep firing into that compartment. There was no doubt that the compartment idea was a good one in itself; but shipowners were not led to believe, as his hon. Friend supposed, that only vessels on the list would be chartered—

DR. CAMERON: I quoted a statement made by Mr. Dunn, and the remark of the Chairman of the Commission upon it.

MR. SUTHERLAND understood that his hon. Friend had a grievance upon this point; and if not, he did not see the relevancy of his observations. No shipowner thought that the Admiralty would confine themselves to this list. In his view, his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow had not succeeded in establishing that the service of 1882—the period to which his accusations referred—was not, taken all in all, thoroughly well done. What were the facts of the case? In the middle of July the first vessel was taken up for the transport service, and within three weeks of that date 200,000 tons of shipping were engaged for the transport of troops to Egypt. Within some six or seven weeks of that date these 200,000 tons of shipping had conveyed the Army a distance of 3,000 miles, Tel-el-Kebir had been fought, and the object of the campaign had been accomplished. That was a result which was highly creditable to the Mercantile Marine of this country, and none of the statements of his hon. Friend had detracted in the smallest degree from the broad general efficiency displayed by the Government Department in carrying out the work.

MR. MAC IVER said, he very much regretted the speech of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), for he had made serious personal charges against Gentlemen who were not present to defend themselves, and who could not have an opportunity of defending themselves from charges which were, he believed, without foundation. He knew many of the vessels which had been named by the hon. Member, and in almost every case he had been wrong in his facts. There was a certain amount of partial truth in what the hon. Member said; but if he had told the whole truth it would have altogether changed the views which he had endeavoured to get the House to accept. He did not personally know either Mr. Baughan or the Messrs. Ellis; but he indirectly knew a great deal about them, and certainly shipowners generally had very different views about them to those adverse views expressed by the hon. Member for Glasgow. The hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Puleston) used the word "job." There was no shipowner who believed that there had been the least jobbery.

MR. PULESTON said, he did not charge anyone with jobbery; but only said that a system like this, if pursued in another country, would have been called by that name.

MR. MAC IVER said, it appeared to him that both that charge and those brought against the Admiralty by the hon. Member for Glasgow had been made on entirely insufficient grounds. The Admiralty Transport Department had, undoubtedly, sometimes made mistakes. We all made mistakes; but he believed, and it was the belief of the vast majority of shipowners, that the Transport Department of the Admiralty did its work with perfect honesty, and, upon the whole, cheaply. If there was a fault to be found, it hardly lay at the doors of the Transport Department; but it did at the doors of those who were instructing them. If the Department hired slow ship sometimes when they ought to have chartered faster ones, the reason was that the prices which were at this moment paid for ships were so low, that no owners of valuable and fast vessels could afford to give them at the prices. With regard to the Belgravia, which was a Glasgow ship, the hon. Member omitted to tell the House the price at which the owners would give her services; but he was sure they could not give her to the Government at 11s. or 12s. 6d. per ton, which was about the rate for cargo ships, or even 17s. 6d. per ton, which was given for other vessels well adapted for troop-carrying, but not so fast or so valuable as the Bel- gravis. He did blame the officers of the Admiralty for not taking such vessels as the Belgravia and those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company; but it would be utter folly for the owners of those valuable vessels to take such prices as the Admiralty, under the pressure of undue economy, were at present giving. The hon. Member for Glasgow referred to a variety of things connected with the transport business—mules, ships' pumps, railway engines, telegraph wire, and Canadian boatmen. The hon. Member might have finished each story with the words "too late," and he did so by implication. But who was responsible for this constant system of "too late?" The earlier Egyptian Expedition terminated much earlier than was anticipated; but if it had not terminated as early, every one of the things mentioned by the hon. Member would have been required. The hon. Member also suggested that the Admiralty should deal direct with the shipowners when they wanted to charter vessels; but did he know that the Admiralty had quite recently as many as 1,100 steamers offered them? It would have been impossible for the owners of all these to have treated directly with the Admiralty, and such a system would be quite absurd and unreasonable. The proper way for doing it was, as the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Sutherland) had suggested, to employ agents to find the Government the vessels they wanted. The hon. Member for Glasgow referred to the price paid for the Storm Cock. This vessel belonged to a class of which there were not more than two or three in the country, being a very powerful twin screw tug. It was therefore absurd to compare this vessel with trading vessels of any ordinary kind, or to expect that it could be had at the same rate. The Recovery, which belonged to the Liverpool Underwriters' Association, was a vessel with exceptional appliances for lifting heavy weights, and, had the war continued, would have been extremely useful. He doubted if there was another steamer like her in this country, and therefore it was unreasonable to expect that she could be had at as cheap a rate as vessels of an ordinary description. He thanked the House for having permitted him to reply to the very unfair and inaccurate statements made by the hon. Member for Glasgow.

Mr. Sutherland

Mr. A. H. BROWN said, he thought the Transport Department of the Admiralty could not be charged with want of energy. In his opinion, the case of the hon. Member for Glasgow that the stores were always too late, broke down on examination. The late campaign in Egypt was fought out before a base had fairly been formed. Sufficient military reasons could be adduced for this course, and therefore the charge that the Admiralty were too late could not be sustained. Looking to the tonnage employed, the result of the Expedition was one of which they ought to be proud. In all wars it always would be found that military exigencies arose against which it would be impossible to provide in a moment. In his opinion, the stopping of the transports and the preventing them entering the Suez Canal, were due to such military exigencies, and not due to mismanagement by the Transport Department of the Admiralty.

Mr. GILLES thought that the discursive onslaught made by the hon. Member for Glasgow on the Transport Department of the Admiralty was a little exaggerated, and somewhat undeserved. The hon. Member had said the operations of the Transport Department were unbusiness-like and extravagant, and suggested that it would have been well if the Government had issued tenders to the shipowners; but after it had been stated that 1,100 vessels were offered to the Admiralty without tenders, he left it to the House to imagine how many would have been offered if advertisements for tenders had been sent out. It was not too much to say that, had they advertised, every old tub in the Kingdom would have been offered to them. As to the charge of extravagance against the Department, he could only say from his own experience that the shipowners were by no means satisfied with the prices they got, and did not think them at all extravagant. The hon. Member complained that some owners employed brokers; but just as a landowner employed agents, so also many shipowners had their business managed by brokers, and he thought the Government acted wisely in selecting in this way the vessels they considered would answer their purpose. He was bound to say, when he heard the reflections that had been made upon the Head of the Transport Department, that in his opinion they were entirely undeserved.

not be passed by, against a well-known firm of shipbrokers—Messrs. Ellis and Son—and against a gentleman—Mr. Baughan—whose business it was in the Admiralty to charter ships. Messrs. Ellis and Son had been chartering ships for the Admiralty since the Crimean War. They were one of the oldest firms in the business, and they had obtained a special knowledge of the requirements of the Admiralty, and it was not, therefore, to be wondered at that owners of ships placed their vessels in the hands of Messrs. Ellis and Son for tender to the Admiralty. The hon. Member suggested, as he (Mr. Cairne) understood, that they got an extra number of ships engaged in consequence of some favouritism, owing to there being a relative of Mr. Baughan in their office. Those who heard his hon. Friend's speech would be inclined to suppose that this relation of Mr. Baughan's was really a partner interested in the pecuniary results of these transactions. As a matter of fact, however, the person referred to was in the office of Messrs. Ellis and Son, and enjoyed the munificent and remunerative salary of £70 a-year. That would give the House an idea of the influence this gentleman possessed in Messrs. Ellis and Son's office. He was glad that the shipowners in the House had spoken up for Mr. Baughan, and had not left the defence of that gentleman to him. They had, in fact, borne so striking testimony to his integrity and ability as to leave him Mr. Cairne little to say on that subject. But with respect to the Messrs. Ellis and Son, he must say that they were a well-known firm, having business relations with the largest firms in the Port of Liverpool and other ports. A number of ships were always placed in their hands by shipowners throughout the country, and they were able to submit by far the largest number of ships that came under the notice of the Transport Department of the Admiralty. In the present operations, Messrs. Ellis and Son had furnished, only a week or two ago, to the Admiralty a single list of 75 ships, of which, as yet, only four had been chartered, simply because now, in the unfortunately depressed condition of shipping, the ships offered were greatly in excess of those available during the previous Expedition. He noticed that his hon. Friend, in his speech, paid an unconscious compliment to Messrs. Ellis and Son, in saying that they outwitted a leading firm engaged in the Cape trade. Any broker or any firm that could outwit his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire Sir Donald Currie—who was at the head of the "Castle" line of Cape steamers—must be very sharp-witted indeed. Now, as to the question of brokerage, the hon. Member seemed to be under the impression that the brokerage was paid by the Government. This was not the case; the brokerage was paid by the owners of the ships. Out of the 72 vessels on the list which his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) moved for, 34 were chartered from brokers and 38 from owners; and if his hon. Friend examined the list, he would find that the ships chartered by the shipbrokers were not, on the whole, dearer than those chartered direct from the shipowners. The hon. Member had very severely referred to the delay in the arrival of the Carthage, which was chartered at £750 a-month for a medical transport and hospital ship, and which, he said, did not arrive at Alexandria until three days after the departure of the Expedition to Ismailia, and that it was not available until after two engagements had been fought, thus throwing the medical arrangements out of gear. But he (Mr. Cairne) had already explained that this ship was one which was stopped by Lord Wolseley; and, indeed, instead of applying the phrase "too late" to this and to other cases, it might be said that they arose from Lord Wolseley being "too soon." It was the marvellous rapidity with which Lord Wolseley carried out the campaign, not that these vessels were "too late." With regard to the Netling Hill, no doubt it had taken longer on its journey than had been expected; but it was by no means a costly ship for what it was required to do, and if its work had to be done over again, it would probably be done in exactly the same way. As to the pier of which the hon. Member complained, because it was sent in three ships, that was because it could not be got into one. The hon. Gentleman had referred to the Recovery and to the lifting of locomotive engines. It must be borne in mind, however, that the Recovery was half a tug and half a salvage vessel, and that the cost of building such a vessel would have been very great.

In these circumstances, therefore, £600 per month was a reasonable rate for such a ship. The vessel was not intended to lift locomotives, but to lift sunken ships and lighters in the Canal. The hon. Gentleman had wrongly described the Oxenholme as an eight-and-a-half-knot ship. As a matter of fact, however, in the course of this Expedition, the vessel steamed 10 knots one day and 11 knots on another. The figure quoted by the hon. Member from the Return was a wrong description. Complaint was also made that the Canadian boatmen were not brought to this country and transhipped. They were not brought to this country for the reason that they were taken to Alexandria direct in a steamer, the Ocean King, which was lying in Montreal at the time she was engaged for the service, and was not sent out from London as his hon. Friend alleged. Reference had also been made to the Storm Cock, and it was asked why £750 per month was paid for this vessel, which was also chartered from Messrs. Ellis and Son. It was a very exceptional steamer, there being only two such in existence, and this sum had been paid because the vessel could not be obtained for less. At any rate, he thought the price paid was exceedingly reasonable. He had endeavoured to go categorically through the various charges brought forward by the hon. Member. He hoped he had shown the House that, although there might have been some little delay here and there, the carrying out of this exceedingly difficult piece of transport work, if summarized by his hon. Friend, would be found to reflect the greatest credit upon the Department, and he felt sure there was not a single firm of shipowners that could have done it so well.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he felt bound to congratulate the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caine) on the facility and rapidity with which he had acquired the habit of making a defence. One would almost think his speech had been prepared beforehand. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had met the usual experience of those who exposed grievances and advocated remedies. He had been accused of and condemned for making many charges which he never made. His hon. Friend had complained not so much about the price paid for the vessels, as for the unfortunate circumstance that the vessels were useless for the purpose for which they were chartered; and, in spite of all the denials that had been given, the fact remained that it was so. For instance, the Carthage was a case in point; for though it was undoubtedly a very fine vessel it arrived too late; and the same remark applied to the Recovery—that it was not at hand when required; whilst, as to the Notting Hill, he did not think there could have been or could be greater bungling. The charges brought forward by his hon. Friend showed clearly that there was a want of co-operation between the Admiralty and the War Office. There was not that co-operation which insured the prompt and efficient discharge of work that had to be done. No doubt, the Expedition was successful; but anyone, in reading over the evidence and noting the mishaps which occurred, as well as the want of organization indicated by the evidence brought before the Committee, would see that they had reason to congratulate themselves that the Expedition was so successful as it really turned out to be, for it was perfectly certain, owing to this want of harmony and divided responsibility, that if we had had to face in Egypt an enemy worthy of the British arms, the result might have been different. He was glad that the question had been raised, because he believed his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow had done good service in bringing it before the House and the country, and he thought if the Admiralty would adopt the plan practised by the firm over which his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock (Mr. Sutherland) presided it would be advantageous. He knew for a fact that great complaint had been made by the shipowners in the City, that no vessels, however good they might be, could be chartered except through one particular firm of brokers. He could not see that any harm would result from the Government adopting the practice of allowing the public to know that they were open to receive tenders for the chartering of vessels; because it seemed to him that that was the most advantageous way of carrying out work of this nature. He hoped that when the new Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Caine) brought his business qualifications to bear on the chartering of vessels and the purchase of stores, he would not, at the end of his official career, have so many failures to account for and regret as had been disclosed in connection with the Egyptian Campaign of 1882.

Mr. Caine

Dr. FARQUHARSON said, he could not help expressing his sense of the amusement he experienced at the judicious vagueness of the defence adopted by the Representative of the Admiralty. It seemed to him that that defence dealt more with the arguments not brought forward by the hon. Member for Glasgow

Dr. Cameron than with the specific accusations which he had brought forward. The evidence upon which his hon. Friend based his case was given before the Select Committee on Transport and Commissariat which sat last Session; and, although he (Dr. Farquharson) agreed with those hon. Members who believed that the war had been a great and a brilliant success, he thought that, as had been said, anyone who had read the evidence taken before that Committee would feel convinced that that success would have been still more marked had the arrangements entered into by the Admiralty in regard to chartering merchant vessels been better carried out. He did not think that his hon. Friend the Junior Lord of the Admiralty had made out a good defence upon this point. At all events, it was quite clear that the present system was capable of great improvement, and he quite agreed that his hon. Friend (Dr. Cameron) had done good service in bringing it forward. He (Dr. Farquharson) maintained that, through these defects, great suffering had been endured by wounded and invalid men in consequence of the non-arrival in time of the ships conveying the hospital appliances and commissariat. He had heard to-night with some surprise that the Committee, of which he had the honour of being a Member last year, was not to be re-appointed during the present year. He regretted that step, for he believed that the re-appointment of that Committee would be a great advantage to the Service.

Mr. GOURLEY said, he had hoped that the hon. Gentleman the Junior Lord of the Admiralty would have expressed his intention to confer some mark of honour upon the masters and officers of the Mercantile Marine who had been engaged in the service of the Government for several months during the Egyptian Campaign, and had conducted the Transport Service so satisfactorily, and without any casualty whatever. He thought that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had made out a very clear case in favour of the re-appointment of the Transport and Commissariat Committee of last year, and had done good service in the matter. He should support his hon. Friend if he went to a division. If the present system of chartering vessels was not based upon favouritism, it certainly was a very bad system, for the Transport Department of the Admiralty did not always engage those ships which were best adapted for transport, and in many cases they had not chosen the fastest. He thought that in all cases, excepting periods of severe pressure, ships should, as with the Emigration Commissioners, be engaged by public tender. He did not think that the defence of the Admiralty with regard to Messrs. Ellis and Son had been made out satisfactorily, because the Admiralty could, under the terms of the Post Office Mail Contracts demand the use of ships so employed from their owners.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," again proposed.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY—THE SINKING FUND—OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. MARRIOTT, in rising, according to Notice, to call attention to the present state of the Navy, and to move a Resolution, said: Sir, the subject of the deficiencies of the Navy has been for some time past well before the public. Special attention has been called to the subject by certain of the evening papers; and it has been discovered, in the last two or three years, that Members of the Government are particularly amenable to any expressions of opinion given in the evening papers. I do not know why they should make a distinction between morning and evening papers; but, practically, the Government has been very much carried on lately by what I may call Government by the evening papers. Hon. Members will recollect how, a short time ago, there appeared a series of articles on The Litter City in one of the evening papers, and that the Government immediately appointed a Commission to inquire into the question of the housing of the Metropolitan poor. About a year ago, the same paper, The Pall Mall Gazette, made an onslaught against the Government, and urged them to send to Egypt that unfortunate General, Gordon. Many other means had been suggested by other counsellors for dealing with the Egyptian difficulty, but they were entirely neglected, and the Government once more listened to The Pall Mall Gazette, and sent General Gordon out on his ill-fated mission. It was due to this paper that attention was called to naval deficiencies in October or November last; and it was certainly strange that while Admirals and various officials connected with the Admiralty had been pointing out to the Government the danger that existed, their complaints were entirely passed by; but the moment that the articles appeared in this journal, the Government paid them immediate attention, and such attention, too, that they actually came down to the House and submitted proposals for increasing the Naval Estimates by no less a sum than £5,525,000. I have no hesitation in saying that that increase appeared to be due wholly to the agitation of The Pall Mall Gazette. With regard to that £5,525,000, I am sure I, for one—I hope I do not show an undue curiosity—should like to know what has taken place in the official circles of the Government. Report says that a Committee of the Admiralty was appointed, and that they recommended an expenditure not of £5,525,000, but of something like £11,000,000 sterling. Now, we know that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) is a Gentleman whom we can respect, and he always shows great respect to this House by coming down here with carefully prepared speeches. I had the pleasure of listening to his speech when he proposed the Estimates, and the whole of us formed the idea that a sum of £10,000,000 or £11,000,000 would be spent in remedying the deficiencies of the Navy. Yet the hon. Gentleman has now come to the lame conclusion that only £5,525,000 is to be spent, and that not at once, but to be spread over five years. That is the proposal of the Government through him, and it comes merely to this, that in five years another £1,000,000 is to be added to the Naval Estimates. That shows the Government have never realized the gravity of the naval condition of this country, and have no adequate idea of our naval defences. They are now going to meet this demand in a huckstering, and what I may call a Party, spirit, to please their own Party, both in this House and out of it, instead of recognizing the real wants of the country. Now, it is worth while inquiring why the condition of the Navy should be the subject of complaint, not merely among all the officials, but that there should be a widespread anxiety in the country and abroad, which has even moved the Government themselves to confess their shortcomings? The historian of the future, when looking back to the year 1868, and coming down to the present time, will call the interval "the Gladstone period;" for in the year 1868, the present Head of the Government became, for the first time, Prime Minister of what was then a great, powerful, and universally respected Empire. Well, in that year, the Naval Estimates were £10,896,871, or close upon £11,000,000. Now, if we go back to the happy period when the present Premier first became Prime Minister in this country, and compare it with the year 1883—and I bring it to this year, because it is the only year the statistics are collected—we find the following facts. Some of them are very satisfactory to the country, and I have no doubt if some Party historian were writing a history of the period, he would attribute all this to the benign influence of a Liberal Government. It seems that between these years the population increased by nearly 5,000,000; the increase in the imports and exports between 1868 and 1883 amounted to £210,000,000; while the increase in the value of our shipping was £1,509,000. The property assessed to the Income Tax has increased £171,082,000. Now, taking that increase, which was brought about not by the Government, but in spite of them, people would think that the Naval Estimates would have increased in proportion. Yet what is the fact? Why, I gave you just now the Naval Estimates in 1868 and in 1882-3. They were £10,662,184, and thus, far from showing an increase, they exhibit a decrease of £234,687, as compared with the Estimates of 1868. Well, now, that is an astounding statement. I do not believe it is known, believed, or realized by the country at large. I feel certain that the evening paper to which I referred has done enormous service to the country in drawing attention to this subject, and in having able writers to bring those figures before us. I hope they have been studied by all. I am sure that, if encouraged, the Secretary of the Admiralty will speak. These figures have been in print for some time; they have astounded me, and I think they must have astounded everybody. Here is a vast increase in the population and property of the country, and a decrease in the Naval Estimates which are to provide for the defence of the country. In other words, we are increasing the wealth, but reducing the power to protect that wealth. I have no doubt—indeed, we know it is a fact—that our power has actually been diminished during the last five or six years; whilst other nations have been maintaining their expenditure and increasing their power. In the same period of time Germany, Russia, France, and Italy have increased their expenditure to the extent of £4,273,886, or about £1,000,000 each, while this country has gone backwards. We know the Prime Minister has always been a great and prominent advocate of economy. His great object has always been to present himself before the nation as above all an economist, and present to the nation a favourable Budget. I do not know exactly what the Royal Horse Guards' next Budget will be; but I imagine it will be somewhat disappointing to himself, and especially to the nation. The result of his policy will, in fact, be a serious money loss, as well as a great blow to the prestige of this country. There has, perhaps, been economy; but it is economy at the sacrifice of efficiency, and the sacrifice of the blood and wealth of the country. I admit that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has, by devoting all his energies and abilities to legislation, produced some good measures—some which were sensational, and some of which were harmful and detrimental to the interests of the nation—but in devoting all his energies to legislation he has neglected administration and government, and he has forgotten that there is someone else to consider, for in a great Empire like this, not legislating alone for 35,000,000 of people, but for something like 300,000,000, administration and government are of far greater importance than the legislation which has been going on in this country for the last 15 or 16 years; and, moreover, the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's Administration has been permeated by this narrow spirit of economy bearing everything down with it. If we could only get behind the scenes, we should find, I have not the least doubt, that the officials at the War Office and the Admiralty have done their duty to the State by pointing out the requirements of their Services and the state into which everything was falling for want of the necessary supplies, and that these officials have given proper advice; and we should also find that, at the Treasury, the Estimates of these officials have been sifted and cut down, and the country sacrificed to the supposed necessities of the Department. The object—the paltry object—of the Treasury is to get everything cheap, so as to show the country, if possible, that the Government of the present Prime Minister is much cheaper than the Government of other Ministries. I regret, however, that I am also compelled to reflect upon the Administration of the last Government, which also stinted the Services owing to the baneful influence of the Prime Minister. It has proved to be a very difficult thing to resist that influence in this House. You will all remember a Gentleman who was highly respected by every person and by every Party in this House. He was the type of a true English Gentleman, distinguished for his honest opinion and plainness of speech and his inability to say anything which was not straightforward and true. I refer to the late Mr. Ward Hunt. Well, when he became First Lord of the Admiralty, and upon examining into the state of the Navy, and seeing its condition, he blurted out the truth, and made use of those famous words—"It is a phantom Navy." We know the sensation which those words produced at the time; but we also know that pressure was brought to bear upon Mr. Ward Hunt, who was afterwards induced to admit that he might have spoken too strongly, though there appears to be no doubt now that he spoke the truth, but that the influence of the economist was too strong for him. The late Prime Minister inherited the same evil traditions of 1868, and the Navy again suffered, so that, at the present time, we are in a very dangerous position, and our naval strength is very small compared with that of other nations. The public want to know the truth with regard to the Navy. The present Ministry has no policy; they only seek to catch what they think to be public opinion, so as to get a majority in the House and the country. What is really required is that public opinion should be guided and led by those who conduct the Government of the country. Instead of pandering to public opinion, a Ministry should lead, and, if necessary, oppose public opinion. Instead of trying to catch public opinion they should have a policy of their own, and more especially they should devote themselves to keeping up the naval strength of the country. What, I ask, is the result of all this spirit of economy, marring our administrative power? Why, that, at the present moment, this country is only slightly superior to France in first-class iron-clads, whilst it is behindhand in guns and torpedo boats; and in four years' time, at the present rate of progress in both countries, we shall be equal in iron-clads, and still inferior in guns and torpedoes. We have at the present timesomethinglike 30 first-rate iron-clads to France's 19. At the end of the year we shall have 37, and France 30, and in four years each Power will have 48. But many of these vessels are older than the French, and older than the time which I think Lord Northbrook has set down for the efficient life of an iron-clad—namely, 17 years. After 17 years, we are told, they become obsolete and useless. In that respect we shall see that we have only 14 first-class iron-clads built within the last 17 years; whilst France has 17; and, at the present time, we have seven launched and completed, whilst France has eight. Both nations have six on the stocks, and I admit that we are promised four more; but the promise is not to be fulfilled for four years, and the Navy of France will continue to be equal, if not superior, to our own. I have only been referring to first-class ships; but in torpedo boats and guns there can be no doubt of the superiority of other nations over ourselves. In torpedo boats we are far behind France, Germany, Italy, and Russia; that is a scandal to the Naval Administration of this country. This country has more valuable shipping ports than any country in the world, and torpedo boats are the most available for their defence. But these are practically undefended at the present time. What caused me to put down my Motion was this—that I felt that this country had for years neglected her Navy. She has not spent enough money upon it; and the consequence is that, whilst other nations are advancing, we are standing still, or rather going back in proportion to our requirements. What we want is statesmen to rule the nation, who have courage of their opinions, and who will be prepared to form and guide public opinion, instead of being its slaves. We see how Prince Bismarck, in the Parliament of Germany, is not afraid even to oppose public opinion.

Mr. Marriott

MR. GOURLEY said, he rose to Order. What had the doings of Prince Bismarck to do with the subject before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. and learned Member is somewhat wandering from the subject, which is that the House go into Committee of Supply.

MR. MARRIOTT: I merely wished to point out how Prince Bismarck, in advocating the establishment of lines of steamers for Australia and elsewhere, has the courage of his convictions; and we want statesmen who are capable of forming opinions, and of showing that they have the strength to maintain them. I consider that I am doing a kindness to the Ministry in pointing out what are the true feelings of the people and the real wants of the country. Anybody can see that by our neglect of the Services we have lost power and influence in our negotiations with Foreign Powers, and that by our timidity we have encouraged their aggressiveness. If we had a larger Fleet we should have kept our former position as mistress of the seas, and the country would not have had to put up with and suffer the many insults and rebuffs as we have done during the last few months. If we are to be respected we must be strong; and I say the proposals made by the Government last December are not sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. We want to spend something like £7,000,000 or £10,000,000 at once, in order to bring us up to the relative position which we held in 1868; and

Mr. Marriott

however we may raise the money, whether we borrow, or suspend the Sinking Fund, it would be a most economical outlay in the end, for it would place Her Majesty's Government, when negotiating with other Powers, in such a position of strength, that they would be able to command peace. If Her Majesty's Government had taken up a firm attitude, and announced some time ago that they were prepared to spend at once £10,000,000 upon our Navy, I do not think we should have had the rebuffs we have had from Germany, or the encroachments we have had to submit to from Russia. I hope we shall no longer fetter our strength for the sake of the miserable contingencies of Party Government, and thus continue to bring a great nation into disrepute, besides causing a great and unnecessary expenditure in blood and treasure. In conclusion I beg to thank the House for the manner in which it has heard me. I believe sincerely in the spirit of the Motion which I have to lay before the House, and therefore I propose—

“That considering the present acknowledged insufficiency of the British Navy, and the great depression of the Shipbuilding Trade, it is advisable to defer the payments made in respect of the National Debt for one year, in order to apply the Surplus Revenue of the Nation to the building and repairing of Ships in the National Dockyards and private Shipbuilding Yards.”

Mr. SPEAKER said, that, a Motion having already been made and negatived, the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member could not be put from the Chair.

Mr. CARBUTT said, he had no intention to follow the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) into the many political subjects which he had touched upon; but he wished to say that there was reason for the great alarm and apprehension felt in the country that we were not now fully prepared to meet our enemies in case the necessity for doing so should arise. He was certain the 2,000,000 voters who had been enfranchised would take care that the Government looked more after the protection of this country than they had been doing of late; and he believed they would not protest against any reasonable expenditure of money for the preservation of the honour of the Empire. The Government should never back unless they were prepared to bite, and they should never threaten unless they were prepared to strike. His own impression was that with regard to guns we were in a very backward state; indeed, it seemed that for some years past the country was altogether indifferent about the matter, the consequence being that we had rapidly fallen behind other countries with respect to it. But when he remembered all the difficulties and trials which the French underwent at the time of the occupation of their country by the Germans, and reflected that perhaps the same thing might happen to us at a future time, he thought it was necessary that that subject should be inquired into very closely. We had no reliable guns, and Lord Northbrook himself had admitted, in a speech made in “another place,” that there had been a most regrettable delay in supplying breech-loading guns for the Navy. The House ought to inquire whose fault that was owing to, and should take care that that state of things should not continue. As a manufacturing nation, he considered we ought to be able to maintain our own, and not be dependent for the supply of our guns on foreign nations. On a former occasion he had said that at present they had not one single large breech-loading steel gun that was capable of doing any good work. He desired to qualify that remark, because on the day that he made it a trial took place in Her Majesty's Ship Collingwood with two 43-ton steel guns that were prepared for the Edinburgh; and since then two more had been placed on board ship. So that they had four of those 43-ton guns that were able to fire to a certain extent; but, judging from the account that had been given of the trial, they could hardly consider those guns in a condition to be of any service to them at present, as they were unable to fire these guns with full powder charges. It was monstrous that they should go on building those guns on the assumption that they would do so and so; and not only that, but that they should make 63-ton guns and 110-ton guns on the same principle without thoroughly testing them, and satisfying themselves that they were really capable of doing the work that should be expected from them. Those 43-ton guns were originally designed to fire with 400 lbs. of powder, whereas at present they fired with only 293 lbs. His contention was that the Government had never encouraged the manufacturers of this country, but had entirely ignored them. The firm of Messrs. Whitworth, although it had never been able to get a single order from Her Majesty's Government until lately, had continued to make guns for the Brazilian and other Governments, and had done very good work. He did not blame the present Government, who, he believed, had done all they possibly could. The late Government was as much to blame as anybody. What he blamed was the system. When it was admitted by the heads of both the Army and the Navy that the Woolwich gun was a failure, and the system had broken down, arrangements ought to have been made for the adoption of a better system. A remarkable paper had been read at the United Service Institution by Colonel Maitland, the head of the Gun Department at Woolwich. He stated that up to 1875 the British Artillery was as good as that of any other nation. Then, he said, there came a period of stagnation; and since that we had been endeavouring to make up our leeway. Science advanced so fast that the Power which waited the longest was always in the best position, supposing it were not caught napping. In effect, this was an important admission that we had been left behind by other nations; and it was a fortunate thing that we had not been caught napping. If we were to maintain our position as leaders and colonizers, it was necessary that we should be fully prepared to maintain our own. From another passage in the paper it appeared that the author admitted that we had obtained the benefit of German experience in adopting steel, and of French experience in adopting breech-loaders. Now, to his knowledge, the Germans were making steel guns 25 years ago, and the Russians 20 years ago. The French were only awakened to the fact that they were not in a position to compete with their neighbours by the occurrence of the Franco-German War. It did seem strange that we should be the leading nation in the manufacture of steel, and in the application of the inventions of Bessemer and Siemens, and yet that we should be 15 or 20 years behind other nations in adopting steel guns. Fortunately, Sir Joseph Whitworth had continued his researches, and he was glad to find that the Government had given orders to Sir Joseph Whitworth for his material. In consideration of the number of guns which had burst on different occasions, and of the fact he had before referred to, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), that the Woolwich gun had failed, it was necessary that all our large guns should be thoroughly tested, almost to destruction, so that their weak points might be discovered, and some definite decision arrived at as to which was to be the gun of the future, for we ought not to go on making guns without knowing what we were doing. On a previous occasion we made 100 Armstrong guns; we then tried one, which failed, and nearly the whole 100 were wasted. He would press the Government to test one of these large guns, if possible to destruction, and let us know whether we had got a thoroughly trustworthy system. The smaller guns had given a great deal of trouble. An 80-ton gun had burst at Gibraltar; it was one of four bought from Sir William Armstrong. These four guns cost £86,000; and one of them having burst, it was only natural to suppose that the others might do so. As long as there were any doubts on the subject men could not work these guns with the confidence which they ought to have. There had been a Committee of Inquiry and experiment, and it appeared to have tried numerous experiments on the 6-inch gun, one of which burst on Her Majesty's Ship Actiæ. What he asked was that some Committee should be appointed in the matter, so that all guns should be thoroughly tested, and a Report upon the subject made to Parliament; for his impression was that our whole system of manufacture was wrong, and that we had never attempted to make trials of any gun even when we had the chance. When we purchased the Neptune there were four 9-inch steel guns, made by Messrs. Whitworth and Co. The right hon. Member for Westminster, who was then at the head of the Admiralty, promised that they should be tried; but they had not been tried; they had been taken out and sent to Woolwich to be put aside as old iron, and the cost of replacing them was £120,000.

Mr. Carbutt

For these things he did not blame the right hon. Gentleman; but he blamed the permanent Officials at the Admiralty, who were too strong for their political Chief. It was this anomaly that we must remedy if possible. He believed that the present Surveyor General of Ordnance was doing all he could to rectify all that was wrong; but he was not a gun-maker, and he ought to have some official who could give him sound advice. He had nothing of the kind; but he was dependent upon an Inspector General of Gunnery, who had not had much experience. He was told that the last gentleman appointed was junior to every manufacturer in the service of the Government. The appointments were made for five years, and that time was barely sufficient for a responsible official to obtain the experience he required. We ought not to go on spending millions with our organization in its present chaotic state. If we would let the Admiralty get guns where they liked we should produce something like competition between the two Departments; and this would sharpen the intellects of both, with the result of benefiting the whole country. France had formerly adopted much the same system that we had, and had only one Government Department; but when the war broke out the French awoke to the fact that they were not in a position to cope with the Germans. Since that time the French had done what he should very much like to see the English Government do; they had encouraged private manufacturers to put down plant, so that in case of war the Government could apply to them for help. The Government had sent round to foreign manufacturers to obtain information with reference to guns. He believed this country had nothing to learn from foreign manufacturers; and that if, instead of going abroad, the Government had gone to manufacturers in this country, they would have found them in a position to supply any demand made upon them. An American Gun Commission had visited England, France, Germany, and Russia, and the conclusion they came to was that the French system was now the best. The French system, he might say, encouraged private manufacturers, and took advantage of the Government establishments to make experiments. He would suggest that a Committee should be appointed to whom manufacturers might send guns to be tried. There were already two or three guns which had been brought under the notice of the authorities, but which were untried. If the Government would adopt that course the country might soon be put in a position to cope with any other nation. The matter of guns had, no doubt, frequently delayed the building of ships; but if the Admiralty manufactured their own guns, or, as he had said, went where they chose for them, it would bring about competition between the two Departments, and with great benefit to the country. Further, experiments should also be made with respect to the powder; and manufacturers in this country should be encouraged to compete in the matter, with a view of arriving at some clear and definite decision as to the best powder to use, for that which was now in general use was by no means satisfactory in every respect. He had been told that, if a manufacturer wished to have any powder tried, he had to pay the Government £10 for every shot fired with the powder. That charge ought to be abolished altogether. An effort should be made to encourage firms to manufacture powder which would not be inferior to the German powder now in use. His object in making these remarks was to encourage the authorities in well-doing, and impress upon them the uselessness of expending money upon steel works at Woolwich.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Carbutt) had stated that both the late Secretary of State for War and he himself had asserted that the Woolwich gun had broken down. He found no reference whatever in Hansard to anything of the kind, and, to the best of his belief, he made no such remarks as that to which the hon. Member had referred. What he did say was that circumstances had rendered it necessary that there should be a breech-loading gun instead of a muzzle-loading gun adopted in the Navy, as the increased charges which had to be used required that the gun should be longer than could be loaded from the muzzle on board ship. The then Government, with the advice of their professional officers, determined to have a breech-loading gun for the large ships then in course of construction with the greater power which experience showed to be attainable. He, however, and his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley) never suggested that the Woolwich gun, as a gun, had broken down, or that Woolwich was incapable of furnishing guns of the kind required. He felt bound to deny the truth of many of the statements which had been made about him and his administration at the Admiralty in the course of the debate. He, of course, was prepared to submit to criticism; but when matters of fact were concerned the truth should be known. It had been stated that in France the Navy had a complete factory of their own for the supply of guns. If the Government of this country adopted the French system they would have to establish an independent factory, probably much larger than the Woolwich factory was at the present time, and also reserve to themselves the power to fall back upon the private trade. That, of course, implied a very large expenditure of public money and a new departure, which he supposed the Government would take into their consideration.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he thought that the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Carbutt) had done a great service in bringing forward the question of guns. He thought it would be a very bad plan for the Navy to make its own guns; but until the Ordnance Department became a manufacturing Department, with permission to obtain guns from private manufacturers, they would have no satisfactory supply of guns for this country. He was astonished that Secretaries of State for War should accept the responsibility of the enormous Estimates which they brought forward, because a large portion of their Estimates was for manufacturing purposes. The Estimates for the manufacture of guns ought to be kept separate, and there should be a Minister of the Crown for the Department to whom the country would look for an efficient weapon. The guns of this country, both for ships and for the defence of their ports and coaling stations, were in a most deplorable condition; and if war was to break out they would find themselves almost disarmed, and with the necessity of spending millions of money on a system not yet determined upon. He heard with great satisfaction the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton

(Mr. Marriott), who had not intervened hitherto in naval debates, and who pointed out that the Navy was causing the greatest anxiety to the country. Had it been in his power to move the Resolution which stood in his name he should have done so; but the Forms of the House prevented him bringing it forward. He should, however, like to enforce the sentiments which that Motion contained. The Motion read as follows:—

“That the condition of the Navy causes the greatest anxiety, and that, in order to restore the Naval superiority necessary for our National existence, this House is of opinion that no Naval Estimate is satisfactory which does not enable the Admiralty to complete without delay, as an addition to those now building, thirty-three completely armoured iron-clad ships, twenty-five armed cruisers, three hundred torpedo vessels; and, further, for the increase of the Marine forces to twenty thousand men, and boys to seven thousand.”

He wished to say a few words upon the subject of that Motion. It was quite evident that the country was anxious about the condition of the Navy, and that anxiety was justified, because the Admiralty had shown not only anxiety, but vacillation of purpose. What confidence could be felt in a Naval Administration whose mouthpiece in the other House stated last summer that if £4,000,000 were given to the Admiralty in excess of the £10,000,000 in the Estimates, they would not know what to do with it; then, some four months afterwards, they said that £11,000,000 was necessary; then that they would be satisfied with £5,000,000; and then, when the Navy Estimates were introduced, asked only for £1,500,000? It was said that the proper course to take would be to appoint a Royal Commission. Last year and the year before he suggested the appointment of a Committee of the House; and he believed last year his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. H. Smith) supported him. The reason why he desired that there should be a Committee of the House at that time was that the public mind was not alive to the question, and because the information which might be obtained by that Committee would, perhaps, have awakened anxiety. But it was too late now to ask for Committees or Commissions. He thought it desirable at the time to have the First Lord of the Admiralty, who was responsible for the defence of the country, before the Committee, to tell them whether he was satisfied that the Navy was sufficient; that it had proper guns; and that, in the event of a war, he would be able to make such arrangements as would be adequate for the protection of India, the Colonies, their commerce, and their own shores. But now the insufficiency of the Navy was confessed. The Admiralty confessed it. He saw with great regret distinguished officials, one of whom had a seat in "another place," and who was able to explain to Parliament the wants of the country, satisfied to remain at the Board and justify the vacillation which had prevailed there from the month of July last year down to the present time. He held that the gallant officers at the Admiralty were bound to resign their position if they could not obtain from the State that which they believed to be necessary for the defence of the country. That had been done by other officers before with good effect. In 1868 the defences of the country were insufficient, and two Lords of the Admiralty—the late Admiral Seymour and himself—having seats in that House were unable to defend the Navy Estimates. They placed their resignation in the hands of the Prime Minister. The result was that the First Lord was replaced by another, a new Board was constituted, and eight ships were put on the stocks, instead of three or four which were before determined upon. That was entirely in consequence of the resignation of two Lords of the Admiralty who had seats in that House. It would be much to the public advantage if officers who had recommended £11,000,000 at one time and £5,000,000 at another should have resigned Office when they found the sum so greatly reduced, as it afterwards was, not in consequence of their own convictions on the subject, but owing to the pressure of the Treasury. His hon. Friend (Mr. Carbutt) had alluded to France as the country with which they ought to compare their Fleet. At the present moment they had 19 ships built and building that could go more than 14 knots, while France had 26 ships of the same class. In addition to these 19 vessels, they had 14 which were efficient and fit for battle, while the French had 12 ships of that description. It was, however, impossible to consider this last class as efficient for the protection of the country, and, therefore, the first figures held good. Now, he had suggested that they should build

Mr. W. H. Smith

33 new ships capable of going more than 14 knots, because then they would have 52 vessels of that class, or twice the number the French had. The hon. Member for Perthshire Sir Donald Currie in December said he was satisfied Great Britain should have a Naval Force sufficient to contend against any three Powers, and double the Navy of France. He was urging the Admiralty to follow that judicious advice. He had spoken of the French Navy; but when he added the Italian Navy he found they had a grand total of 23 iron-clad ships, which, if added to the French total, made it more necessary that the number he had suggested should be added to the Navy of this country. Upon that point he might remark that the Secretary to the Admiralty, on the 6th of December, 1884, laid on the Table of the House a Return. He had promised to amend that Return; but for some reason, by the Return before the House, it appeared the Admiralty were building 17 iron-clad ships, when they were in reality only building six. That was somewhat misleading; and he therefore thought it right to point out to the House the great error into which they would be led if they accepted that Return. It might be asked what did they want 52 iron-clad ships for, putting aside the question that this country might have to meet the combined Fleets of any two nations, and putting aside the question of the protection of the commerce of the country? At that moment there was what was called a Channel Fleet; but two only of the ships which composed it were ships that could steam, or could defend themselves against any of the first-class iron-clads of other Powers. It might be said that there were a great number of ships in the Coastguard. They might be good enough for training men in, but everyone knew that the armour was thin; and, practically, the only iron-clad ships of any value were the two in the Channel Fleet, the three under repair, and the eight in the Mediterranean. Of course, he did not include in that number the ships upon the stocks; but of the nine ships on the stocks only two had any date mentioned at which they were likely to be ready. That being so, the country had nothing to rely upon at home in the event of war. At that moment there were in China three Russian iron-clads, all very good ships, and four French ships. A war was going on in China, and a question of blockade might arise, and either the French or the Russian Squadron could come down on Hong Kong and insist upon getting supplies from there, which this country, as neutral, had no right to give. Was it right that war should be going on where this country had such enormous interests, and that there should not be a single ship which could say—"You cannot have supplies, for we will not allow you." If at that moment either of the two Powers he had mentioned went to war with this country and sank a vessel in the Suez Canal, the coasts of India, China, and the Colonies were at once at their mercy. Therefore, it was the business of this country to take care for the protection of all these places, as well as to keep up its good name as a neutral, that it should have a sufficient police of the sea to protect them. Their great Colonies were ready to bear the cost of building iron-clads themselves if the Admiralty would only set them the example by providing ships for the defence of their own coasts and trade. There was another point upon which he should like some information, and that was the condition of the boilers of the ships which were now available. The information he had endeavoured to obtain, and which he believed was correct, was such that he believed there were not 15 ships which had boilers which did not require almost immediate change, and it was a very well-known thing that the changing of a boiler could not be effected in a day. So far he had spoken of the iron-clad ships; but an iron-clad fleet was not an efficient fleet, for an iron-clad ship required at least two attendants. It required a coaling vessel, and it required a vessel of the Scout class, for the purpose of keeping off torpedo vessels and other work. There ought to be 104 of these vessels to attend upon their iron-clads, and a certain number of ships to be employed as rams, three or four of which should be attached to every fleet. Torpedo vessels were also wanted, and colliers to supply the fleet with coal. All these ships were necessary; yet none of them were at present being prepared. He saw with dismay the activity of Russia and Germany in the manufacture of torpedo boats. The Admiralty talked of building 10, which would be about a sufficient number to protect the Thames. Each of their harbours ought to possess a flotilla of those boats. Altogether, 300 would not be too large a number to build. As to masted iron-clads, he believed that they ought no longer to be built. Much cost would be saved by building mastless iron-clads only. In considering how much money might fairly be demanded for naval purposes, they ought to remember that in 1860, and the following years, £12,500,000 were annually voted for the Navy, out of which £1,000,000 only was spent on the dead weight. Now the annual Vote did not exceed £10,000,000, £2,000,000 of which were spent on the dead weight. In recent years £46,000,000, which ought to have been spent on the Navy, had thus been saved. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would disgorge some of that plunder there would be plenty of money to spend on the Navy. As to armoured cruisers, there ought to be four of them to each of the six great lines of ocean communication. It would be wise to build 30. In regard to the Marines, 12,400 were the number now borne on the Estimates. Seven thousand of these were necessary for the service of the Fleet, while the remainder were on shore learning their military duties. Now, however, the Marines were called upon to serve elsewhere than at sea, many of them being at that moment with the Army at Suakin. They performed their duties right well; but 12,400 men were not sufficient for the services which they were now called upon to perform, and their strength ought to be raised to 20,000. Steps ought to be taken to increase the number of boys in training for the Navy, and a reserve of stokers ought to be formed. At present, their complement of stokers was deficient by 3,000 or 4,000; and he feared that in an emergency they would be unable to obtain the necessary number from the Merchant Navy, unless they should, unfortunately, be set free by the blockade of their ports and the destruction of their merchant ships.

Mr. BRAND said, he was not aware that the question of armaments was to be brought forward, or he would have been able to have given a detailed answer. The right hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay) had argued that it would be a very good change if the Ordnance Department were made into a separate Department to supply the Navy as well as the Army. He might remind his right hon. and gallant Friend that the Admiralty had already been made responsible for the gun mountings, and that the question of the construction of guns was now being seriously considered by the Heads of that Department. It was true, as was complained, that the Government paid a high price for what was known as cona powder to the German manufacturers; but it was a special article, and it had been decided by the Ordnance Committee that it was the best powder which could be used for heavy ordnance. His hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth Districts (Mr. Carbutt) appeared to labour under a misapprehension on several points. He complained that the Heads of the Departments at Woolwich, and the officials who advised the Secretary of State in those matters, were not sufficiently experienced. The fact, however, was that the present Director of Artillery was an officer of great experience; and Colonel Maitland, the Superintendent of the Royal Gun Factory, was also a distinguished artilleryman. It was true that this official was only appointed for five years; but he might be retained in his post for a longer period if the Secretary of State should think it desirable. His hon. Friend was also mistaken in saying that there was not a Committee of scientific or skilled officers to whom important inventions could be referred. Such a Committee had been appointed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was now sitting.

Sir John Hay

Mr. CARBUTT: I did not say there was no such Committee; but that important inventions were not tried.

Mr. BRAND observed that his hon. Friend was equally wrong there, for during the last few months an officer had submitted the design of a new gun to the War Office, and had been given every encouragement. His gun, when made, would be submitted to the Ordnance Department. He did not complain of criticism, which was often valuable and encouraging; but when attacks were made upon the Government for delay in the manufacture of breech-loading ordnance, it ought to be remembered that the French Government adopted breech-loading ordnance 16 years ago; whereas we had only adopted it during the last five or six years. He did not, however, think matters were so serious as his hon. Friend supposed. The Government had done their best to encourage private enterprise, and especially in the direction of steel making. But time was required for the development of manufactures of that kind, as much capital was expended, and manufacturers wanted some assurance that their capital would meet with an adequate return. He thought he could say that the manufacturers at Sheffield and Newcastle were satisfied with the assurances which the Government had given. The result was that now, within a few weeks, besides Whitworth, Firth, Cammel, and Vickers, of Sheffield and Edwicks, would be able to supply the Government with heavy forgings. Whitworth was at present able to build up guns for the Navy, and Vickers would be able in a very few weeks to do the same thing; while the Government had spent £100,000 in plant to increase the manufacturing capacity at Woolwich. There only remained one question for him to mention, though, perhaps, it was the most important of all—namely, the question of the design and pattern of their guns. He was sorry the hon. Member for Wigan Mr. A. F. Egerton had hinted that the Committee which had recently been appointed implied dissatisfaction with the guns now manufacturing for the Royal Navy. But there was no such object and no such fear. The system of manufacture and the designs employed had never been called in question. It appeared to the Secretary of State that it would be of very great advantage if a Committee were appointed, consisting of members of the Ordnance Committee and of gentlemen of very great experience outside the Department. The Committee consisted of Sir William Armstrong, Captain Noble, Mr. Lees (representing Messrs. Whitworth), and Sir Frederick Abel, besides Sir Frederick Bramwell, Mr. Barlow, and other members of the Ordnance Department. All the recommendations made by the Committee were completed, and would be forwarded to-day; but the Report itself had not yet been furnished. The recommendations that had been made would be embodied in it. They had recommended that certain guns of present design should be strengthened in the chase with a view to their using slow-burning powder. Guns of future construction would be adapted for this powder. The Committee had recommended that no alteration should be made in the 12-inch guns, mark II., or the 6-inch guns, mark III., forming the armament of the Conqueror and Colossus. But, speaking generally, with the exception of some slight alterations for strengthening guns, the Committee approved of the present system of gun construction. The Ordnance Department, he thought, had received some rather unmerited abuse. He was quite convinced that there were no officers more capable and more thoroughly experienced than the present Constructor of Artillery and the present Superintendent of the Royal Gun Factory. They were working in cordial co-operation with the great private firms; and he felt perfectly sure that, with the help of the private trade, encouraged as it now was by the Government and the resources of Woolwich Arsenal, the Government would very shortly be able to complete the breech-loading armament of the Navy.

MR. BIRKBECK, in rising to call attention to the increased depredations by foreign trawling vessels on the English drift-net fisheries on the East Coast, and the losses incurred therefrom by owners and fishermen, and to the inadequate protection provided by the Admiralty Authorities for enforcing the provisions of the North Sea Fisheries Convention, said, he must apologize for detaining the House a very few minutes while he referred to a grievance which his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty thoroughly realized and appreciated. That grievance was the totally insufficient number and the unsuitable class of vessels provided by the Admiralty Authorities for putting into force the provisions of the North Sea Fisheries Convention. During the autumn months there was a fleet of large fishing vessels, amounting to about 1,000, fishing in the immediate vicinity of the East Coast; and there was also, he regretted to say, a number of foreign trawling smacks, which did an enormous amount of damage, and the Admiralty afforded insufficient and unsatisfactory protection to their English vessels. On one occasion an owner in one night lost no less than £400; another owner lost £600; and last autumn it was estimated that the owners of Lowestoft suffered to the extent of £10,000, and Yarmouth only a little less, so that the House would now see the importance of adequate protection being given to this large fleet. The Admiralty Authorities knew perfectly well that the North Sea Fisheries Convention was passed two years ago, and that an Act of Parliament was passed in 1883 embodying the provisions of that Convention; and under the Articles of the Convention there was special reference to the duties of providing cruisers for the protection of their fishing vessels. But no provision had as yet been made for that purpose by the Admiralty. The Secretary to the Admiralty was fully aware that a chart had been handed in to the Admiralty in May last, indicating the very spots in which those depredations had taken place, and naming the time when the cruisers ought to be on the grounds for the protection of our fleet. Another complaint was that the vessels which were sent out by the Admiralty did not carry out the duties they were sent to perform. He might mention that one of those cruisers—namely, the Cherub, instead of being out on the fishing-grounds and protecting the vessels, remained in harbour doing absolutely nothing from October 31 till November 7. In another instance she was four days in harbour. He therefore regretted that the commanders of those vessels did not carry out the orders given them by the Admiralty as he believed, but remained in harbour instead of being out on the fishing grounds. If trawling smacks remained out in the North Sea for eight weeks, surely Her Majesty's cruisers ought to be able to do the same. He would especially urge the Admiralty Authorities, without delay, to make the necessary arrangements for providing at least four sailing cruisers for the district referred to, and not steam tenders, as the latter did more harm than the Belgian vessels with their "devils." He would now refer to a communication from the secretary of the Drift-Net Protection Society, in which that gentleman spoke of—

"The arrival of fishing boats with great loss of gear, caused by foreign trawlers." He added—

"I have every reason to believe that a Belgian trawler of Ostend (No. 200), done $500 of damage alone. Some fishermen are laying their boats up, having lost all their gear."

The hon. Member also referred to a daring outrage which had been perpetrated by an Ostend trawler, which crossed the nets of one of our fishing luggers, the Nil Desperandum, about midnight, cutting the warps. As she continued her course, the master and one of the crew went in a boat to pursue her, and obtain, if possible, her number. The crew, as the boat neared the trawler, could see two men coming up out of the cabin with guns, and when within 30 yards of her one of the men discharged his piece at the men in the boat. They at once fell to the bottom, fearing they might be killed. They could, however, see that the other man stood ready with his gun to fire, and they accordingly let the boat drift away in order to escape. On arriving in port Baxter, the master and owner, at once went to the Custom House and made depositions. The depredations were wholesale; 20 fishing-boats having lost 1,770 nets. That showed the absolute necessity of an adequate number of Government cutters being sent to protect the boats; and it was indispensable that each cruiser should have as pilots fishermen who know the ground. Those cutters would also act as admirable training vessels for the Navy, and would be able to render valuable service in the saving of life. If the protection were not granted, the result would be that the fishermen would be driven to provide armed cruisers themselves, and there would be open war between them and the foreign vessels. He had only attempted to give a bare outline of what was going on at the fishing-grounds. He, therefore, called upon the Government to do for English fishermen what every other country was doing for theirs. It was a duty which England alone neglected; and it was nothing short of a scandal that a Maritime Power like England should so utterly neglect an important trade that did so much for the food supply of the nation.

Mr. SAMUEL LLOYD drew the attention of the Admiralty to the case of the old navigating officers of the Fleet, who had complained for a long time of their position, but whose complaint had not received the amount of attention which it deserved. Some years ago a change was made in the Service by which no new navigating officers were appointed, and by which their duties were transferred in many cases to executive officers. The duties of those officers were extremely important. The navigating officers were responsible for the safe navigation of the very valuable ships of the Navy. They had to take them into and out of action, and steer them through intricate channels; and if any mishap occurred the navigating officer was responsible, and was severely punished. What those officers felt deeply was the position of subordination and inferiority in which they were placed in comparison with the youngest officers of the executive branch. It had been alleged that this subordinate position in which they were placed was what had always been the case. He believed that was not so. Several appointments which used to be filled up by the appointment of navigating officers had been taken away from that class. The scale of their retirement was also very much less than that of the executive branch. They complained that while the Royal Marines, the Paymasters, the Engineers, and others had been allowed opportunities of stating their grievances before the authorities, no such opportunities had been permitted to the navigating officers. For years past none of those officers had been sent for, while representatives of the other classes had. He asked the Secretary to the Admiralty to allow some of those officers to see him privately to state their grievances, and to answer any questions he might put to them. It was not to the interest of the country that any class of officers in Her Majesty's Service should be allowed at that time to remain discontented and dissatisfied.

Mr. A. F. EGERTON said, the Surveyor General of Ordnance had referred to a letter which he wrote the other day to the newspapers as to the appointment of a Committee. No one objected to the appointment or to the constitution of that Committee; but when the Surveyor General told the House that its appointment would not lead to delay, he ventured to join issue with him, and to say that the appointment of the Committee would be, without doubt, the cause of some of the delay. The Surveyor General had told the House also that the new guns were to be strengthened in various parts. But how were the guns to be strengthened without causing delay? What he wished to impress upon the House was that it was of the greatest importance that there should be no delay in arming the new turret ships, and any measure which caused delay was to be regretted. All that he asked for was that the House and the country should be placed in possession of the fullest information as to the condition of these new guns.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF supported the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) in the appeal which he made in favour of the navigating officers of the Navy. He believed they were a most deserving class of men who had been neglected by the Admiralty for a long time past. There were several other cases with regard to the different classes of officers in the Dockyards who had for a long time been memorializing the Admiralty with a view of securing some improvement in their position, but who had not yet received any reply to their application. He referred especially to the established skilled labourers in the Dockyards. [The hon. Member proceeded to read a letter from a distinguished Admiral, who pointed out the respects in which England was mainly deficient in a naval sense.] He was not at liberty to mention the Admiral's name; but would say that he was one of the most distinguished officers of the day, and spoke with the authority of all those naval officers with whom he was in constant communication. The letter said that it seemed incredible to the writer that, in the present critical state of affairs with Russia, this country was making no preparations whatever. No one knew how soon the Navy might be wanted in the Baltic, and that they ought to be in a position to bombard Russian forts if necessary, asking, at the same time, whether they had the ships, the guns, or the men necessary. The writer expressed the opinion that they would find themselves greatly deficient in torpedo vessels, of which the Russians had 94 in the Baltic. He had quoted this letter in order to show the strong opinion which prevailed among naval officers on the subject of the Navy. If they had to trust merely to such agreements as that foreshadowed by the Prime Minister to defend the country against Russia, they would have but a broken reed to rely upon.

MR. PULESTON joined in the appeal on behalf of the navigating officers of the Fleet.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, England was at that moment face to face with the gravest political danger, being threatened with war with one of the Great Powers of Europe; and, as must be admitted on all hands, England was no match, at sea, for several combinations of two Powers against her. If she lost her naval supremacy, England could, in two or three months, be brought to her knees by a combination of hostile Navies, starving her into submission. It remained for this Government, which had brought the Army to its present deplorable condition, so that a Force of 25,000 men could not be sent abroad without depleting every regiment in the country, to allow the Navy to sink into its present inferiority. He hoped that the Government would now address themselves to carrying out the defence of the coaling stations, to the building of a large fleet of torpedo-boats, and to the addition of at least six fast sea-going cruisers to the strength of the Navy.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, a number of important speeches had been made on this Motion; but he hoped that hon. Members would not consider that he was showing them any disrespect if he refrained from making a separate reply to each, as he anticipated making a very full answer in introducing the Navy Estimates. He might, however, correct the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) on a matter of fact. It was not true, as surmised, that the Admiralty made a demand on the Cabinet to the extent of £11,000,000. In November they put forward a proposal for increased shipbuilding, and the Estimates which he was about to move made ample provision for carrying out the plans submitted on that occasion. When he made the statement on the part of the Government in December, other matters besides shipbuilding were referred to. It was intended to make provision for accelerating the construction of steel guns for the Navy. This item did not fall under these Estimates; but if hon. Gentlemen turned to the Army Estimates, they would find that a large addition was made in those Estimates for strengthening the Navy in the matter of guns. The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Birkbeck) had called attention to the question of the protection of the fisheries. On behalf of the Admiralty, he (Sir Thomas Brassey) deeply regretted the depredations which were committed by foreign vessels on the East Coast fisheries; and also the failure, if there had been a failure, on the part of the commanders of gun-boats to be present at the rendezvous, which were pointed out by those representing the fisheries. He could promise that the Admiralty would consult with the Admiral Superintendent of the Reserves, and would do all that lay in their power to give protection to the fisheries. The hon. Member had spoken against the employment of steam vessels on this service; but the Admiralty had received a request from the Scottish Fishery Board to remove the sailing cutters from their waters and to substitute steam vessels. No doubt, in the case of a calm, a steam vessel would be much more effective in pursuit than a sailing vessel; but, however that might be, he could assure the House that the Admiralty would do all that lay in their power to give protection to the fisheries. The hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) had drawn attention to the case of the old navigating officers. Everyone acquainted with the Navy knew what a valuable class of men they were. The changes that had been made with a view to increasing the knowledge of navigation in the Service had, no doubt, like other changes, involved a certain amount of hardship to individuals. He would be happy, on the part of the Admiralty, to promise that they would give a due consideration to any representations which the deputation such as the hon. Member asked them to receive might make.

Mr. A. F. Egerton

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Sir Arthur Otway, in introducing the Navy Estimates my first duty is one which I am sure the Committee will allow me readily to perform. It is the duty of paying a tribute of well-merited praise to the officers, seamen, and Marines, who have been engaged in serving the country on the Nile and at Suakin. The progress of Lord Wolseley's Expedition has been most materially aided by the able surveys conducted by Captain Hammill, and by the zealous efforts of Captain Bedford and the officers and men under his command. At the engagement of Abu Klea two promising officers—Lieutenants Pigott and De Lisle—and a brave little band of seamen died defending their guns against overwhelming numbers. The rescue of Sir Charles Wilson by Lord Charles Beresford was a feat of arms equally remarkable for the skill and gallantry displayed. I particularly desire to place on record the services rendered by the naval engineer, Mr. Benbow, on that occasion. When under fire he succeeded most effectually in repairing a disabled boiler. At Suakin the prolonged defence by Commodore Molyneux and the Forbe under his command has been a most trying service. We rejoice to have given to the Marines the reward they most value. They are to occupy a post of honour, which must also be a post of danger, in the Army which is about to take the field under Sir Gerald Graham. Passing from these stirring events to the administrative business of the Navy, the Estimates it is my duty to move amount, with the appropriations, to a total for 1885-6 of £13,090,440. The corresponding amount for 1884-5, excluding the Supplementary Estimates for Egypt, was £11,645,711. Of this large increase we have £1,154,000 under the Shipbuilding Votes—a considerable advance on the £800,000 promised in December; £76,000 for pay, food, and clothing, and £173,200 under the Works Vote. Taking the Votes in detail, I propose to deal first with those which relate to the personnel. Commencing with the officers, we have to make provision for an increase of 100 on full pay. The addition is rendered necessary by the large number of ships in commission on the China Station and in the Red Sea; and it is also due, though to a slighter degree, to the appointment of an Admiral on the Australian Station. The growing importance of the duties attaching to the Australian command renders it extremely desirable that an Admiral should command the Squadron. Passing from the officers to the seamen, we have made an important alteration in the term of continuous engagements. The first period of service, under the new Regulations, has been extended from 10 to 12 years. Our experience shows that the change is not unacceptable to the boys and to their parents, and it will be a great advantage to retain men longer in the Service. In the small vessels, when first put into commission, a large proportion of experienced seamen will not be unwelcome to the officers in command, if caught in heavy weather in the chops of the Channel or in the Bay of Biscay, on first leaving England. The present Estimate provides a considerable addition to the number of boys. The experience of recent years has shown that the number for which provision has been taken is insufficient. At the present time, the service boys are 650 in excess of the number voted. We expect that the present strength will be fully maintained in 1885-6, and provision has been made in the Estimates accordingly. The total number of service boys in the present Estimates is increased from 2,500 to 3,100; and we propose to take 300 more boys for training. Although steam has been so largely substituted for canvas in the Navy—a change which, I have no doubt, is rather painful to old sailors like my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir John Hay), and, indeed, to all ardent lovers of sailing—it will be found that the demand for seamen in the Navy has not diminished. We have more ships in commission, more men in the gunnery ships; and at the present time we have no less than 1,000 under instruction in the torpedo, electrical work, and submarine mining. These are some of the reasons which we have to urge for the great increase in the number of boys. In addition to these proposals, provided for under the normal Estimates, we shall ask Parliament to vote 500 officers and men and 500 Marines for service in Egypt. Their pay, as I have already explained in answer to a Question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), will be included in another Estimate for the Egyptian Expedition. In connection with the manning of the Navy, I may state that steps are about to be taken to give more general instruction in gunnery. In former days, when the complements of ships consisted mostly of seamen, all of whom were trained at the guns, the non-combatants were comparatively few. At the present time, in our modern mastless ships the non-combatants are about 30 per cent of the complement. This large proportion of undrilled men is a source of weakness, and we propose to remedy it by the Regulations about to be issued. Although, Sir Arthur Otway, the charge will fall upon the Vote for Medical Services, it may be convenient, at this stage of my statement, that I should refer to the recent improvements which have taken place in the sick berth staff of the Naval Hospitals. The Navy will be gratified to learn that Her Majesty takes a deep personal interest in this subject; and on behalf of the Admiralty I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing our acknowledgments to Sir John Reid, the Medical Director General, for the pains he has taken in re-organizing the Service. The details of the new arrangements were described to the Committee last year by my Predecessor. The general supervision of the nursing is entrusted to the Sisters, who have had experience either in the Civil or Military Hospitals. In future, all the attendants on the sick will have received a systematic training. The changes, of course, have involved some additional expense; but the country will not grudge it. The modest salaries we give them are, indeed, a very imperfect acknowledgment of the gratitude we owe to these devoted Sisters, who by day and by night are giving their care to the sick and wounded seamen and Marines. And now I turn to a question which will greatly interest hon. Members representing the Dockyards. I need scarcely say that I refer to questions of pay and allowance. Hon. Members will see that without an increase in the number of men there is an increase of charge under these Estimates amounting to £33,000 for allowances to men trained as gunners and torpedo men, and for the larger proportion of petty officers and the increased number of artificers serving afloat. The establishment of the rating of chief stokers is the most recent boon conceded by the Admiralty. We have been glad to give a deserving class of men the advancement and promotion to the rating of a chief petty officer. There are several questions pending with reference to pay and allowances to engineers and paymasters. They have earnestly pressed for the abolition of what is known as the 11 years' rule. Their appeal has been referred to a Departmental Committee. The Admiralty are sensible that the calculations of promotion have turned out less favourably than was expected, and have not been altogether verified by the result. We agree in the main with the views of the Committee, that one-half of their junior time should be allowed to count for increase of pay and pension until the completion of 11 years' senior service, and then all, as at present. The necessary communications are now taking place with the Treasury; and we hope, in the course of the ensuing year, to make an arrangement which will be satisfactory to the engineers and paymasters. In the numerous and pessimist discussions with reference to our naval position which have recently filled the usual organs of public information our resources for manning the Navy have been called in question. I wish, therefore, to take this opportunity of stating that while in time of peace we sometimes feel the pressure of the new requirements for the training of the Navy which absorb a considerable number of our men, and we are in consequence occasionally short of men available for draft, we have a large reserve to meet a real emergency. We have, in ships serving on foreign stations, a considerably larger proportion of supernumeraries than was formerly the case; and at the home ports, in gunnery ships, in flagships, and harbour ships of all classes, and in the Steam Reserve and elsewhere, we have a Force which may be roughly estimated at not less than 13,000 men. Behind them we have the Marines, 6,200; the Coast-guard, 4,000; the Pensioner Reserve, regularly drilled, 1,950; the Naval Reserve, 19,000; and the Naval Artillery Volunteers, 1,600. The total personnel of the Navy, including Pensioners under 50 and the Naval Volunteers, constitutes a Force of 86,000 men.

Sir Thomas Brassey

MR. W. H. SMITH: In that total are the officers included?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Yes; the total number of men of all classes, on the active list, is 87,000, and the complements of all ships which can be made ready and sent to sea in 12 months are 68,000. If we were engaged in a war of magnitude we should, no doubt, require to strengthen the Navy more particularly in the lieutenants and engineers and in the engine-room complements. But in the Mercantile Marine we have a practically inexhaustible reserve of skilled navigators, competent naval men, experienced engineers, artificers, and firemen. The Naval Reserve, more especially the Second Class Reserve, could be recruited to any strength required from the fisheries, the source from which the best sea-faring element in the French Inscription Maritime is derived. And now I turn to the Shipbuilding Votes. I have already given the total increase in these Votes. The Estimates supply the details, and I therefore proceed at once to explain the steps taken to accelerate the construction of ships in fulfilment of the undertaking which was given to Parliament in December. I will deal first with the work in the Dockyards. Under the present Board of Admiralty, large additions have, from time to time, been made to the number of men employed in the Dockyards; and it has been thought advisable by the Admiralty, and also, I believe, by the House of Commons, not to increase very largely the number of men employed in shipbuilding in the Dockyards; but it was the general sense of the House that we should rely upon the contract supplies for any large extension of building. In these circumstances, having to undertake additional shipbuilding work without increasing the number of men, we determined to concentrate our efforts on ships in an advanced state of progress, and a sum of £40,000 has been granted to be spent within the present financial year for the purpose of pushing forward iron-clads by profitable overtime, in accordance with the scheme which was recommended by the officers of the Yards. By these means, in spite of the unforeseen causes of delay with which we are only too familiar, we have been able to make considerable progress with all of these vessels. The Colossus is now practically complete, and the Collingwood, Edinburgh, Warrior, and Imperieuse will be completed in the ensuing financial year. It was intended to complete the Imperieuse at the same date as the Colossus; but there has been an unforeseen cause of delay owing to the foundering of a steamer carrying important parts of her machinery from the Thames to Portsmouth. The additions which will be made to the strength of the Navy in the two ensuing years are as follows:— In 1885-6 we shall complete the four iron-clads I have already mentioned, and in addition three protected ships of the Leander class, the Calliope, two fast despatch vessels, and two gun-vessels. In 1886-7 it will be possible to complete the iron-clads Howe, Rodney, and Hero, and probably the Bombow; the two protected vessels, the Mersey and Severn, nine Scouts, the Landrail, and six gun-boats; in all 22 vessels. I wish that it were possible to promise further acceleration of the work of shipbuilding. Delays in completion have given occasion for the severest criticism to which the Admiralty has been subjected. Every Board has regretted the delay, and every Board has been unable to bring ships to completion as rapidly as they desire. I am sure that my hon. Friends who have had experience at the Admiralty will concur with me when I say that we see the ships advancing most satisfactorily up to the launching stage. The delays occur later, and they are attributable mainly to the transition state of the armaments of the Navy. When the prospect of war is not imminent, no Administration of a first-class Power would be justified in refusing to entertain the proposals which are put forward by our able staff of gunnery officers. A great Service like ours demands perfection, and is sensitively jealous of the slightest superiority elsewhere, even in the smallest detail. In the future we cannot hope to be wholly free from the difficulties due to change and improvement; but we believe that we have now settled within certain limits all the problems of gunnery which have in recent years prevented the rapid completion of our ships. And now, Sir Arthur Otway, I turn from the subject of the completion of ships to the laying down programme. The delays in completion, to which I have referred, have necessarily affected the laying down. The Committee will observe that only a small amount of progress—in point of fact, a mere commencement—is contemplated in the two armoured ships which are to be laid down in the Dockyards. We have decided, as I have just stated, that for the present it is better to concentrate our efforts on ships near completion. At the same time, I would remind the Committee that, by placing the two iron-clads in the programme,

Sir Thomas Brassey

we insure that the preliminary works will be taken in hand. The actual building can be vigorously pushed forward as soon as labour becomes available from the completion of the other ships. The laying down programme for the Dockyards includes, in addition to the iron-clads, a torpedo ram, to be commenced very shortly at Chatham, and one vessel of the Scout type to be laid down at Devonport. And now, Sir, having stated what has been and will be done in the Dockyards, I have to explain the steps which have been taken to put out to contract the ships approved in December. The sanction of the House to the new programme of construction was obtained on the 2nd of December. The designs for the Scouts were completed on the 31st of December. Those for the belted cruisers were ready on the 27th, and for two iron-clads on the 29th of February. Tenders were invited for the six Scouts on the 5th of January. They were received on the 24th of February, accepted on the 27th, and the keels of four of those vessels have already been laid down. In the case of the Scout class, the Constructors of the Admiralty were extremely anxious to give the firms tendering an opportunity of proposing simplifications with a view to reductions in the cost, or suggesting improvements which were likely to increase the efficiency of the ships. For this reason a longer time than usual was given for the submission of tenders for the Scout class. Another reason I may name to the Committee for the extension of time is this. We have largely added to the number of firms invited to tender for the Admiralty work. No less than 34 firms sent in tenders for the vessels of the Scout class. In the case of the belted cruisers and the iron-clads, the private trade has had less experience in ships of that class, and for that reason the Constructors of the Admiralty did not attach so much importance to any suggestion that might be made, and therefore less time was allowed to the contractors for sending in tenders for the larger vessels. But while less time was originally proposed by the Admiralty, in deference to the expressed wish of the contracting firms, the time for sending in tenders has been extended to the 17th of April. I am very sensible that the public has been impatient at the apparent delay in these preliminary steps, and many hard things have been said of the Admiralty. But I can assure the Committee that we have not been half-hearted or reluctant to obey the will of the country that the Navy shall be strengthened. Those who condemn the Admiralty so readily make no allowance for the inevitable complications which must be found in designs for ships of war, as compared with vessels of the Mercantile Marine. In former instances, as it was clearly shown in the evidence before the Earl of Ravensworth's Committee, loss of time and money has been caused by calling for tenders prematurely. The Earl of Ravensworth's Committee recommended that designs should be more carefully worked out before tenders were called for; and we determined to follow the judicious recommendation of the Committee. I can assure the Committee that time has not been lost by the extra care bestowed on the plans for the new ships. On the contrary, I am assured it will, in the end, secure an earlier completion and prevent much wasteful expenditure on alterations. The Committee should remember that these designs and specifications control and guide an expenditure of no less than £3,500,000; and that, although the designs were sketched out before a statement could be made to Parliament, the magnitude of the work of settling details may be inferred from the sum which is to be expended. I am assured by the technical advisers of the Admiralty that they are engaged—incessantly and constantly engaged—in the revision of designs. No sooner is a design made perfect than some invention is brought out which necessitates a reconsideration of details, and it is that revision which accounts for the long time required to prepare the designs of which I have spoken. Having explained the cause of the delay in putting out to contract the additional work, I would point out to the Committee that the expenditure proposed on the new vessels is slightly in excess of the amount approved by the House in December last. The amount has been increased from £800,000 to £812,000. We have also made some modifications in the list of ships to be put out to contract. The new contract work includes two iron-clads instead of the one iron-clad proposed by my noble Friend in "another place." My right

hon. Friend 'Mr. W. H. Smith' has alluded in the course of his remarks to a discrepancy which I frankly confess exists. Our scheme includes five instead of three belted cruisers, six instead of 10 Scouts, and 10 torpedo boats. Five torpedo boats are to be ordered later under the arrangement which I have already explained to the House in answer to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley). The two iron-clads which are to be built by contract will be of the single-turret type already described to Parliament in December. With regard to the rate of progress in the building under contract, it is quite unnecessary to remind the Committee that when our proposals for additional building were brought forward in December a strong objection was made that the scheme of construction was to extend over a period of five years. But on this point it is an obvious remark that it is not for us to determine beforehand the Estimates of future years; all we can determine is the extent of the addition to the Estimates in 1885-6, which are alone under our control. We propose to add to those Estimates the sum of £812,000 for the purpose of carrying forward the construction of these new ships. We believe that this provision will be sufficient to make good progress with all the ships for which orders are being given; but if experience should show that we have under-estimated the rate of progress, we shall not retard the operations of the builders in deference to financial considerations. Sir, I have endeavoured to explain in sufficient detail our programme of building in the Dockyards and by contract, and it therefore only remains for me to bring the figures together. Our whole scheme of ships to be laid down is as follows:—Four iron-clads of the first class, five belted cruisers, one torpedo ram, seven Scouts, five gun-vessels, and 15 torpedo boats, of which 10 are to be ordered at once. Having given a list of the ships laid down, let me compare the tonnage proposed now with that in former years.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Does that include the iron-clads which we were told had scarcely been begun?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: It includes both. I said the ships laid down. Our programme of shipbuilding in the Dockyards gives for armoured tonnage practically the same tonnage as for the present financial year. In the class of protected tonnage we have an increase of 600 tons; in the contract programme the total building is increased from 4,624 to 11,338 tons. The Dockyard and contract programmes combined give a total of 14,423 tons for armoured vessels, 6,087 tons for protected, and 7,542 tons for unarmoured vessels, or a total of 28,052 tons. If we make a comparison of this tonnage as proposed for 1885-6 with the tonnage of former years we arrive at this result. The armoured tonnage is increased from an average of 8,051 tons per annum in 1877-81 and 11,948 in 1881-5 to 14,423 tons. Our protected tonnage is 6,087 tons, or, together, 20,500 tons for 1885-6. In unarmoured vessels the average construction for the last six years has been somewhat less than the programme for 1885-6. Having given the total tonnage to be built, I would invite the special attention of the Committee to the large amount of building proposed in the new class of protected vessels. The protected class is represented in our Dockyard programme chiefly by vessels of the Mersey type. In the case of the Mersey, the protection is by means of an armoured deck with numerous water-tight compartments. The protected tonnage comprises, in addition to the 1,248 tons we propose to build of the Mersey class, 2,820 tons of belted cruisers. These ships were fully described to Parliament in December. They are of a much more powerful type than the Merseys. They are armoured with a 10-inch belt, and are therefore much more protected on the water-line than any foreign iron-clads of the second class. In point of speed they have a marked superiority over any armoured ships afloat or building. We announced in December a speed of 17 knots. By our latest estimate the speed will be increased to 17½ knots. So far as we know, the only vessels of superior speed now building for any Navy are three now building for Italy and two for the Government of Japan. I would point out that those vessels are without armour protection; and it is certain that, owing to their smaller displacement, they could not hold their own in the long run at sea against the belted cruisers. It has been said that we ought to give preference to the type represented by the Esmeralda, which has an advantage in point of speed over the belted cruisers. But this, I can assure the Committee, is not the view accepted by the Board of Admiralty. Our Naval Colleagues are of opinion that the armoured belt of our new cruisers gives them a decided superiority over any of the cruisers they are likely to meet. In addition to their armament of guns they will be fitted with effective means for the discharge of torpedoes. Now, I turn to a question upon which much opinion has been expressed in a sense adverse to the course we feel called upon by our duty to take. I refer to the limited number of torpedo boats in our programme. The rate of construction proposed in December has been criticized as insufficient. Well, Sir, I venture to express the opinion that the criticism to which I refer has been occasioned by an imperfect appreciation of the great additions which we are really making to the Fleet, and in a form more necessary than what is technically known as the torpedo boat. The Board of Admiralty do not regard torpedo boats capable of being used only for coast defence as the type most required for the British Navy. We are more anxious to push forward the construction of vessels of a powerful type, capable of keeping the seas for an extended period in all weathers. Our programme of construction in that class of vessels which we think most effective includes, in addition to the torpedo ram already mentioned, two despatch vessels—the Surprise and the Alacrity—specially designed for service as torpedo cruisers, the nine Scouts, and the two steel-gun and torpedo vessels under construction at Devonport. We have 14 vessels of a total displacement of 21,500 tons; and if we compare this programme with the programme of construction for the French Navy, we find that the torpedo flotilla in progress in France includes four vessels of the Condor type, 1,260 tons, and eight of the Bombe type, 321 tons. The total tonnage of these vessels being 7,602 tons, as against 21,500 which I mentioned as being under construction for the British Navy. Turning from torpedo vessels to torpedo boats, we have actually under construction four of the first class and two of the second class. The number of torpedo boats of the first class now building in France is 10, in Italy six, and in Austria four (our expenditure on the torpedo flotilla during the ensuing financial year will not be less than £400,000, as against £231,000 taken in the French Estimates for similar vessels. Having explained our policy in regard to the larger vessels, I may point out, in connection with the subject, that for the defence of our ports a formidable flotilla could be extemporized out of our steam pinnaces and launches. We had an example of what could be accomplished in this respect in the interesting operations for the defence and attack on Portsmouth carried out some years ago under the direction of Captain Gordon and the officers of the Vernon. Those who were present, and who saw the steam pinnaces, specially fitted for the purpose, driven at full speed over the booms, would probably be of opinion that for such rough usage as would be experienced in war the pinnaces were better adapted than the swift but fragile torpedo boats. It will be, perhaps, satisfactory to the Committee to be informed that we have 180 steam launches and pinnaces fitted with Whitehead torpedoes, and 170 steam cutters fitted with spar torpedoes. If these boats be reckoned efficient for the defence of our harbours by torpedoes, I think it will be the opinion of the Committee that we are somewhat better provided in this respect than is generally supposed.

Sir Thomas Brassey

MR. W. H. SMITH: Are they not abroad?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: No inconsiderable number of them are abroad; but we have a very large number available at home. Now, I desire to make a few observations on our repairing programme. Hon. Members may have observed that the wages of men employed on repairing have been reduced in these Estimates by nearly £10,000. That is the very satisfactory result of the improved management of boilers, the greater durability of iron and composite construction, and of the arrangements which we have been able to make for the extended absence of vessels from home. We have been able to keep vessels longer abroad, because our ship yards abroad have become more and more capable of efficiently repairing our ships. I am able to say that in this way two iron-clads have been ordered for repair abroad, and we are confident that the work will be done in every respect satisfactorily. We send out vessels from England to those stations where the Dockyards are not well adapted for large repairs; but in future, when these vessels have performed a certain period of service, they can be transferred from the Cape to Bermuda, and those on the Pacific to Hong Kong. A great economy has resulted. Turning to the repairing programme, which includes the completion of the Black Prince, I may say that we have taken this ship in hand because the boilers are in good preservation. Ships of the older type are well adapted, in the opinion of the Board of Admiralty, for the training of officers and men, which must be kept in view in connection with ships of the Channel Squadron. The alteration of the Minotaur and sister ship has been considered by the Board during the past year. It has been proposed to give them twin screws, compound engines, and to fit them as torpedo boat carriers at a cost of £250,000. The expense of any attempt to bring these vessels up to the ideas of the day is so formidable, that we have decided that no alterations in these ships should be made. Belted cruisers will do all the work which the Minotaur is capable of doing, and they will do it better. Passing from the iron-clads to the unarmoured vessels, the three large frigates have at length been taken in hand. We have completed the Raleigh. In the ensuing year we shall complete the Inconstant, and make good progress with the Shah. The Committee will be glad to know that the following iron-clads are now ready for sea. The list includes the Invincible, Ajax, Thunderer, Holspur, Rupert, Orion, and Iron Duke. The Conqueror is practically complete; and with regard to the Indefatigable, as no repairs of importance are required, she could be made ready for sea in about three months. The Monarch and Swiftsure will shortly arrive in England, and then they will be at once taken in hand. Of the unarmoured vessels we have an ample number of reliefs. Passing on to the Gun Estimates, I have already stated to Parliament, in answer to a Question by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster Mr. W. H. Smith with regard to the heavy guns, that the War Office has undertaken to complete them sufficiently early to prevent any delay of the ships. Of the guns of lesser calibre provision is made for 101 6-inch and 43 5-inch guns, and we are expecting to receive 150 quick-firing guns at the end of the present financial year. We also provide 100 more in 1885-6; and of machine guns of various calibres we take money for 300 during the ensuing year. I would call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the minor armament is becoming more and more an important feature in our Ordnance Estimates. Of a total amount of £418,000 taken for guns in 1885-6, no less than £285,000 is for 6-inch guns and lighter ordnance. The amount taken for naval ammunition, &c. in the Army Estimates for 1885-6 is £297,860, being an increase of £115,476 over the amount for 1884-5. The total provision for ordnance for the Navy under Army and Navy Estimates combined will be somewhat in excess of £1,000,000. Descriptions of new types to be laid down usually form a prominent and interesting feature of the statements made in moving the Navy Estimates. In December last the statement which I was then called upon to make necessarily anticipated much which I might be called upon to say on the present occasion. I desire, however, to take this opportunity of correcting an erroneous impression which may have gained circulation from recent publications in the newspapers. The Admiralty have been charged with deliberately sacrificing the naval power of the country to mean and paltry considerations, and that assertion has been supported with a list of the 12 largest ships which have been lately launched in England and France. Sir, I should be sorry to present myself before the Committee as an advocate of a policy of shipbuilding in which competition in dimensions was to be the primary test of merit; but, in justice to the Admiralty, I wish to put forward the result of the comparison of all the ships which are now building, or which are now included in the programme of the two countries. The average tonnage of our 14 ships is 9,530, as against the average of 8,528 tons for the 15 iron-clads in the French programme. We have never insisted on any arbitrary limitation of size. I cannot pass from the subject of shipbuilding without saying that I am not unconscious that the

Admiral class has been challenged by the hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir Edward J. Reed); but as his Motion must ultimately give rise to exhaustive discussion, I feel it my duty to postpone the observations which I might make on behalf of the Admiralty rather than engage at the present time in an imperfect and desultory discussion. In the meantime I am authorized to say that the Admiralty unanimously approve the design of our ships. The trials of the Collingwood are, perhaps, the most remarkable incidents of the past year in connection with shipbuilding. At the measured mile the speed realized in the Collingwood reached 16·8 knots, a very high figure; and at the load draught a speed of 16½ knots is confidently expected. Difficulties have been experienced in perfecting the breech mechanism for the 43-ton guns; but on the occasion of a recent trial the gear was found to work in an entirely satisfactory manner. I am desired by the Constructors of the Admiralty to express their great obligations to Mr. Rendel for his advice, which has so materially tended to this satisfactory result. On the Vote for New Works—Vote 11—we have an increase, as compared with last year, amounting to £173,000. It has been our policy to concentrate our expenditure on the building of ships; but we have now to deal with demands which cannot be postponed. We have to provide torpedo boats, ships, and every other description of vessels of this kind, and we have to provide the means to test the efficacy of those vessels as well as of gun mountings. At Malta we shall make good progress with the new graving dock commenced last year; and we are also making provision for increased dock accommodation in other parts of the world. We take £15,000 for a grant to a private Company at Hong Kong who are completing a dock of sufficient dimensions to receive ships of the largest class; and we are also pressing upon the Indian Government the necessity of providing a dock at Bombay capable of admitting iron-clads of the Admiral class. At the Cape we have availed ourselves of a recent opportunity to purchase a repairing slip and some land adjacent to our present yard. In conclusion, we may ask ourselves this question—Are the Estimates we are now proposing to Parliament sufficient? It is impossible for those who are responsible for the administration of the Navy to say that any Estimates fully provide for all the wants of our great Sea Service. There must be many things less perfect than we could wish. But if we test these Estimates by another standard, and compare the amounts at our disposal with the sums voted in other countries, the provision we are making should be ample. The present Estimates provide for an expenditure on building, as distinguished from repairs, amounting in round figures to £3,000,000 sterling, or double that proposed, according to our best information, for the Navy of any other Power. The cost of building being certainly not greater, on the whole, here than elsewhere, the additions to the Navy may be taken as proportionate to the expenditure. Such, then, are the facts with reference to the matériel and personnel of the Navy. I say that we are making adequate provision for the development of our Navy; and our Navy is, after all, only the point of the spear. Our resources for construction and manufacture give us a greater power than we could possibly derive from an unlimited reserve of ships and weapons, which the process of invention tends to render obsolete. Every war demands some special type of ship, and our resources for building external to the Dockyards are unrivalled. In the Crimean War, when our industrial resources were far less than at present, three floating batteries of 3,000 tons, and protected by 4-inch armour, were completed in the short space of three months. In less than five months more than 200 gun-boats and 100 mortar-boats were completed for sea. In less than three months from the date of signing the contract, the establishment of Mr. John Penn produced and fitted on board the gunboats 80 engines of 64-horse power. It was thus that we were enabled, as Viscount Palmerston reminded the House of Commons, to raise the strength of the Navy from 212 ships in commission in February, 1854, to 590 ships in commission in March, 1856. The Mercantile Marine, if it is a vulnerable point, is also a valuable resource. The merchant steamers could not meet on equal terms regularly-built vessels of war; but they could defend themselves against ships of their own class, and could accompany our squadrons as look-out ships, despatch vessels, and store ships. Of the 7,000,000 tons of British steam shipping afloat, more than 1,000,000 is classed on the Admiralty list, and more than half of this 1,000,000 tons is specially capable of performing service as cruisers owing to their high speeds. I would not lightly use language which would lull the country into a false security; but I venture to express the hope that when due regard is paid to our vast resources, to the condition of the Fleet on any fair comparison with other Powers, and to the large reinforcements of the Navy we are now proposing, these Estimates may be accepted as sufficient. We are making a great step in advance in response to a strong popular demand. It will be for the Parliament of the future to provide for these continuous efforts, by which alone a great Navy can be maintained.

Sir Thomas Brassey

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That 52,000 men and boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, including 12,900 Royal Marines."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am somewhat at a disadvantage in rising at seven minutes past 12 to comment on a statement of an hour and a-half, but which was by no means too long considering the importance of the subject. My hon. Friend (Sir Thomas Brassey) certainly did not say more than was necessary, or more than was expected by the Committee. He alluded to the service of the seamen and officers of the Fleet during the past year. No words which can be used in Parliament can adequately express the gratitude due by the country to those men who have done such admirable work on the Nile, and in other dangerous enterprises in which they have been engaged. The Secretary to the Admiralty referred to the good service Captain Hammill had done in surveying the Nile, and the good service Captain Bedford had done in superintending the transport arrangements. I venture to say that if it had not been for the work done by those officers and the blue-jackets, the Nile Expedition would have been practically impossible. It is to their work that Lord Wolseley owes his successful arrival at Korti, and the supply of provisions necessary for the enterprise.

Reference has also been made to the loss of men. There has been a heavy loss. The men have died most gallantly in the service of their country, and have shown that they can fight on shore as well as navigate ships on sea, and in most narrow and difficult waters. I am sure, therefore, that the thanks of the country will be given to them most heartily whenever Her Majesty's Government ask for a Vote of Thanks from Parliament. The hon. Gentleman referred to the increase in the Estimates. I will postpone any remarks I have to make as to the increase in the Ship-building Vote until I have run through the least important, but still important, question to which he referred. He spoke of an increase in the number of officers. I cannot help feeling, Sir, that there must be a considerable increase in the number of officers employed, especially in the number of torpedo and gunnery officers. That is a question which will require the very serious consideration of the Admiralty. There is no doubt that there is a far greater demand now than there was in the past for skill and scientific treatment in the management of the new and most powerful instruments of warfare. That demand will have to be supplied in some way by the Admiralty. Well, reference has also been made by my hon. Friend (Sir Thomas Brassey) to the importance of the Australian command, involving the employment of a Flag Officer. I entirely agree with him; but that is only another illustration of the growing demands which are made on the Navy in all parts of the world; demands for protection, demands for supervision, demands for adequate representation of the interests and duties of the country wherever Colonial enterprise is found. I entirely concur in the course which has been pursued with regard to the extension of the first term of service. I think that it is an advantage to the men themselves, and certainly it is a great advantage to the nation, because the experience which is gained by the men no doubt adds greatly to the discipline and steadiness of the crews of the ships, whether they were going down Channel, or crossing the Bay of Biscay, or sailing on the West Coast of Africa, or in any other part of the world. Remark was made by my hon. Friend as to the number of men borne. I was looking this morning at the Estimates with respect to this point; and I find that, notwithstanding the demands which are now made and recognized by the Admiralty, notwithstanding the fact that we are to have 1,000 men in Egypt—500 Marines and 500 blue-jackets—the Navy, all told, will be only 59,000, as against 58,800 in 1881. Well, Sir, I am by no means saying that 1881 was a standard to which we could go back; but if the number was not excessive in that year, it certainly suggests to the consideration of Parliament, and of the country, whether 200 men more are sufficient to counterbalance the drain which a serious war, such as that in the Soudan, involves, and which the circumstances and conditions which we have now to face—much more serious circumstances and conditions than those of 1881—are causing. I should like to know, as the question of manning has been mentioned, and as the question of an adequate reserve has been brought under the notice of the Committee, how many ships and what ships are ready, whether the complements are made up, and in how many days could those ships be fully manned? I have made inquiries myself, and I have been given to understand that it would not be possible to man the ships which are in the first reserve at Portsmouth under three weeks from the present time, because there is a deficiency of stokers and artificers, and you have not got a system ready for immediate application. It is this unreadiness in the present condition of the Navy which we have to complain of. Well, Sir, we are told that there is a very large reserve to meet emergencies. I believe there is a large reserve; but I should like to know whether the Admiralty have any system whatever by which that reserve could be made available in case of a sudden outbreak of war; whether they have any view in their own mind of what they would do in the event of war—how they would find ships to do the work which is required of them; how they would find ships to protect the trade and commerce of the country, and those especially which are engaged in bringing food into the country? We have not been informed by my hon. Friend on that point. My hon. Friend laid great stress upon the building programme for the coming year. I con-

Mr. W. H. Smith

fee I was a little surprised to find that he made no reference whatever to the building which has been accomplished during the past year. It is a usual thing for the Secretary to the Admiralty, or the First Lord of the Admiralty, as the case may be, in making the Annual Statement with regard to the Estimates, to show what they have done in the past year; but to-night the hon. Gentleman made no reference to what has been done in the last 12 months. With regard to the building programme, however, the hon. Gentleman said that in fulfilment of the undertaking made in December the Admiralty had concentrated its efforts in advancing ships, and that £40,000 had been expended, or had been given to the Dockyards this year to be expended, on profitable overtime, so as to make considerable progress with the ships; and considerable progress had consequently been made. Well, Sir, I have taken pains to ascertain from the Estimates what progress was made during the past year, both in the Dockyards and in the contract work. I think it is well to do that, in order that we may judge by the work which has been done whether there is any hope whatever that the promises held out to us as to the future will be realized. I take the Dockyard Estimates for 1884-5, and if my hon. Friend will turn to page 204 he will be able to follow me. The hon. Gentleman will see that in order to realize the promise to build in 1884-5 10,500 tons, it was proposed to advance the Asson to 2,207 tons, the Camperdown, to 2,485; the Collingwood, to 4,978; the Celestus, to 6,150; the Edinburgh, to 4,509; the Herc, to 3,380; the Impérieuse, to 4,900; the Rodney, to 3,935; the Warspite, to 4,414; the Herc, to 1,033; the new vessel, to 387; a total of 35,378 tons. Now, if the hon. Gentleman turns to page 210 of the Estimates for this year, he will find that it is shown that the Asson has been advanced to 2,171 tons; the Camperdown, to 2,486; the Collingwood, to 4,867; the Celestus, to 6,150 being assumed to be complete, although, I believe, she is not complete; the Edinburgh, to 4,685; the Herc, to 3,581; the Impérieuse, to 3,925; the Rodney, to 3,909; the Warspite, to 3,842; the Herc, 1,032; the new vessel, nothing—that is to say, that between the two sets of figures there is a total difference of 1,740 tons. Instead of 10,500 tons being built, as promised, only 8,760 tons were built. But on page 197 of these Estimates it is claimed that instead of 10,500 tons having been built, 10,745 tons have been built. In point of fact, those figures are absolutely fallacious. Of course, the promise to build certain tonnage has never been fulfilled by any Government, certainly not by the present one; there has always been a very considerable deficiency. Now, Sir, I will read an extraordinary note which appears on page 197 of the Estimates—

“It must be understood that the tonnage corresponding to the expenditure of a certain sum of money for labour will not necessarily have any reference to the weight of materials worked into the hull when that sum is expended.”

In other words, it is here argued that a ton is not a ton. But there is another note here which is equally curious—

“This amount includes the pay of leading men of shipwrights up to 1st July. These officers were at that date made Inspectors, and have since been paid out of the Salary Vote. By this alteration there is an apparent loss of about 323 tons for 1884-5; and 436 tons for 1885-6.”

That note means this—that if you double the pay of a man, you get double the work out of him. But that is not so. If you increase a man's pay so that he shall wear a top hat instead of a cap, and you can call him an Inspector, you have no right to assume that you get more tons out of him. If you spend money in building a ship, to a certain extent, and in taking it to pieces again, the tons built, and those taken to pieces, are called additions to the Fleet. That is an extraordinary statement. I have protested against its being made in the past, and I protest against its being made now, because it invalidates the statement which the Secretary to the Admiralty makes. The hon. Gentleman has told us that a certain work will be done. That work will not be done; the ships will not be built in the proportion and to the extent which he desires, and to the extent which he endeavours to lead the Committee to suppose. I make no charge against my hon. Friend; but there is this very curious fact to be noticed—that notwithstanding the inaccuracy and fallaciousness of this Estimate as to the number of tons built, the cost of building has increased enormously during the last three years. In the Estimate of 1883-4 it was estimated that 11,490 tons were built, and that they cost at the rate of £33 6s. 9d. per ton—that is to say, the assumption of the Department was that every £33 6s. 9d. paid in wages and so forth meant a ton of a ship. In 1884-5 the Estimate was increased, and £34 8s. 9d. spent in wages was assumed to be equivalent to a ton, and now we find that the equivalent in wages of a ton is £35 5s. 9d. I do not know why a ship should cost more in wages than it did three years ago. I do not see why the increase should be so rapid as it appears to be, though I should not quarrel with the fact if we got the ships in return. There seems to be a kind of paralysis, or an extraordinary condition of things, which prevents us getting the ships when we spend the money. If we take the case of protected ships—shown on page 204 of the Estimates for last year—it will be found that the Mersey was to be advanced to 1,339 tons; the Severn, to 955; the Thames, to 662; the new Mersey, 314; another new Mersey, 61; Calypso, to 1,470; Caliope, to 1,397; the Pylades, to 772; the Amphion, to 1,443; the Arethusa, 93; the Leander, 164; the Phaton, 92; the Mariner, to 520; the Racer, to 520; the Icarus, to 209; the Melita, 87; the Swallow, 50; and the Acorn, 80. I went through the corresponding figures also, as they are shown on page 210 of this year's Estimates, and I will give them to my hon. Friend if it is necessary. I find they show a deficiency of 1,297 tons, 10,513 tons were promised, and only 9,216 were built. In other words, of protected ships, only four-fifths of the tons promised were built. The Contract Vote shows the same thing. The Bombay was advanced to 3,451, slightly more than was promised; but the other contract ships show a deficiency of 511 tons. Taking the whole together, the programme shows that we had 20,679 tons promised, and that only 17,111 were built, a gross deficiency of 3,568 tons. I will illustrate how this is done by the case of the Arethusa, Leander, and Phaton. It was shown in the Estimates of 1883-4, page 204, that each of these vessels required 251 tons to be built in them to complete making 753 tons in all. Of these tons the Estimates of 1883-4 provided for—Arethusa, 251; Leander, 55; Phaton, 92; a total of 398.

Mr. W. H. Smith

The Estimates of 1884-5 provide for—Arethusa, 93; Leander, 164; Phaton, 92; total, 349. Now, the Estimates of 1885-6 provide for the Arethusa, 214; and for the Phaton, 275; a total of 489. In the three years, therefore, it is provided that 1,236 tons shall be built into ships, in which only 753 tons were required. The ships have not grown bigger, and only one of them, the Leander, is now in course of completion. These facts require grave consideration, for they strike a blow at the confidence which the Committee ought to place in the Estimates of a great public Department like that of the Admiralty. I wish to lay down no rigid rule. I know that one ship may have to be advanced at the cost of another, and there may be frequent displacements; but when a great effort has been made, and £48,000 more wages have been granted in order to enable the Department to complete their work, and great results are said to have been obtained, and when, nevertheless, we find that that shows a deficiency of about one-sixth on the whole building programme of the year, I say enough is shown to give cause for very serious alarm to Parliament. There is one other point in connection with the speech of the hon. Gentleman to which I wish to refer; he spoke of the desire of the Admiralty to fulfil the undertaking they entered into with Parliament last December. Well, I will remind him of what that undertaking was. It was to contract for two iron-clads, five belted cruisers, two torpedo rams, 10 Scouts, 30 torpedo boats of the first-class, 10 more to be built every year, and two iron-clads in the Dockyards. He said—

“We shall proceed at the utmost speed, consistent with due economy, in the Dockyards; and with regard to contractors, no obstruction will be imposed upon their exertions.—(3 Hansard, [294] 468.)

Then the hon. Member went on to say he proposed to raise the construction of armour-clads in the Dockyards to 12,000 tons—that is to say, 12,000 of the tons of which I have been speaking in regard to wages, and to build of unarmoured ships in the Dockyards 5,500 tons, making in all 17,500 tons. He proposed to raise the construction of armour-clad ships by contract 3,050 tons, and of unarmoured 8,940 tons, making 11,990, and adding 350 tons of torpedo boats—the construction of which he said is a very costly mode of expending money—a total of 12,310 or 12,340 tons. Thus we have a grand total of construction of 29,810 tons for 1885-6 as compared with 20,679 tons for the present financial year, being an increase of 9,131 tons. Already the undertaking of December last has been reduced by 1,760 tons. The hon. Member asks Parliament to believe that they have fulfilled their undertaking. Well, I would much rather that they had come down and said—"We repent of our engagement and our undertaking, and we think we offered to do too much. We believe that a cold fit has come on Parliament and the country, and that we can well retire from the undertaking we made." But instead of that the hon. Gentleman came forward and said—"We have fulfilled the undertaking by proposing in Parliament to do some 7½ per cent less than we stated in the House of Lords on the 2nd of December we would do." Without wishing to say a single word that would be personally offensive to the hon. Gentleman, I must say that I do not think that is keeping faith with Parliament or the country in the way we had the right to expect that the First Lord of the Admiralty would keep faith with us. I am afraid I am occupying a great deal of the time of the Committee, but it is not my fault; these subjects at this moment are of very grave and deep importance. I would ask to be permitted to say a word upon another point which has struck me as very extraordinary in regard to these Estimates. There seems to me to be an enjoyment in the use of figures amongst some persons. An alteration, a change in figures, seems to produce a certain amount of satisfaction. Instead of noting down 7,500, it is very easy to write down 9,500. It is a small matter; but it is an indication of the use and of the value of figures in the Admiralty. On page 211, in regard to the propelling machinery in the Estimates of 1884-5, we find the Bombardier, Howe, Redoubt, and Camperdown, all shown as of 7,500 indicated horse power, and the Howe as of 4,500 horse power. Well, in the Estimates of 1885-6 we find that the machinery has, all of a sudden, gone up in the case of the Bombardier, Howe, Redoubt, and Camperdown to 9,500 horse power, and in the case of the Howe from 4,500 to 6,000 horse power; in that way they show 2,000 horse power above the

Estimate of 1884-5, as regards the larger ships, by a stroke of the pen. How could that change have occurred? It might be that the Admiralty had found some mode of suddenly increasing and developing the power of machinery which is three-fourths constructed, but I am at a loss to know what that mode can be; the circumstance is an unusual one, and it seems to me to require some explanation. Of the four first ships only 9,265 horse power were to have been constructed after the 31st of March, 1886; but there, again, on page 215 of the Estimates of 1885-6, we find that there is a considerable excess in the work to be done. Although it was assumed they were so near completion, the Estimate shows 9,873 horse power to have been constructed, and 985 remaining to be constructed after the 31st of March, 1886. Well, Sir, I now wish to say a word or two with regard to the torpedo boat business. My hon. Friend has spoken with considerable detail on the subject of torpedo boats. He first rests his case on the fact that we have 170 steam pinnaces, varying from nine to 12 knots speed, which are attached, most of them, to ships in commission, in ordinary, or in the first reserve, very few of which, I think, are in excess of the requirements of those ships which will have to go to sea. But he says these are to be a great resource for the defence of our mercantile harbours and of our coasts. Well, it seems to me that this is a new view of the case; but I do not wish to derogate in the slightest degree from the importance of the statement he has made. Let us realize what our position is. No first-class torpedo boats have been added since 1880. Five years have elapsed, and no first-class boats have been laid down. We have none at the present moment which can compete with the French, with the Austrian, or the German new boats. Mr. White's new boats, that were mentioned the other day, are very useful; but although seven have been delivered, only two are fitted. We were told that four first-class boats are building, and two second-class are in course of construction; but it is a curious thing that, although a torpedo boat can be built with economy and advantage, if your design is complete in six months, these boats were building last year, and, according to the Estimates, are not to be completed this year, and it is this delay and procrastination against which I so strongly protest, both in the interests of the Service and the country, and also in the interests of economy. The additions by the present Board, since 1880, are two wooden boats ready, five wooden boats built, but not fitted, and four first-class and two second-class boats now building. Ten first-class boats are now to be commenced, and tenders have been invited. Since 1880 first-class boats have increased from 84 to 113 feet and 120 feet in length, with corresponding increase of speed. English builders have supplied France, Germany, Russia, Austria, Italy, Greece, the Brazils, and the Argentine Republic with such boats, in many cases as patterns. I say they have served as models, for in Austria, Russia, and France, a considerable number of similar boats have been built like them, and I am informed that they answer quite as well as those the English builders furnished. The hon. Gentleman gave us some information with regard to France. I desire, as much as I can, to avoid reference to Foreign Powers, as I think such reference is not desirable. We have to consider what we have for ourselves, for our own protection, and for the defence of our country, and not so much to take into consideration what other countries are doing. As a matter of fact, France has 56 first-class torpedo boats, Germany 18, and has voted money for 75 more, and Russia 115; whilst England, at the present moment, has only 19 of the older and smaller first-class boats. We at present have none of the improved boats afloat. Austria is building boats 135 feet by 13 feet 9 inches, which are to have a speed of 24 knots light, and 22 knots loaded. If the Government had only ordered these boats, which they admit to be necessary, when they made up their minds that an addition to the Navy was required in October last, they might have been delivered in May or June; and who can say how soon these boats may not be required? Who would dare take upon himself the responsibility of saying that these boats may not soon be exceedingly necessary? Who will say that the time may not come when they would be extremely useful in the defence of the country? I want to know when these boats, which are now to be ordered, but which have not yet been ordered, are to be furnished? I believe that the Government would have experienced no difficulty whatever, looking at the state of trade, in acquiring all the 30 which they admit to be necessary in a year's time, or, at the outside, in 18 months. The hon. Gentleman says the Government cannot pledge the Estimates of next year. That is perfectly true. They cannot pledge the Estimates of next year, but they are pledging the Estimates of next year if they leave work unfinished which they have partially undertaken to do this year, and they are pledging the Estimates of next year in a manner which would be most embarrassing and compromising to those who follow the hon. Gentleman and his Government. But, Sir, there is another question that arises out of the torpedo boat question. Where are the torpedoes which are to be used in the torpedo boats? I understand that proposals were submitted to the Admiralty with reference to the supply of torpedoes, proposals which were invited by the Admiralty and submitted to them some months ago, but that yet no tender has been accepted. Now, it is notorious that our supply of torpedoes at the present time would not last three months of actual war. Every torpedo in store would most probably be used up in three months in actual warfare; and, as I understand it, we have not at the present moment means at Woolwich of producing more than 80 torpedoes a-year. That number, in the event of our having a serious conflict with any powerful enemy, would probably be used up in the course of a single week. I think the Committee and the country have a right to know whether steps have been taken to provide torpedoes for the torpedo boats. With regard to the Colossus and the Conqueror, it was stated that those vessels are practically complete. Well, last year, at this time, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said that the Conqueror was complete. I happened, however, to have been at Chatham, and to have seen the tubes of her guns without a breech-piece. Well, a gun cannot be said to be complete without a lock or the means of using it, and that was the position of the guns of the Conqueror at that time. I believe that since then the breech-piece has been settled upon, but the loading apparatus has not been supplied. Though these guns may be complete as far as the Dockyard is concerned, there is no chance that they will be complete for service for two or three months after the breech-loading apparatus has been supplied, and that has not yet been delivered at Chatham or at Portsmouth. It will not be delivered at Portsmouth until after the breech-loading apparatus has been tried and found satisfactory. We are, therefore, in this position—that if war were to break out, neither the Colossus nor the Conqueror could be made available for service, though they have had enormous sums of money spent upon them, and have been within a measurable distance of completion for very many months. And that leads me to ask another question. We were told that the Asson, the Hero, and the Camperdown were all to be completed within four years of the date at which they were laid down; but if I turn to the Estimates I find that the hydraulic mountings for the guns, which take two and a-half years to make, have not yet been ordered. How is it possible for ships to be complete in 1886 when the hydraulic mountings, which will take two and a-half years to make, have not yet been ordered? We are now in the year 1885, and supposing that these hydraulic mountings were ordered before the end of this month it would take at least until October, 1887, before the ship could be ready. It is these unfortunate delays, and the inability of the Department to make up its mind, and to the fact that there were so many minds to be brought together into one way of thinking, that these vessels remained so long incomplete. That is what makes me so exceedingly concerned, and so exceedingly anxious with regard to the future of the Navy of this country. The hon. Gentleman said a word or two about repairs, and we have heard something already about guns. I will not go into the gun question to-night, because that is a matter on which probably the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) and the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand) will have something to say on Thursday, and the hour is so late that I will not detain the Committee on the question; but the hon. Gentleman's remarks with regard to the Minotaur and the Agincourt remind me of the views of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant expressed with regard to these ships only a short time ago. He said that the Minotaur, and the Agincourt, and the Achilles would soon be out of order, and as these were important vessels it would be worth while to put them in order. We are told, however, now that this work is not to be done on account of the cost. It is said that the repairs will cost £200,000, and that, therefore, it is not worth while effecting them; and that, to my mind, is another instance of the inability of the Admiralty at any one time to grasp a question and settle it. If the Minotaur was to be repaired in 1884, how is it that the Admiralty have now come to the conclusion that it should not be repaired. I urge this because of the great importance of taking a complete view of the adequate strength of the Navy. Until it is decided to put the ships on one side, they are regarded as being valuable to the Service of the country, and their existence is pointed to as an argument against the building of other ships. It is said, when the necessity of increased construction is impressed upon the Admiralty—"Have you not got these magnificent vessels of 10,000 tons burden? What more do you want?" These vessels, when it answers the purpose of the Government to use the argument, are pointed at to account for so much displacement and so much strength. In reality these vessels should be struck off The Navy List and put on one side, left out of the calculation and not regarded in any way as ships valuable for the Service. A ship which is known to be one that can be no longer relied upon should be at once treated in that way. I will not go through the list of ships to be repaired; but it strikes me—and I say it with a strong desire to assist the Admiralty in dealing with this question—that they have not made a sufficient provision for repairs and for contingencies, and that that is really the reason why they fail to carry out their programme. The truth is that ships come in which must be repaired—ships that are not expected, and for which provision has not been made, and yet the repairs are urgent, and must be effected. The repairs, as I say, being urgent, the ships are forthwith taken in hand, and then down goes the programme. You spend the money, but you spend it on purposes wholly distinct from those originally contemplated. I believe that the figure put down for repairs this year, compared with that of last year, will be found insufficient for the purpose. Now, there are one or two other questions that I am afraid, even at this hour, I must ask the Committee to consider. There was a Committee appointed to inquire into the condition under which ships are repaired—namely, the Committee on the Building and Repairs of Ships, and that Committee sent in some valuable and important recommendations. It said—

Mr. W. H. Smith

“That vessels, when designed and laid down in the Dockyards, or contracted for, should be completed to receive the best armaments and mechanical inventions known to exist, and thus great expense would be avoided and time saved. It appears in evidence that in the case of ships built in the Dockyards at least three years out of six might be saved by this course; and the Committee considers that the gain to the naval strength of the country by the more rapid completion of vessels possessing fittings of the most approved type at the time they were designed would more than counter-balance any advantage that might be gained by adopting the latest improvements at the cost of serious delay during the construction of the ship.”

Other recommendations of the Committee were—

“1st. That the Admiralty should obtain the armaments they require, either through the Ordnance Department of the War Office, or by direct contract with private firms, as may from time to time appear desirable. 2nd. That encouragement be given to the general engineering talent of the country to design, manufacture, and supply the carriage and hydraulic arrangements for working and loading the guns.”

That was confirmed in a Circular sent round by Mr. Barnaby, Director of Naval Construction, to the Royal Corps of Naval Constructors in January of this year. He stated generally that the causes of slow progress are—

“1. The money voted by Parliament provides for a given number of tons of armour-clads each year. If this will just build the equivalent of two ships in a year, and it is desired to build each ship in three years, it will follow that not more than six ships should be in progress together; but, as a matter of fact, twice that number are often found in progress together, by order of Parliament. 2. With so many ships in progress, delays in settlement of questions of armament and alterations are submitted to, and men are withdrawn and sent to other ships, thus spreading the money and the tons built over 12 instead of six ships, greatly increasing the cost per ship, and halving the rate of building.”

To translate that, I think it means that if only the Chief Constructor of the Navy was allowed to build ships in three years he would be able to do so; but hitherto he has been compelled to take double the time in order that he might make a show—in order to make it appear that the Admiralty has double the number of ships on the stocks at the time. I want to know whether the Admiralty are prepared to follow the advice given in the Report of the Committee I have referred to, and to act upon the opinion expressed by their own Constructor, because it is absurd to say that Parliament has ordered these ships to be built in this way? It is the Admiralty that proposes them to Parliament, and the Admiralty who are responsible for the policy of shipbuilding and the administration. Are the Admiralty, I ask, prepared to adopt the policy laid down by that Report, and by their own officer, or do they intend to persevere in the course of laying down more ships than they can complete in a specified time, as they ought to complete them, with due regard to economy? I want to know if these recommendations are going to be attended to? Now, what is the cause of this delay and failure? The Committee sat and inquired very carefully—we had evidence brought before us to show that it would be possible to build fast cruisers in 18 months, if the Admiralty put them out to contract. By a letter from Elswick I learn that two or three fast cruisers, 18-knot type, could be turned out in 18 months from the date of the order—turned out complete, with armament and everything on board ready for her crews. The armour-clads would take somewhat longer, from two years to two years and three months. Messrs. John Elder and Co. are prepared to build and deliver two fast protected cruisers to carry heavy guns and steam 18 knots within 15 months after signature of unalterable contract—or an armour-clad of the Conqueror class within 24 months, or of the Admiral class within 30 months, rigged and ready for sea with fittings for armament, the Admiralty providing the guns. Now, I believe that Parliament desires above all things promptitude, vigour, and a rapid completion of all the work that has been undertaken; it does not desire to have a great show of ships which are totally useless when they are on the stocks, or while they are incomplete, and which are an extravagant expenditure every minute they lay in course of construction over and above the time that it ought to have taken to finish them. What we want is to have the naval strength which is required for the country ready, and we want to know who is responsible for the delay—that delay which nothing seems capable of overcoming, and which prevents that completeness which Parliament requires? Are there divided counsels? Are there intentional delays anywhere? Is it impossible to get questions settled? Is there an absence of an individual who would absolutely order the work to be done? Is it the guns that cause the delay? The Earl of Northbrook says it is not; but the Bellerophon, according to the Estimates, is still, after five years, waiting for the guns she ought to have had years ago. I believe the guns have been changed frequently, and that the old intention as to the armament of the ship has been altered. Then the carriages are referred to as a cause of delay. I am told by some persons that they cannot be had; but the carriages are now entirely in the hands of the Admiralty, and they have the whole of the mechanical power of England to go to in order to get the carriages. Even if there are patents in the way of the Government, by the power they possess they could still have the work done. I came across an old friend the other day—a distinguished naval officer, and he said to me—"I cannot tell how it is, but the whole system is a make-believe of readiness when we are not ready; and that if war were to break out we should not be able to turn out a Fleet without delay, which would prove injurious, probably most disastrous to us." I regret that the House did not go into Committee to-day at an earlier hour, so that there might have been a full and proper discussion upon the condition of the Navy, when the whole subject might have been thoroughly sifted and thrashed out. I think that an inquiry ought to be instituted; but I do not think that it ought to be conducted by a Committee of this House. The Committee of 1848 was appointed in the month of February, and it reported in August upon the Navy Estimates; but it did not present a final Report until the year 1851. Now, I do not think we can afford to wait for three or four years for the Report of a Committee sitting twice a week for four hours at a time, and withdrawing probably from the Department officers who are most urgently required at the present moment for the discharge of important duties pressing on them every day and every hour. Of course, they would find it necessary to defend the policy which is carried out at the present time, and to exculpate themselves; and that exculpation would, of itself, withdraw their minds from the proper discharge of their duties. As I have said, I think an inquiry is necessary; but I do not think that it should be an inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons. Such an inquiry would probably end in the complete mystification of the country, and the public would most likely fail to arrive at the causes of the evils which exist. I think the Government itself should appoint specially qualified men to inquire into special Departments of the Service which are capable of improvement. I should like to see four or five men deputed to consider the whole question of shipbuilding, to consider whether the system which now prevails is at all a safe or proper one, or whether it is creditable to the capable undertaking of any business operations or enterprise. What is it that we do? We order a ship to be laid down, but we are careful not to order all that is necessary for that ship on account of the circumstances and conditions which surround the Estimates from year to year. The result is that everything is taken in dribblets. The engines are ordered by dribblets. All the materials which go to make the ship are ordered by dribblets. Any private person wanting a vessel would order everything that was required at the outset to be ready to put into the ship, so that no delay should be caused for want of material to the shipwrights and fitters, and there would be an immense economy both of money and of time. Let me refer to the cost of alterations. I happen to know that £10 or £12 a ton are lost in armour alone, which would not be the case if the whole design had been completed in the first instance. Then there is something else—we want to know something about the manning of the vessels of which my hon. Friend has spoken. We want to know whether the provision made for manning the ships can be improved, so as to put the manning of all vessels in a complete state of efficiency within a week of a vessel being put in commiesion? I do not think it could be done now; but unless we know from the directions given by qualified persons what the system is and what can be done—unless the instructions given are laid upon the Table by the Admiralty, and action is taken upon them in the course of a week or two after they are received, I am afraid we shall make no real progress. I cannot but say that a great deal of the failure to complete the programme from year to year, and a great deal of the inaccuracy which prevails in the figures, is due to the want of cordiality in the working which exists within the Admiralty itself. It arises from a vast number of zealous officers in their several Departments, working most conscientiously no doubt to the best of their ability in the discharge of their several duties, being brought together to decide matters which from their very conscientiousness they are prevented from deciding, and which prevents them from arriving at positive conclusions, simply because their decision has to be given upon work altogether outside their several provinces. The result is that matters of real importance to the country are seriously delayed or sacrificed. What we want is a man of vigorous grasp, with a will to control, direct, and order; with a sense of personal and individual duty and responsibility, who would be responsible for having everything done for the country without loss of time. It should be the work of one man, and I think it is the duty of one man to undertake the task. I am asking this not in panic or alarm, but with a deep sense of responsibility. The Navy exists for the country—it is not a mere expensive toy; not a mere matter of display; but if there were not a possibility of war, if there were no probability of war, if there were not almost the certainty that some time or other the Navy would be required to protect the country there would be no excuse for a Navy at all, and no justification for spending £10,000,000 or £12,000,000 a-year in order to keep up the Navy. But I do insist that if the Navy is to be maintained, as many ships as are necessary should be maintained in a state of efficiency. I am convinced, in my own opinion, that the Navy is not ready to perform the duties it might be called upon to discharge in case of war, and more particularly of sudden emergency.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Mr. W. H. Smith

I am convinced that war, and a sudden war, is quite possible. We have been told by the Secretary of State for War, although it is not necessary for us to be told that by a Minister of State, as we can see it for ourselves, that there is cause for very grave anxiety, and that a sudden emergency might arise. Then if there is cause for anxiety there is an additional reason why the House and the country should see that our defences are adequate for the task they may be called upon to perform. It is essential that we should be secure in our homes, in our trade, and in our commerce, and that there should be no interruption to the native industries of the country, or to our food supply. It is the duty of the Admiralty to see that their arrangements and provisions are adequate to the necessities of the case. I speak strongly and plainly, because I feel deeply the responsibilities of the Admiralty. I feel deeply our own responsibility. I know that the provisions which exist are not adequate, and therefore it is that I express my earnest hope that the Government will take such steps as are necessary to bring order out of chaos, and to re-assure the country that the Navy, as far as the matériel and the personnel are concerned, if the actual service of the country required it, are perfect, and that they deserve the complete confidence and trust of the people of this country.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that those who were acquainted with his career in the House of Commons would believe him when he said that he had no intention of making a speech at that hour of the night (1.15). Still less did he intend to enter into the elaborate criticism which had been undertaken by his right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith); but he hoped when his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose that he would at least give some hope of affording him (Lord Henry Lennox) an opportunity, on a future day, of stating the objections he entertained to these marvellous Estimates which he would refrain from stating that night. If he did not feel that he was more or less responsible for the excitement which had been created in the public mind in regard to the state of the Navy he might have remained silent; but as he felt that his speeches and humble efforts had had something to do with the arousing of public attention to the subject, he felt that he would be wanting in his duty if he did not rise at once and tell his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty that he had listened to his speech with alarm. He maintained that there had been nothing more nor less than a deliberate breach of faith in regard to the engagements deliberately entered into with Parliament last December. The Secretary to the Admiralty, with his usual ability, had tried to conceal it, by contrasting the expenditure of money the Admiralty were going to undertake this year with that of France. Hon. Gentlemen must know as well as he (Lord Henry Lennox) did that labour in France was much cheaper than in England; and the contrast, which his hon. Friend had considered it desirable to make, was altogether a fallacious one. He had only one thing more to say, and it was this. He desired forcibly to point out to the Committee that, after all that had been stated in December last, all that was promised now was four new iron-clads—two by contract, and two in the Dockyards—and they had the high authority of the Secretary to the Admiralty himself for saying that the two to be built in the Dockyards had scarcely been commenced, and that they were really nothing but paper ships. All that he desired at the present moment was to draw the attention of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty to that point, and also to ask whether he was right or wrong in pointing out that, according to Vote 6, No. 10, the number of men employed this year, as compared with the number employed last year, notwithstanding the provisions which had been made, was really 47 less? He might have made a mistake; but he would appeal to the Secretary to the Admiralty to put him right. Keeping to his promise, he would not say one word more, except to appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to hold out some hope that this discussion would be resumed at an early day.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that he had been about to make an appeal to the Committee in the sense of what had fallen from the noble Lord. It appeared to him that it was desirable upon this, as upon previous occasions, that they should take the Vote for Men and the first Vote for Money at once, on the clear understanding that the discussion should be continued on an early day on the next Vote, and also, so far as shipbuilding was concerned, on Votes 6 and 10, which came later. If that understanding were arrived at, and it was the understanding that was followed not only last year, but in previous years, his noble Friend would have a full opportunity of making his comments, and they would be able to get over the difficulty of deferring the Vote for Men and the first Money Vote until a future day. He, therefore, asked the Committee to agree at once to the Vote on that distinct understanding.

Mr. A. F. FIFERTON said, he had only one question to ask—namely, when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to renew the discussion? It was very important that it should be renewed as soon as possible; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee some idea of the day upon which the Navy Estimates would be resumed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the course which was pursued last year would be followed this; and the Navy Estimates would be taken, after Easter, on the earliest day consistent with other urgent Business.

Mr. W. H. SMITH remarked, that if the course adopted last year were practically and substantially followed this year, he thought the Committee would do well to agree, at once, to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman.

Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £2,728,100, Wages, &c. to Seamen and Marines.

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,409, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund of certain Miscellaneous Advances."

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, there was an item contained in this Vote upon which he should ask the Committee to divide—namely, the item of £548 9s. 4d. for Fees paid on the Installation of His Royal Highness Prince George Frederick

Ernest Albert of Wales as Knight of the Garter. There was another item of a similar objectionable kind—namely, an item of £360 for special packets for the conveyance of distinguished persons. He thought it was ridiculous for the country to be called upon to pay a large sum of money to some private individual whenever Her Majesty bestowed the Order of the Garter upon him. He would not object to Her Majesty conferring the Garter upon any Member of the Royal Family, or upon the whole country if she chose; but what he did object to was that when Her Majesty took occasion to confer the Garter upon a Member of the Royal Family the country should be charged the sum of £548 9s. 4d. He supposed that these fees went to the Garter King-at-Arms, or some other officer who ought to be wiped off the face of the earth. As he had said before, it was perfectly ridiculous that the country should be called upon to pay these sums of money. If they were necessary at all they ought to be paid by the person upon whom the Order of the Garter was conferred. He would, therefore, propose to reduce the Vote by the sum of £548 9s. 4d., and also by the next item of £360.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member would not be in Order in moving the reduction of the Vote by two separate items at the same time.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked if he would be precluded from afterwards moving the reduction of the item of £360 in the event of the Motion for reducing the Vote by £548 9s. 4d. being negatived?

THE CHAIRMAN asked what was the amount by which the hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce the Vote?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he proposed to reduce it by two separate sums which amounted to £908 9s. 4d., but he had received an intimation that it would not be competent for him to propose the reduction of the two items together; and as the first item was the larger sum, he wanted to know whether, if his Motion were negatived in regard to that sum, he would then be precluded from asking the Committee to agree to the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £360, which constituted the second item? Personally he had no desire to take two divisions, especially at that late hour of the night, and probably the Chancellor of the Exchequer would prefer that the decision of the Committee should be taken upon the two items together.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he was afraid that by the Rules of the House it would be necessary to decide upon one item at a time.

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to know whether, in that case, he would be precluded from moving the reduction of the Vote by the minor sum?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member would be in Order in moving the reduction of the larger sum first, and of the smaller sum afterwards.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, under those circumstances, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £548 9s. 4d.

MR. SEXTON wished to know, as a point of Order, whether the Motion to reduce the Vote by £548 9s. 4d. would preclude any other Member from moving the reduction of the Vote by a larger sum? He himself desired to move the reduction of it by the sum of £1,147 18s., payable to Surgeon Wheeler for attendance on Mr. Shaen Carter, in pursuance of a verdict against the Crown, given in the Court of Exchequer in November, 1883.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it would still be competent for the hon. Member to move a reduction to that effect.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £548 9s. 4d., for Fees paid on the Installation of His Royal Highness Prince George Frederick Ernest Albert of Wales as Knight of the Garter, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. HIBBERT said, that though it had always been the practice to include these fees in the Estimates, there was the strongest reason for doing so in the present case, which was that of a Royal Prince. The fees themselves varied from £130 down to £1, and were paid to Garter King-at-Arms and other officers who attended the installation.

MR. LABOUCHERE remarked, that, if his hon. Friend could give no further information upon the matter, he should certainly divide the Committee against this item.

MR. PICTON said, he did not think that the Secretary to the Treasury had improved matters by the explanation he had given. There was a strong feeling throughout the country that the public money ought not to be voted to individuals except in return for work done, and the work done ought to represent value received. The matter was very different now from what it used to be in olden times, when these fashions and ceremonies were of much more importance. [Cries of "Oh!"] He knew that whenever an hon. Member alluded in that House to the opinions of the millions outside, a large number of whom were about to be enfranchised for the first time, he was received with something like ridicule. Nevertheless, the opinion of these people was of great importance, and would prove to be of the highest importance hereafter. However foolish it might be thought within that House, nothing created so much irritation of feeling in the minds of the working classes as these petty Votes on behalf of distinguished persons who were not believed to have done any work that would justify the payment. He would certainly support the hon. Member for Northampton Mr. Labouchere in an earnest protest against this Vote.

Mr. Labouchere

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that the explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury rather aggravated than mitigated the absurdity of the first item in the Vote. It only required the explanation of the hon. Member to make the whole proceeding much more extravagant than the wildest creation of Mr. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan. What was the Vote? It had been described as one that was necessary in order to carry out an ancient custom, and the money appeared to have been expended in buying banners, helmets, and swords—exactly what the stage manager at the Savoy did in placing upon the boards one of the operas of the two distinguished gentlemen he had just named. He wondered how an expenditure of this sort could be tolerated with patience by any enlightened Assembly. He thought everybody would acknowledge that they had now made a certain progress in civilization, and that it was not necessary to adopt nowadays the dress and customs of the Middle Ages. What would be thought of the hon. Gentleman himself if he took it into his head to come down to the House preceded by banners, wearing doublet and hose, and accompanied by all the paraphernalia which might have distinguished a Secretary of State in the days of James I. He saw that the hon. Member for Liskeard Mr. Courtney laughed at that suggestion. He would ask the Committee to imagine the late Secretary to the Treasury Mr. Courtney presenting himself to their notice at the Bar of the House in a "nodding plume," with his casque down, with retainers bearing banners, helmets, and swords, and all of it paid for out of the public money! The whole thing belonged to the region of opéra bouffe, and not to the civilization of the 19th century. He hoped the Committee would strike a blow at such ridiculous absurdity.

MR. HEALY said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had referred to the late Secretary to the Treasury. That hon. Gentleman had had the advantage of defending these Votes when he occupied a seat upon the Treasury Bench; but now the Committee were able to look upon him in a different light from the seat he at present occupied below the Gangway. He certainly should like to know what were the present views entertained by the hon. Gentleman. They knew very well what his views were when he sat as a Minister above the Gangway, and they were very anxious now to watch his performances from the seat he occupied at present below the Gangway. He certainly hoped the Committee would receive some guidance from the hon. Gentleman, and that he would be able to assure the Committee, in continuing to support these Votes, that he had no sympathy with the opposition which was raised by the Radical Members. Personally, he (Mr. Healy) did not think that if they got good government it ought to be too cheap, and he would have no objection to pay £3,000 or £4,000 by way of extras in order to secure good government; but, at the same time, he thought it was desirable that they should thrash a matter of this kind out to its logical conclusion, and see what it was they were called upon to vote. While there was a Monarchy, it must be taken for better or worse. If it were necessary to have banners and helmets, he should vote for them; but he rather fancied these things were out of date.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 56: Majority 31.—(Div. List, No. 54.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, no doubt, the persons conveyed across the Channel in special packets, and for which service the sum of £360 was charged, were very distinguished persons; but the House had never been told on what ground those distinguished persons had special packets provided to convey them between Dover and Calais, and why, if they desired those special facilities, they should not pay for them themselves. He was aware that it had been said before now on the Treasury Bench, and would be said again that evening, no doubt, that Her Majesty had power to use the ships of the Royal Navy for this purpose, and that it was cheaper to hire a special packet for £40 rather than to have a man-of-war to carry Members of the Royal Family across the Channel. But he would point out that the practice of employing men-of-war would not exist very long, because everyone knew that there would be proposals for a reduction in the Navy if any of them were used for the purpose. There was in the Estimate a charge of £40 for conveying the Duchess of Mecklenburg from Calais to Dover, and a charge of £40 for bringing her back from Dover to Calais. With the highest respect, he did not see why the country should be called upon to pay £40 whenever this lady wished to visit this country. She was born, it was true, in this country, but he believed she had married a German Prince and that she was living in Germany; moreover, he believed that Parliament had voted her an income. The charge he was referring to, under the circumstances, rather hampered the pleasure felt at seeing the Duchess of Mecklenburg in this country. He hoped that the protests which were always raised on the part of Members of that House in regard to special packets for the conveyance of distinguished persons might be listened to. As an hon. Member (Mr. Picton) speaking on the last Vote had said, it was these little things which made the people angry. It was because the sums were small that they thought the distinguished persons could pay the amount themselves. When the distinguished persons went to the Continent, they started generally from Charing Cross; it might be that they travelled by special train, but whether that was so or not, they paid for it. He did not see why these absurdities should continue year after year in the shape of calls upon the House for payment, and, therefore, he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £360, the amount of charge for the special packets.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Item of £360, for Special Packets for the conveyance of Distinguished Persons, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. MOLLOY said, he should like to know why the Royal Yachts were not used for this service? He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it was not a fact that the three Royal Yachts were at the present time under repairs as usual? He believed that in the Estimates of last year they were charged for the repair of each of the Royal Yachts. He should like to hear from the hon. Gentleman if the Royal Yachts were under repair when this expense was incurred, and, if not, why they were not employed for carrying these distinguished persons across the Channel?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that when this Vote was discussed last year, it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that he promised to look into some of the questions connected with it, and particularly with regard to the point just raised. He had gone carefully into the question, in order to see whether it would be possible to substitute for the special packets employed one of the Royal Yachts, and he would state to the Committee plainly what was the result of his inquiry. He found that for a very long time it had been customary for Members of the Royal Family, going to or returning from the Continent, to be conveyed in vessels of the Royal Navy, and formerly two or three sailing ships were used expressly for that purpose. Hon. Members would remember that in the early days of the use of steam, there were no contract steamers, but small steam vessels of the Navy were used; and that subsequently it was arranged that contracts should be entered into with the Steamship Companies for the service. Accordingly, these small naval steamers, and subsequently contract chart steamers, were used as the old sailing ships had been. He might remind the Committee that there was at the present time a charge in the Estimates for the conveyance of the suite of Her Majesty and her horses and carriages. Now, the question had been asked by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Molloy) whether it would be more economical to make use of the Royal Yachts for this service. But he would point out that those Yachts drew too much water to admit of their being used between Dover and Calais, and between Folkestone and Boulogne. Were vessels specially built for the purpose, he was satisfied it would be less economical; and, therefore, having stated the ancient custom, and what he believed would be the result of the change suggested, he trusted the Vote would be allowed to pass.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 64; Majority 24.—(Div. List, No. 55.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. SEXTON said, that, no doubt, the fulness of the right hon. Gentleman's reply on the subject of conveyance of distinguished persons had been appreciated by the Committee; but there were several other items in this Vote which gave rise to some speculation, and as to which he would like to hear an explanation. The first item was a charge for Surgeon Wheeler for attendance upon Mr. Shaen Carter in November, 1883. He asked why it was necessary to pay for attendance on Mr. Shaen Carter, and if it were necessary, why one of the most eminent surgeons in Ireland had been engaged to attend him? He believed that he was the victim of an outrage; but many other outrages upon persons had been committed, and the Government had not thought fit to take the victims under their especial care. He and his hon. Friends desired to know what were the special facts which induced the Government to assume financial responsibilities with regard to the injuries of Mr. Carter? Why had the Government repeatedly refused to pay for injuries caused by the weapons of their agents in Ireland? Hon. Gentlemen on those Benches knew of men, women, and children who had been wounded by the bayonets of the Government police, and they know of innocent persons who had been cast into prison and afterwards released; but the Government had never placed 5s. on the Estimates to compensate them. He thought they were entitled to claim that compensation should be given in cases where the Government were responsible for the injuries inflicted. Then there was a charge for a gratuity of £500 to the Commissioner of Valuation for services given to the Government, and he complained that there was nothing whatever in the Estimates to show what the services were. He should be glad to receive an explanation of this charge. He found also a charge for the collection of compensation and fines under the Act of 1882, with regard to which he said that the collectors had not very much to do, according to the testimony of the Judges. He thought this money might very well have been collected without any charge being placed on the country, and he would be glad to hear when the money had been collected, and under what circumstances the charge was made. He would also be glad to know what was the misconduct on the part of the Crown Solicitor for which Mrs. Eliza Colgan received a compassionate grant of £250. There was one other item in the Vote to which he took exception—namely, £1,000 to

“The Right Honourable A. W. Peel, equipping money on election as Speaker of the House of Commons.”

In the Public Service of this country there appeared to be a great tendency to multiply the number of outfits; indeed, there was one noble Lord who received as many as three outfits in one year.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Gentleman was not in Order in referring to the item of £1,000 for Mr. Speaker's outfit. A division had been taken on the third item of the Vote, and the £1,000 to which the hon. Gentleman referred was the second item. As a division had been taken on the item for “Special Packets for the conveyance of Distinguished Persons,” the hon. Gentleman was not in order in the remarks he was now making.

MR. SEXTON said, he had not much to say upon the point. If he could not comment upon the item, he should move, without reference to any particular item, to reduce the Vote by the sum of £1,000. The Committee would understand his object in moving such a reduction.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,409, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885, for the Repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund of certain Miscellaneous Advances."—
(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. HEALY said, the ruling of the Chairman, as he understood it, was that the Committee could not divide against the item of £1,000 for the Speaker's outfit. The Question put from the Chair was that a sum of £8,409 be granted to Her Majesty to defray certain charges. Surely, therefore, there was nothing to prevent hon. Members from referring to a particular £1,000 in that amount. He did not want to deprive Mr. Peel of his equipage money—the right hon. Gentleman could have £500,000 for aught he (Mr. Healy) cared—but this was a Vote for £8,409 for Civil Contingencies; and were the Committee to be told that because an hon. Gentleman chose to challenge a succeeding Vote, they were to be debarred from debating, for instance, the item for—

"Fees paid on the Installation of His Royal Highness Prince George Frederick Ernest Albert of Wales as Knight of the Garter?"

THE CHAIRMAN said, his ruling was quite plain. It would be quite competent for the hon. Member for Sligo to move to reduce the Vote, but not to reduce it with particular reference to the item of £1,000 for the Speaker's equipage money. Inasmuch as a succeeding item had been disposed of, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was in error in supposing the Committee could discuss the Vote for the installation fees of His Royal Highness Prince George Frederick Ernest Albert of Wales as Knight of the Garter, or the item for the Speaker's equipage money.

MR. HEALY understood that the Question the Chairman put on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was that the item of £360 for "Special Packets for the conveyance of Distinguished Persons" be omitted. Because it was decided that the item should stand part of the Vote, was he (Mr. Healy) excluded from going into other items?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman cannot discuss an item preceding the one which has been disposed of. He is quite within his right to debate and take a division upon any subsequent item.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked if a division, taken upon the proposal to reduce the Vote by £1,000, would necessarily apply to Mr. Speaker's outfit?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have stated it could not apply to that item. That item cannot now be debated. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) has proposed to reduce the whole Vote by £1,000, and that he is perfectly competent to do.

MR. GRAY asked if a division taken on the Motion to reduce the whole sum by £1,000 would preclude discussion on any particular item?

THE CHAIRMAN: The only items that are precluded from discussion up to the present moment are three, because a division has been taken on the third. They are the installation fees of His Royal Highness, the Speaker's equipage money, and the item for special packets.

MR. GRAY followed the remarks of the Chairman; but what he wanted to know was, whether a division on the Motion to reduce the whole Vote by £1,000 would preclude discussion on any of the items?

THE CHAIRMAN: No. None of the items subsequent to that of £360 for special packets will be precluded from discussion.

MR. CALLAN: If the Motion to reduce the Vote by £1,000 is carried, to what item will that reduction be applied?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers): That would be in the discretion of the Government, and we shall resist the Motion on that ground. Of course, it would be quite competent for the Committee to reduce the Vote.

MR. HEALY said, he hoped that now they had got the ruling of the Chair they would conform to it strictly. The items upon which he proposed to make some observations were those with regard to Mr. Shaen Carter, the gratuity to the Commissioner of Valuation for services rendered to the Irish Government, and the compassionate grant to Mrs. Eliza Colgan. He quite agreed that it was necessary to put down the sum of £1,147 18s. in respect of Surgeon Wheeler's attendance on Mr. Shaen Carter. Nobody knew that better than the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). The actual facts of this case, however, were concealed from the Committee. There was a sum of £500 for law expenses which was not included in this Vote. He asked a Question on this subject on the 11th of February last year, and the Government now put down only the exact amount of the verdict given in favour of Mr. Wheeler. The Question he asked last year was—

"By whose advice was Surgeon Wheeler's demand against the Government for attendance on a wounded landlord resisted, whether it was deemed in evidence that the Government were willing to pay him £700, while his claim was £1,147 18s., whether the Government employed the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and Mr. Bodd instructed by Mr. Lane Jervis, to resist his claim before a jury, if he can state what amount was marked on the briefs of the Government lawyers, and how much they obtained as 'refreshers,' whether it is the fact that the Government ultimately admitted in Court the full claim of Surgeon Wheeler, that the case was withdrawn from the jury, and that they had to pay, in addition to their own costs, the costs of three opposing Queen's Counsel, and, if he can state what the taxed costs of the Plaintiff amounted to, and how much the suit has cost the Government altogether beyond the £1,147 18s. originally claimed, which they subsequently admitted in Court was due to Surgeon Wheeler."—(3 Hansard, [1884] 428-9.)

The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland admitted to him that the taxed costs amounted to £208 14s. 7d., and that the suit would cost the Government about £400, in addition to the £1,147 18s.; that was to say, the taxpayers were now called upon to pay in respect of this wounded landlord the sum of £1,147 18s., and in addition to put into the pockets of the Irish lawyers about £400. Surgeon Wheeler earned the money, but who were the people who gave the order that he should earn it; and who was the economical gentleman who raised a false issue, and therefore put all this money into the pockets of the Irish lawyers? It was understood that the late Mr.

Burke gave the order to Mr. Wheeler to put down attendances on Mr. Shaen Carter. Mr. Burke being dead, there was no possibility of ascertaining whether Mr. Shaen Carter's story was right or wrong. The whole matter then came before Mr. Hamilton, Under Secretary, who with Scotch acumen, was in the habit of making reductions in the salaries of others in order to get advances in his own—thought it was a fine thing to resist Mr. Surgeon Wheeler's claim of £1,100 against the Irish Government. He advised the Irish Government to resist the claim in Court, and they did so, with the result that after two days' litigation they had to consent to a verdict being returned against them, and the country was put to the needless cost of £400 owing to Mr. Hamilton's—Sir Robert Hamilton's, he begged that gentleman's pardon—attempted economy. Now, this was the way government was carried on in Ireland. That distinguished physician Mr. Surgeon Wheeler was, through some means or other—he Mr. Healy did not know how—induced to take long journeys from Dublin to Mayo, and his charge for every attendance was 100 guineas, or some such enormous sum. Of course, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin City (Dr. Lyons) would understand that matter very much better than he Mr. Healy did. Well, Surgeon Wheeler charged the money—he was quite right, if he were invited to attend Mr. Shaen Carter, to charge Government prices. That being so, what was the duty of the Government? They knew that Mr. Surgeon Wheeler attended Mr. Shaen Carter; but Sir Robert Hamilton, with his new-found economy, came into Dublin Castle fresh as paint, and upon his advice they said—"Oh, we will dispute your bill." Having disputed the bill, and having come to the point of the bayonet—so to speak—and having got Mr. Surgeon Wheeler into Court, and compelled him to prove by experts what he had a right to charge, they knuckled down and said—"We shall have to pay." The present Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was the only person who could be congratulated on this Vote, because he was Counsel for Mr. Surgeon Wheeler and had the satisfaction of beating the Government. Now, however, he had the satisfaction of defending the Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman's position was certainly one of extraordinary novelty. In Queen Street the hon. and learned Gentleman was found denouncing the conduct of the Government for refusing Mr. Surgeon Wheeler's paltry fee of £1,147 18s.; but now the Committee would have the luxury of hearing the learned Solicitor General on the part of the Government say the thing was all right from first to last, and nobody deserved his money better than Mr. Surgeon Wheeler. The litigation must have been very satisfactory from the hon. and learned Gentleman's point of view, for it unquestionably put a very large sum in his own pocket. The next item to which he (Mr. Healy) desired to direct the attention of the Committee was that of £250 paid as the compassionate grant to Mrs. Eliza Colgan, in consideration of the loss caused by the misconduct of an Irish Crown Solicitor. The only complaint he had to make about the item was that it was too small. This unfortunate woman was the widow of a man who was sentenced to penal servitude for life. The convict died, and the Crown Solicitor, Mr. Meara, collared all Mrs. Colgan's effects; and he passed on his office by some extraordinary jugglery, which was only known in Dublin Castle, to Mr. Gerrard, who at present held the position of Crown Solicitor. This woman had been trying to get justice against Mr. Meara for the last 11 years; she had been wearing out the flags of Dublin Castle trying to get some satisfaction from the Irish Government, and at last she got a Question put in this House respecting her case, and the next thing that was heard was that she was to get £250. He supposed that if she got her rights she would receive at least £1,250. This poor wretched woman, who had for years been making pilgrimages to that shrine of piety—Dublin Castle—could not get 1d. until her case was taken up by a Member of the House of Commons, and then she was granted the paltry sum of £250. Either the woman was entitled to get her payment in full, or she was not entitled to 1d. When he (Mr. Healy) put a Question to the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), the right hon. Gentleman said he had great sympathy with Mrs. Eliza Colgan, but he could do nothing for her. Now, however, the sympathy of the Government had led them to propose a grant to her of £250. Why had she only to receive £250? She was swindled by a Crown Solicitor who trafficked his office, and got a full money payment for it from Mr. Gerrard. Why should not Mr. Gerrard pay Mrs. Colgan's claim in full? He took the offer for better or for worse; he took the office with all its rights, wrongs, and responsibilities; and therefore he should be compelled to pay the sum that his predecessor, Mr. Meara, swindled Mrs. Colgan out of. Mrs. Colgan was a poor woman of 60 years of age. She had no means under Heaven of going to law, and for 10 years she was endeavouring to obtain justice, but failed to do so until the Government were awoken up by a Question put in that House. And now they put her off with a paltry sum of £250. The item required some explanation. Perhaps the Government would tell the Committee why Mrs. Eliza Colgan was kept out of her money for 10 or 11 years—the interest on which by this time would have come to £250—and why they should not compel Mr. Gerrard to make up the defalcations of his predecessor? Now, in this Vote there was a sum of £500 set down as a gratuity to the Commissioner of Valuation for services rendered to the Irish Government. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that the information given in respect of these Votes was extremely scanty. If the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) would accept a piece of advice from him, it would be this—that the Government should give as much information as they could on paper, because if they did so much debate would be saved in the House. Would any set of hon. Members in the House object to the four or five lines of type, or the few pages more that would be necessary to add to the Votes if full information were given? Look at the time they would save. In his opinion they would save hours every night if a little précis of the reasons for the Vote were given. Under the present system the Committee had to rely upon the Secretary to the Treasury giving all necessary information. He (Mr. Healy) had been surprised at the manner in which Secretaries to the Treasury got up their work, especially the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr.

Mr. Healy

Courtney). That hon. Gentleman was always ready at a moment's notice to give information, and he (Mr. Healy) thought he would be worthily followed in this respect by his distinguished Successor (Mr. Hibbert). Considerable time would have been saved by an explanation appearing upon the foot of the Vote itself as to the gratuity of £500 to the Commissioner of Valuation. He (Mr. Healy) supposed the gratuity was made for services rendered in connection with the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution Bill; but he should be glad to receive definite information on the subject. Then, again, £99 7s. 6d. was charged on the Vote for—"Payment on account of the collection of compensation under the provisions of the Crimes Act (Ireland), 1882."

Was this in Dublin? [THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Walker) nodded assent.] Very well. He would like to know why that £99 7s. 6d. should not come out of the amount paid to Mr. Field? He would like English Members, especially economical gentlemen like the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), to remember that when they were voting for blood-money under the Prevention of Crime Act they did not think that such sums as £99 7s. 6d. would be charged on the general taxpayers of the United Kingdom. According to the theory of the Prevention of Crime Act the expenses of collecting the compensation given to Mr. Field should be borne by the citizens of Dublin. If the authorities asked him (Mr. Healy, as a citizen of Dublin, for any part of the money, they would certainly have to sell out his goods and chattels. Indeed, nothing would give him greater satisfaction than to see a sheriff come up to his door to collect 3s. 9d., which he presumed would be required from him personally. The attempt would certainly be worth the money. He invited the Government to endeavour to collect the tax from him. All he could say was that if the Dublin people would take the same course that he would do under the circumstances they would knock a great deal more fun out of the Prevention of Crime Act than they at present got out of it. Why was this £99 7s. 6d. to fall upon the general taxpayers of the country? Why should not the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), in the interests of his constituents, resist the attempt to put blood-money, which ought to fall on the iniquitous City of Dublin, on the taxpayers of the country who by their rule in Ireland simply brought about the crime they sought to repress? In his opinion, the £99 7s. 6d. ought to be deducted from the £3,000 which was paid to Mr. Field. He noticed that £452 3s. 6d. was set down for the "purchase of the reliquary of St. Lachtin, to be deposited in the Royal Irish Academy." He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) on having asked for that amount. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had acted throughout the matter handsomely, and the arrangement which had been made had been one which had given the utmost satisfaction throughout Ireland. He (Mr. Healy) hoped the practice which the right hon. Gentleman had to some extent inaugurated—namely, of collecting Art treasures in Dublin, would be continued in the future. These were the remarks he had to make upon this Vote. He would like to have some explanation as to why the Government did not set at the foot of the Vote the reason of the gratuity to the Commissioner of Valuation; and why the £99 7s. 6d. for the collection of compensation under the Prevention of Crime Act was not paid out of the money granted to Mr. Field?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he could not resist the temptation to enter into a little explanation of the payment to Mr. Surgeon Wheeler. It appeared that Mr. Shaen Carter was in March, 1882, fired at and wounded severely. His life was in danger. He was then at Belmullett, some 40 miles from the nearest railway, and by his desire the Resident Magistrate in the district telegraphed to the late Mr. Burke, who was then Under Secretary, suggesting that Dr. Wheeler—one of the most eminent surgeons in Ireland—should be sent out to attend him. Accordingly, Surgeon Wheeler waited upon Mr. Burke. As they all know, Mr. Burke was afterwards assassinated, and he was not alive to give his account of the transaction when the matter came to a conflict between Mr. Surgeon Wheeler and the Irish Government. But Mr. Burke left a memorandum behind him, which stated that Surgeon Wheeler was to be paid by the Government if Mr. Shaen Carter was not able to pay him. As a matter of fact, Mr. Shaen Carter's rents had been so cut down by the Land Commissions that he was now in comparative poverty. Mr. Surgeon Wheeler paid Mr. Shaen Carter several visits; and as he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had already stated, Mr. Shaen Carter was 40 miles from the nearest railway, Surgeon Wheeler claimed his proper amount. ["How many visits did he pay?"] When Mr. Shaen Carter was removed to Dublin, Mr. Surgeon Wheeler paid him some visits in that City. He paid him in all seven visits at Belmullett; and therefore it could be easily calculated how the amount charged was arrived at—Mr. Surgeon Wheeler having sent in a claim for £1,147. The Government finding the memorandum Mr. Burke left behind, which they were perfectly justified in assuming showed the terms on which Mr. Surgeon Wheeler was engaged, offered that gentleman a reduced sum of between £700 or £800, which they considered sufficient compensation for his visits. When the case came to be tried, Mr. Surgeon Wheeler refused the offer of the Government, and said that from several conversations he had had with Mr. Burke he imagined he was to be paid by the Government, quite irrespective of Mr. Shaen Carter. Mr. Burke being dead, there was no means of disproving that, and accordingly the Government must either concede the demand, or take the alternative of repudiating the agency of their own employés. He felt bound to disabuse the mind of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) on one point. The hon. and learned Gentleman had gone out of his way to make some observations about Sir Robert Hamilton. Now, Sir Robert Hamilton had nothing at all to do with the case. The person named Hamilton who was mentioned in the course of the proceedings was not Sir Robert Hamilton at all, but a gentleman named Thomas Hamilton, who was a Resident Magistrate, and who was acting as Secretary to Mr. Burke, and who, it appeared, was present at one or two of the visits which Mr. Surgeon Wheeler paid to Mr. Burke. Mr. Thomas Hamilton, when appealed to, was not in a position to contradict what Mr. Surgeon Wheeler alleged took place between himself and Mr. Burke, and therefore Mr. Hamilton could throw no light on the matter. In his (the Solicitor General for Ireland's) opinion, the Government, under such circumstances, very properly conceded the demand made by Surgeon Wheeler. With regard to the case of Mrs. Eliza Colgan, he did not understand that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had found any fault with the Government beyond the charge that the sum which had been paid to her was not large enough. The fact was, that a man named Matthew Colgan, as far back as 1853, was sentenced to death, but had the sentence commuted to penal servitude for life. The husband was possessed of certain property, which, by his conviction, became confiscated to the Crown, the wife having no right to it. The Authorities, however, agreed to settle it on the woman, and interest was paid to her on £500 until 1868. In that year she took a promissory note for the amount from Mr. Jeremiah Meara, the Crown Solicitor for Queen's County. This person subsequently became embarrassed, and left the country without settling with Mrs. Colgan. The circumstances were represented to the Irish Government, and as Meara had acted as their agent, it was decided to consider the case. The result of that consideration had been the payment to Mrs. Colgan of the sum named in the Estimate. He was acquainted with Mr. Gerrard, and could assure the Committee that he was a thoroughly trustworthy man. This gentleman had succeeded Mr. Meara as Crown Solicitor for Queen's County. [An hon. MEMBER: How?] He could not say how. The Conservatives were then in power, and they were responsible for the appointment. But it could not be contended that Crown Solicitors were responsible for the acts of their predecessors. If such were the case, it would be very unfair to the incoming officials, and it might be found difficult to get gentlemen to take upon themselves the responsibility.

MR. HIBBERT said, the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Solicitor General for Ireland had explained all the items except that in regard to which Mr. Ball Greene had been mentioned. He wished to explain to the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and the other hon. Gentlemen who had referred to the matter, that that had nothing whatever to do with the Boundary Commission. The item had reference to services performed in 1884, long before the Boundary Commission was ever thought of. The services were connected with several important Bills, Mr. Ball Greene having given important information and assistance to the Government. The first measure in regard to which this assistance had been rendered was the Arrivars Act of 1883; then assistance was given in connection with the Land Act and the Franchise Act. Those were the principal measures in respect of which the £500 was paid. He did not understand that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton) who had brought the subject forward objected to the payment. He presumed the hon. Member only wished for an explanation as to how it was that such a sum was paid to the recipient of so large a salary. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) said the Government should give more information in the Estimates, and he (Mr. Hibbert) quite agreed that it would save a great amount of trouble if that course were adopted. On the other hand, they must remember that if the Government gave too much information, it might lead to a vast amount of discussion and a great waste of time. On the whole he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member that it was the best course to take Parliament into their confidence as much as possible.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not object to a payment being made to Mr. Ball Greene for additional services rendered; but he held that £500 was an exorbitant sum for the services rendered.

MR. HEALY said, he rose for the purpose of expressing his regret at having, a short time ago, mentioned the name of Sir Robert Hamilton by mistake. The name had misled him, and he would suggest that something should be done to enable hon. Members to distinguish with ease amongst individuals of the same name. He did not agree with the explanations which had been given. Evidently someone of the name of Hamilton was to blame, and the statements made on behalf of the Government did not carry conviction to his (Mr. Healy's) mind. The fact was admitted that this item for law costs had been incurred by contesting a claim which was now allowed to be fair and just. All the facts in connection with the case of Mr. Shaen Carter—all the facts concerning Dr. Wheeler's attendance upon him—ought to have been known to Mr. Hamilton. The Solicitor General for Ireland shook his head. Was he (Mr. Healy) to be told that Mr. Hamilton was not made acquainted beforehand with all the information that was put before the jury? Was he to be told that the case was put before a jury without Mr. Hamilton knowing its details? No doubt, every fact which was put before the jury had been put before the Irish Government; therefore he thought Mr. Hamilton ought to be made to pay the law expenses. Either Surgeon Wheeler told a story to the jury which he did not tell to Mr. Hamilton, or Mr. Hamilton was responsible for misleading the Government and causing them to lose this £500. As to the case of Mrs. Eliza Colgan, the Solicitor General for Ireland had not yet seen his (Mr. Healy's) point as to this woman. It was this. The woman's husband was convicted 32 years ago. The state of the law was such at that time that, owing to the attempt of the man to poison his unfortunate wife, they were able to turn her into the poor-house, and then seize upon the property which belonged to the husband. They now said that it was simply as an act of grace that they did not confiscate the husband's property in this way. But they appointed a trustee—this man Meara—and he absconded with the money. How they had allowed this man to make an arrangement with his successor and then to run out of the country, was still unexplained. The Solicitor General for Ireland had touched very lightly upon this man Gerrard having trafficked with Meara for the appointment of Crown Solicitor in Queen's County; but, as a matter of fact, he had taken the appointment subject to any charges there might be on Mr. Meara's estate. What were Meara's liabilities which could not be disputed or denied? Would the Government lay that information on the Table? If they did not promise to give it, he (Mr. Healy) would move for it, and then they might be able to ascertain whether or not the present Crown Solicitor for Queen's County was responsible or not. If there was not something shady in the business, why was not all this information forthcoming? It was a monstrous thing to say that as this unfortunate woman had been practically kept out of her money for 32 years, and had been swindled by Mr. Meara, an agent of the Government, the gentleman who succeeded Meara as the agent for the Government was not liable to make good the default of his predecessor in office. The woman had been deprived of her property for 17 years—since 1868. The woman's property was surely worth more than £500. What, then, had become of the balance? Where were the papers explaining the matter? Was it not a fact that Mr. Meara had never paid the woman anything? Was there not a question about a life assurance? Would the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant say whether or not Mr. Gerrard had ever touched any of the money Meara admitted himself indebted to the woman? Ought a Crown Solicitor to be allowed to leave the country without the Government being informed of it? Was it not as a trust that Meara had taken the money in hand, and, if it were so, was it not a trust that must descend to successive Crown Solicitors until properly discharged? The Solicitor General for Ireland had ridden very lightly over this subject, declaring that if one Crown Solicitor were to be held liable for the acts and deficiencies of his predecessor, there would be a pretty to do. Well, there might be in the case of such men as George Bolton; but that person, in his official capacity, had never had anything to do with a trust. He was responsible for defalcations as a swindler. But whose duty was it to induct Mr. Gerrard into Meara's office? Were they not bound to act in matters of this kind as auditors? Were they not bound to know that a trust involving a sum of £500 attached to Meara's office, and were they not bound to make Mr. Gerrard acquainted with the fact? How did Mr. Gerrard get the trust without having any assets? Were they to be told that Mr. Gerrard took over the office without having any accounts given to him? No doubt, Mr. Meara held the money as a trust, as it was not in his private name only, but in his name as Crown Solicitor, and the trust should, properly, attach to every Crown Solicitor who took office in Queen's County until it was discharged.

Mr. Healy

MR. COURTNEY said, that perhaps he might be allowed to refer to one or two of the circumstances under discussion, as they had happened whilst he was Secretary to the Treasury, and, although he had not refreshed his memory with regard to them, he thought he was competent to deal with them. With regard to the case of Surgeon Wheeler, the facts were these. Surgeon Wheeler alleged that he had received authority from the Irish Government to go down and attend to this gentleman, Mr. Shaen Carter. It was not customary to put the brief of the plaintiff's evidence into the hands of the defendant before the trial, so that the Government were not cognizant of all the details of Surgeon Wheeler's contention. They had the evidence of Mr. Hamilton, who was a sort of Assistant Secretary to Mr. Burke, and who possessed a memorandum in Mr. Burke's handwriting to the effect that the Irish Government were not responsible; and on this ground, and also because the claim was excessive, it was resisted. The opposition to the claim came—he might incidentally say—from the Treasury in London, so that the blame should not be put upon Sir Robert Hamilton, who had been confused with Mr. Hamilton by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy). After the plaintiff had made his case, it became necessary to ascertain how Mr. Hamilton could meet the evidence of Surgeon Wheeler, and it appeared that he had no recollection of the circumstances narrated by that gentleman, but could not take upon himself to go into the box to deny them. There was then no other course for the Government to pursue but to give way. They resisted no longer, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff.

MR. HEALY: What was done with Mr. Hamilton?

MR. COURTNEY said he thought the Irish Government were not very well pleased with the result, but it was not easy to do anything. Mr. Hamilton was not in a position to deny the conversation which was spoken to by Surgeon Wheeler, although, at the same time, he could not remember it. It was an unfortunate matter altogether. Surgeon Wheeler had been called upon in great haste, Mr. Shaen Carter being on the point of death. Surgeon Wheeler had the carefulness to make a note of the transaction when it occurred, but Mr. Hamilton had not had that forethought. Mr. Hamilton's account of the conversation with Surgeon Wheeler was not recorded by the Government at the time; Mr. Hamilton's memory failed him, and the Government had to submit to an adverse verdict; but it would not have been right, under the circumstances, to have visited Mr. Hamilton with a severe censure for a mere act of failure of memory. As to the case of Mrs. Eliza Colgan, the woman's husband was convicted of attempted murder, and his property was necessarily forfeited to the Crown. The Crown waived the forfeiture however, and the property was put into the hands of the Crown Solicitor on behalf of Mrs. Colgan—not put into his hands officially, but handed over to him as to a trustee. The trustee kept it in his hands, and paid Mrs. Colgan interest on the money. He paid interest at the rate of 6 per cent, which was itself sufficient to show that he did not retain the money in his official capacity. Well, the Crown Solicitor absconded, and his affairs had to be wound up, and when this settlement was brought about Mrs. Colgan received her share of the assets as a creditor, and signed a deed entirely releasing the estate of the debtor from her claim. The position the woman took up towards Mr. Meara showed that she had trusted him in his private capacity. She was a foolish woman with no great aptitude for business, or she would never have done such a thing. The fact of her having received a note of hand was not brought to the notice of the Government until last year. Under all the circumstances of the case, the Government thought they would be acting fairly towards the woman by paying her over the amount stated in the Vote.

Mr. LEAMY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down said that money was left in the hands of the Crown Solicitor by this foolish woman, and he also understood the hon. Gentleman to say that the Government gave the £500 to Mr. Meara in trust for her. Was that not so? [Mr. CONWAY: It was left with him.] Then it was the Government that trusted this man, and not the woman. The money had been originally forfeited by Mrs. Colgan's husband; but the Crown considered the case to be one in which the poor woman should not be deprived of the money, therefore they put it into the hands of an agent, who embezzled it. The least the Government could have done, under the circumstances, would have been to have come forward and given the poor woman something like the sum of which she had been robbed. He should like to have some information upon this point. With regard to the case of Surgeon Wheeler, that gentleman was no doubt entitled to receive a sum of money. There could be no question about that; but he should like to ask the Government why it was that they sent down an eminent surgeon of this kind, at an expense of £1,147, to attend upon a landlord who happened to have been shot at, when if it had happened to have been a peasant who was injured in this way they would have left him to be attended to by the dispensary doctor? The fact of the wounded person being a landlord was no reason why he should receive advice of a more expensive and eminent character than a poor man would have received under similar circumstances.

Mr. HEALY: Mr. Shaen Carter's was blue blood.

Mr. LEAMY said, they were told that Mr. Shaen Carter was lying at the time somewhere in the neighbourhood of Belmullett; but there was a poorhouse there, with a medical man in charge of it—a man who for a salary of £100 a-year had to attend upon thousands of patients and to travel, perhaps, hundreds and hundreds of miles in the course of the year. Why was not that official appealed to? It appeared to him (Mr. Leamy) that this matter also required some explanation. He should like to know who was responsible? He did not suppose that it was the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, unfortunately, the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was not in Office at the time. Let him suppose, however, that instead of Mr. Shaen Carter a poor herd of his or a bailiff had been shot at and wounded, would the Government have thought it right to send down Surgeon Wheeler to attend him? No, they would not have taken any such course; and it certainly appeared to him that in acting as they had done in the case of Mr. Shaen Carter, they had indulged in a most extraordinary waste of money. Hon. Members knew that under the Prevention of Crime Act a landlord's life was valued at a much higher figure than a bailiff's, and it appeared to him to be a great mistake to administer legislative enactments in this way. It had a tendency to induce ignorant men to believe that a landlord's life was more valuable than a peasant's; but in the sight of God and man the life of the poorest peasant was as valuable as that of Mr. Shaen Carter. To refer again to the case of Mrs. Colgan, the Government had agreed to grant her £250. It was no use for the Irish Members to ask that the grant should be increased, he knew, and it was not in their power to move an increase; but he would ask why had the Government allowed 16 or 17 years to elapse before they gave this money to the woman? Did they not think that the woman having been in poverty for so long deserved a larger sum? £500 had been handed over in trust for her to an agent of the Government, and the Government should be responsible for his default. They knew that their agent had betrayed the trust they had imposed upon him, and the least they might do, he thought, would be to make up the original amount. God knew, they spent money enough on wars, and in murdering people who never did them any wrong. They could easily spare a few pounds for this poor woman, whose money had been embezzled by their agent, and who had never wronged them in any way.

MR. HEALY said, the woman had now been done out of her money for a considerable period, and he would like to make an earnest appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject. Here was a poor woman whose life had been attempted by her husband. She escaped the poison, and the Government spoke of their not forfeiting the husband's property as an act of grace. They allowed her the £500—her own property. He felt bound to appeal to the Government to consider the case of this poor old wretched woman now far advanced in years. Was it at all a fair thing, seeing the way in which she had lost her money, to keep her out of the small balance? He hoped it would be borne in mind that since the year 1868 she had been deprived of the interest she would have been entitled to upon it, and that, in itself, amounted to a considerable sum. He therefore appealed to the Government to wipe out the matter altogether, and hand over to this poor woman the remainder of the sum to which she was fairly entitled.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I know nothing whatever of this case; but I will ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to send me over the full particulars, and I will see what will be proper to do in the matter.

MR. O'BRIEN thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the offer he had made, and would express a wish that the spirit manifested by the right hon. Gentleman might be extended to the whole of the Treasury Bench. He was afraid that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had given a very inadequate excuse for sending a special Dublin surgeon, at a very high expense, to the extreme end of the County Mayo. The hon. and learned Gentleman told them that Mr. Shaen Carter was poor; but it would appear that he had obtained compensation under the Prevention of Crime Act for the injury he had sustained, and the least that could be expected from him was that he would give some contribution towards his doctor's bill. Surely, the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that it was quite possible to obtain medical assistance at Belmullett, and so far there had been no explanation given of any difficulty in Mr. Shaen Carter's case which required special surgical treatment, and which no local doctor could have dealt with. Why should it have been necessary to procure the assistance of a fashionable doctor from Dublin, with a fee of £100 a visit, and his travelling expenses for many miles? Unfortunately, many other persons were required to undergo serious surgical operations without any expense to Her Majesty's Government. As a matter of fact, the chance of Mr. Shaen Carter's recovery must have been somewhat diminished rather than increased by having to wait for surgical attendance until this gentleman could be brought down from Dublin to a place 40 miles from the nearest railway station. Even had it been necessary to obtain the services of a Dublin doctor, it must have been possible to have obtained one at a far less expense. He was afraid that the officials in Ireland were used to such liberal pickings themselves that they thought very little of a charge of £100 more or less, here or there, when it had to come out of the public money. It was perfectly evident that for at least £500 of the sum which had been wasted Mr. Hamilton was responsible, and he did not see why that gentleman should not be asked to relieve the country of the burden, and pay it out of his own salary, seeing that this huge bill of costs had arisen out of his bungling. He protested altogether against the principle of sending down doctors to the relief of wounded landlords. The Government had more than once lent their troops to enforce the demands of the landlords, and he thought that was sufficient partizanship to display. Mr. Shaen Carter had been exercising the very stringent rights of a landlord, and, judging from the statement of the Solicitor General for Ireland himself, he must have exercised them in a manner which, to a considerable extent, would account for the feeling entertained towards him in the county of Mayo. At all events, it was not because a man was a landlord, or because he was a bad landlord, that the Government was to pay his doctor's bill for him when he came to any harm. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had reminded the House that a poor girl in this very district of Belmullett had a bayonet driven through her breast by a policeman; but, in that case, did the Government send down a Dublin doctor to look after her? No provision whatever was made for her by the Ministry; and if this expenditure in the case of Mr. Shaen Carter was to be provided for by Parliament, every landlord in the country who was attacked by an exasperated people would have a right to the payment of his doctor's bill. There would be an appeal made to the Government by every bailiff and land grabber who happened to come to grief in the pursuit of his calling. From every aspect this payment was indefensible, and he appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland to assign some sort of reason why Mr. Shaen Carter had been selected for this anomalous expenditure. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to announce that Mr. Hamilton himself was clearly responsible to the extent at least of £500 of this money, notwithstanding the fact that the only punishment which had been visited upon Mr. Hamilton for his delinquency had been to promote him to the position of a Resident Magistrate in the North of Ireland. Certainly, he failed to see why this gentleman should not be made to pay at least £500 from the liberal profits he had made out of the disturbances in Ireland during the last few years.

Mr. Leamy

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that no one could know or be able to answer questions as to what the particular reasons were which induced the late Mr. Burke to send Surgeon Wheeler to attend Mr. Shaen Carter. It must, however, be borne in mind that the circumstance occurred at a time of considerable excitement, and, no doubt, Mr. Burke had reasons which were sufficient to justify him in the course he took. At the same time, it was an extreme course, and there was no likelihood that such a course would be taken again. The Government themselves, by the course they had taken, showed that, in their opinion, it was a very extravagant proceeding. Nevertheless, these liabilities had been incurred, and they had to be met. It was stated by the hon. Member who spoke last that Mr. Hamilton ought to pay the money. Now, Mr. Hamilton was Assistant Secretary to Mr. Burke, and he was present at some of the conversations which occurred between Dr. Wheeler and Mr. Burke. When the trial came on Dr. Wheeler brought forward certain facts in reference to what had taken place. Mr. Hamilton was asked—"How are you going to contradict those statements?" He said at once—"I have no recollection of them; but I am not in a position to go into the witness-box and say that they did not really occur." No doubt, most hon. Members might occasionally find themselves in the same position. They could speak to the best of their recollection, but they were not in a position to swear as to certain facts. That was the whole state of the case. It must be borne in mind that it was not Mr. Hamilton who sent out Dr. Wheeler, but that he was simply acting at that time as the quasi-Assistant Secretary of Mr. Burke. If Mr. Burke had lived, he would, no doubt, have been able to explain the whole of this unfortunate matter. The only thing the Government could do under the circumstances was to come to the House of Commons for payment of these expenses, and he did not see what other course was open to them. So far as the sending down of an eminent doctor to a distant part of the country was concerned, that could only be a matter for future consideration in the event of a similar case arising.

MR. KENNY said, he understood that the circumstances under which the Government sent Surgeon Wheeler down were these—that in the event of Mr. Shaen Carter not being able to afford to pay the bill of Surgeon Wheeler, the Government would then be liable for the debt. He wished to know how it was that the Government ascertained the inability of Mr. Shaen Carter to discharge the debt? He had had his rents reduced, it was true; but he had received compensation, and one item ought to be set against the other. He (Mr. Kenny) must confess that the Government had acted very unwisely in rendering themselves liable for the expenses incurred in sending Surgeon Wheeler down, and he thought they had endeavoured to get out of the difficulty in which they were placed in a very clumsy manner. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised to take into consideration the case of Mrs. Colgan. He (Mr. Kenny) understood that the man who had certainly swindled Mrs. Colgan was a man named Jeremiah Meara, who was the Crown Solicitor at the time. Now, he understood that the Crown Solicitor was still a man of the same name—Jeremiah Meara. It was not the same man, he believed, but the one was the son of the other. If that were really so, he should like to know how it was that a son of the swindler came to be appointed to the position which the father, who committed the swindle, originally occupied? If the present Crown Solicitor was the son of the person who swindled Mrs. Colgan, why not ask him to refund the money of which his father, beyond all doubt, had swindled Mrs. Colgan? He simply put this forward as a suggestion. The Law Officers knew that they had some sort of authority over the Crown Solicitor, and they might so use it as to secure from him the payment of the particular damage which his father had done.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), in introducing the subject, had raised a point which had almost been lost sight of in the valuable discussion which had since occurred. A great deal of the objection of the Irish Members to the Vote of £1,147 for the medical attendance upon Mr. Shaen Carter was founded, not merely upon the large amount of the Vote itself, but upon the contrast the Vote afforded to the action of the Government in reference to other persons. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated, with his usual courtesy, that he would look into the case of Eliza Colgan. He was perfectly sure that if many other cases were brought under the notice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, justice would be done without hesitation. This was not a political matter; but the question was what the people would feel when they were told that £1,147 had been expended in medical costs upon a single landlord who was well able to pay for himself, while not 1*d.* was given to another unfortunate creature, or her family, who had been subjected to the deepest privations in consequence of her husband having been required to undergo the horrors of penal servitude for two years for a crime of which he was as innocent as any man in that House. That was the main ground of the complaint of the Irish Members against the Government for this excessive payment. He thought the action of the Government in sanctioning the payment of £1,147 for Mr. Shaen Carter, a landlord with a regular income, slightly reduced, no doubt, but still a regular income, and in the receipt of blood-money besides, was highly reprehensible. The idea that the Government should pay a doctor, under these circumstances, the large sum of £1,147, while the wife and children of an innocent convict were kept without 1*d.* of compensation for a crime he had never committed, was simply monstrous. He thought the contrast in the treatment of the two individuals was most instructive, but, at the same time, it was most scandalous. He found another item in the Votes of £4 11*s.* 1*d.* for a gold medal presented to Dr. Dutrieux for services rendered during the cholera epidemic in Egypt. It reminded him of one of the instructive essays of Mr. Herbert Spencer, who pointed out the contrast between the splendid statues erected in prominent parts of the Metropolis to Sir Henry Havelock, and similar persons, for military services, and that which was given to a national and universal benefactor like Sir William Jenner in an unfrequented part of the Metropolis sacred to nursery-maids and their military admirers. The sum of £4 11s. 1d. was presented in the shape of a medal to an eminent man who had rendered great services during the cholera epidemic in Egypt, while the same Vote contained an item of £1,174 for a Dublin doctor who had been called in to attend an Irish landlord with a few slugs in his leg. And this was not all. The same Vote contained an item for £548 for fees in connection with the exhibition of banners, helmets, and swords upon the installation of His Royal Highness Prince George Frederick Ernest Albert of Wales, and £1,000 for an equipage allowance to Mr. Speaker. What a contrast that afforded to the treatment of Brian Kilmartin, who had been kept for two years in penal servitude under the terrible imputation of attempted assassination. He sincerely hoped that some sort of explanation would be given of these anomalous circumstances.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Mr. GRAY said, he desired to call attention to an item included in the Vote of £71 12s. 11d. for repayment in respect of forfeited Post Office Savings Banks' deposits. Some years ago, he had called the attention of the then Postmaster General to the system of forfeiting Post Office deposits when they exceeded the legal amount. It had sometimes occurred that a man, under a mistaken notion that he could deposit his money more safely in the Post Office Savings Bank, opened an account in two offices. The maximum sum a man could deposit was, at that time, £200; but he thought it had now been increased to £250; and sometimes a man, without knowing that he was doing anything illegal or wrong—or even supposing he was doing wrong—without being acquainted with the penalty, opened two accounts in two separate Post Offices. In such a case, if the depositor died, and it was discovered that his accounts exceeded the maximum, every single deposit he had made was forfeited, and the family of the depositor were deprived of the savings of a lifetime. It appeared that in this particular case it was intended to refund to some person a sum of £71 12s. 11d. He wanted to know if that indicated an intention on the part of the Government not to appropriate the savings of these poor men again, or to deprive their families of them? He should be glad to learn what the Vote meant, if it did not mean that.

Mr. HIBBERT said, this was the case of a man named Patrick Kelly, who opened two accounts on the same day, one in his own name, and one in the name of William Kelly. This fact was reported to the Solicitor of the Post Office, and after inquiring into it, he came to the conclusion that the two accounts were opened with a fraudulent intention. It was subsequently discovered that the man acted through ignorance in opening the two accounts, and that he was not aware that he was breaking the law in doing so. The Treasury, after considering the matter, decided upon requiring the forfeit of the smaller account of £12 16s., and upon repaying the amount of £71 12s. 11d. which had been deposited in another office. He thought that a very fair consideration had been shown in allowing the larger amount to be refunded, and only forfeiting the smaller one.

Mr. GRAY asked, if he was to understand that, where a man in ignorance, and without intending to do wrong, opened an account in two offices, the Crown proposed to take advantage of the man's ignorance and to forfeit his deposit? Was that the statement which the hon. Gentleman made? They had now heard from the hon. Gentleman's own lips that the man had acted in ignorance, and yet they were going to forfeit the £12 he had deposited.

Mr. HIBBERT said, the hon. Member (Mr. Gray) had misrepresented what he had stated. He had stated that, although the man had acted in ignorance, he had used the name of another person in order to open a second account. The Treasury had fully considered the circumstances, and they felt that, after the course which had been taken, they ought to inflict a certain amount of penalty; and, therefore, they had required the man to forfeit the smaller amount.

Mr. O'KELLY asked, by what right the Government undertook to appropriate this sum of £12, which did not belong to them?

Mr. HIBBERT said, that, as a matter of fact, they had the right of forfeiting both sums.

Mr. O'KELLY said, the hon. Gentleman admitted that the man acted in ignorance, and did not know there was any penalty. [Mr. HIBBERT: That was so.] The contention of the Government was that the man was entitled to the £71 odd; and he failed to understand on what ground they appropriated the remaining £12 if the man had acted in ignorance, and was not aware that he was doing wrong. If the Government really considered that the transaction ought to be practically wiped out, and that they were bound to return the man the larger sum of £71 odd, upon what ground could they appropriate the other £12? It was equally the man's money. It did not belong to the Government, and in appropriating it they were simply stealing it.

Mr. GRAY said, there still remained a question which he thought the hon. Gentleman would recognize as of some little importance. Cases of great hardship had come under his notice in which the Treasury had put this rule into operation after the death of the depositors, thereby punishing innocent persons. This was a case in which there was undoubtedly a hardship, and the hardship was shown by the facts he had elicited from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert). The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had that day, in replying to a Question addressed to him, said that he would be glad to consider any proposition by which he would be able to make up the probable deficit in the Budget of the year. Surely the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to make it up in this way. If this man had acted with a fraudulent intention, he could understand the Treasury declaring that they would take the entire amount; but when he found that they were ready to refund £71, it plainly showed that, in the belief of the Treasury, there was no fraudulent intention. As a general rule, persons who deposited money in the Post Office Savings Bank were not highly educated or intelligent; and seeing that in this case there was no fraudulent intention, he thought it was as highly culpable on the part of the Government to appropriate £12 of this money as it would have been to have appropriated the £71. The Government acknowledged that they had no moral right to do so, because they were going to refund it, although he granted that, technically, they had a legal right. But they had the same legal right to the £71 as they had to the £12, and the £12 was as much the man's property as the larger sum, and he had as much right to it. He did not think it was worthy of a great nation to avail themselves of a technical mistake of this kind, even if a man had attempted a little bit of sharp practice, and tried to get $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent more than he would otherwise have been able to procure. He did not think it was worthy of a great nation to appropriate money in this fashion; and he hoped the Government would take the matter into consideration, and not act in this extremely harsh manner in confiscating the property of poor persons who might, through ignorance, or through an attempt to be a little too clever, commit a technical illegality.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he did not think that the inference drawn by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Gray) followed from what his hon. Friend (Mr. Hibbert) had stated. Here was a man who on the same day deposited money in two different names in two different Post Office Savings Banks. It was not disputed that he had done so, and that he was liable to have both sums forfeited. The circumstances having been inquired into, it was considered a sufficient punishment for the offence committed that the man should forfeit the smaller amount deposited.

Mr. GRAY said, he had heard the explanation given, and understood the question thoroughly. It was clear that if the Crown believed that this man had had a fraudulent intention, they would not have refunded any of the money, because, in that case, the money would have been very properly forfeited. It was perfectly plain, then, that the Crown knew there was no fraudulent intention, and that the man had acted with a perfectly innocent intention. He would have gained nothing by this double deposit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the man admitted that he deposited the two amounts in order that he might get a pecuniary advantage to which he knew he was not legally entitled.

Mr. GRAY said that, even if he could have gained 1 per cent in this way more than he could have obtained from an ordinary bank, he thought it was an extremely harsh rule that the money should have been forfeited. It was unworthy of a great nation to aggrandise its finances by this rule under which the right hon. Gentleman considered himself justified in taking the money in question. He ventured to say that if this money had come into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman in his private capacity, although he might have a legal right, he would feel that he had no moral right to it.

Mr. O'Kelly

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, it was not a matter of rule, but a matter of law. They had tried to administer the law, as it seemed to them, fairly in the present case.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the law in this case was like the bye-laws of the Railway Companies, who were constantly making them of their own mere notion, and who appeared to think that, having done so, they were entitled to deprive passengers of their property. If the law was as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, he thought that the sooner it was amended the better. Assuming the worst, the man could gain very little in this transaction; he could gain no more than $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on £12 or £14; and because he had endeavoured to do that he was by law to be deprived of the principal sum. He agreed with the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) that the justice and equity of the case would be met if the man were deprived of the percentage only.

MR. HIBBERT said, that hon. Members who had drawn attention to this case had found fault with the Government for allowing the money to be repaid. The fact was that the Treasury, taking a compassionate view of the matter, allowed the smaller sum only to be forfeited. He pointed out that if they had chosen to do so, the Government might have left the case in the hands of the Post Office to settle, and not laid it before the House at all.

MR. GRAY said, he did not at all find fault with the money being refunded. He had called attention to the matter in order to express his hope that this precedent would not be followed in other cases, and that cases which he might direct attention to in future would be treated by the Government in a different spirit. His objection was not that in the present case the £12 had been forfeited, but that there had been any forfeiture at all.

MR. HEALY said, that in this matter the Government had the banking interest to consider. He would like to know what the hon. Baronet the Member for the London University (Sir John Lubbock) would have said on this question had he been present? He thought that the banking interest was too strong for the Government. There was a point he desired to raise, and which he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to consider. It appeared that the taxpayers had paid no less a sum than £1,500 on account of Mr. Shaen Carter's injuries; and he asked whether that sum could be made to repay the whole, or any portion, of the sum of £1,100 paid to Surgeon Wheeler by the Government for attendance upon Mr. Carter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, it was clear that the £1,500 could in no way be resorted to for the purpose of recouping the Government. Mr. Shaen Carter would not be liable.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 35: Majority 35. — (Div. List, No. 56.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

£3,533,650, Vote on Account, Civil Services and Revenue Departments, viz.:—

CIVIL SERVICES.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

Great Britain:—	£
Royal Palaces	6,000
Marlborough House	1,000
Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds	20,000
Houses of Parliament	10,000
Public Buildings	30,000
New Admiralty and War Office	3,000
Furniture of Public Offices	2,000
Revenue Department Buildings	50,000
County Court Buildings	6,000
Metropolitan Police Courts	1,500
Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland	2,000
Surveys of the United Kingdom	50,000
Science and Art Department Buildings	3,000
British Museum Buildings	2,000
Harbours, &c. under Board of Trade	2,500
Rates on Government Property (Great Britain and Ireland)	80,000
Metropolitan Fire Brigade	2,500
Interrupted and Main Roads (England and Wales)	20,000
Interrupted Roads (Scotland)	5,000

1879	Supply—	{ COMMONS }	Civil Services.	1880
Ireland :—		£		£
Public Buildings	30,000		County Courts	20,000
Royal University Buildings ..	4,000		Land Registry	1,000
Science and Art Buildings, Dublin ..	2,000		Revising Barristers, England ..	—
Abroad :—			Police Courts (London and Sheerness) ..	3,000
Lighthouses Abroad	2,000		Metropolitan Police	100,000
Diplomatic and Consular Buildings ..	5,000		Special Police	5,000
CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.			County and Borough Police, Great Britain	1,000
England :—			Convict Establishments in England and the Colonies	80,000
House of Lords, Offices	6,000		Prisons, England	60,000
House of Commons, Offices	6,000		Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain	70,000
Treasury, including Parliamentary Coun- ..	10,000		Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum ..	5,000
Home Office and Subordinate Depart- ..	15,000		Scotland :—
Foreign Office	10,000		Lord Advocate, and Criminal Pro- ..	10,000
Colonial Office	0,000		Courts of Law and Justice	5,000
Privy Council Office and Subordinate ..	7,000		Register House Departments	4,000
Board of Trade and Subordinate ..	25,000		Prisons, Scotland	15,000
Bankruptcy Department of the Board of ..	500		Ireland :—
Charity Commission (including Endowed ..	7,000		Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions ..	15,000
Civil Service Commission	6,000		Supreme Court of Judicature	15,000
Exchequer and Audit Department	9,000		Court of Bankruptcy	1,500
Friendly Societies, Registry	1,500		Admiralty Court Registry	200
Land Commission for England	4,000		Registry of Deeds	3,000
Local Government Board	40,000		Registry of Judgments	500
Lunacy Commission	2,500		Land Commission	15,000
Mint (including Coinage)	20,000		County Court Officers, &c.	15,000
National Debt Office	2,500		Dublin Metropolitan Police (including ..	30,000
Patent Office	7,000		Police Courts)	250,000
Paymaster General's Office	4,500		Constabulary	30,000
Public Works Loan Commission	1,500		Prisons, Ireland	25,000
Record Office	4,000		Reformatory and Industrial Schools ..	1,500
Registrar General's Office	8,000		Dundrum Criminal Lunatic Asylum ..	—
Stationery Office and Printing	90,000		CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART.
Woods, Forests, &c. Office of	4,000		England :—
Works and Public Buildings, Office of ..	8,000		Public Education	600,000
Mercantile Marine Fund, Grant in Aid ..	—		Science and Art Department	50,000
Secret Service	10,000		British Museum	30,000
Scotland :—			National Gallery	1,000
Exchequer and other Offices	500		National Portrait Gallery	400
Fishery Board	2,500		Learned Societies, &c.	3,500
Lunacy Commission	1,000		London University	2,000
Registrar General's Office	1,000		University Colleges, Wales	—
Board of Supervision	3,000		Deep Sea Exploring Expedition (Re- ..	1,000
Ireland :—			port)	50
Lord Lieutenant's Household	1,000		Scotland :—
Chief Secretary's Office	6,500		Public Education	120,000
Charitable Donations and Bequests Office ..	300		Universities, &c.	2,000
Local Government Board	10,000		National Gallery	400
Public Works Office	10,000		Ireland :—
Record Office	1,000		Public Education	150,000
Registrar General's Office	3,000		Teachers' Pension Office	500
Valuation and Boundary Survey	6,000		Endowed Schools Commissioners	200
CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.			National Gallery	300
England :—			Queen's Colleges	500
Law Charges	7,000		Royal Irish Academy	100
Criminal Prosecutions	—		CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES.
Supreme Court of Judicature	70,000		Diplomatic Services	60,000
Wreck Commission	2,500		Consular Services	40,000

	£
Slave Trade Services	1,000
Suez Canal (British Directors) ..	400
Colonies, Grants in Aid	8,000
South Africa and St. Helena ..	10,000
Subsidies to Telegraph Companies ..	9,000
Cyprus, Grant in Aid	-

CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES.

Superannuation and Retired Allowances	120,000
Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c.	1,000
Pauper Lunatics, England	-
Pauper Lunatics, Scotland	-
Pauper Lunatics, Ireland	50,000
Hospitals and Infirmarys, Ireland ..	4,000
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies	-
Deficiency	-
Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Great Britain	500
Miscellaneous Charitable and other Allowances, Ireland	600

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

Temporary Commissions	8,000
Miscellaneous Expenses	2,500

Total for Civil Services .. £2,463,650

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Customs	100,000
Inland Revenue	100,000
Post Office	100,000
Post Office Packet Service	20,000
Post Office Telegraphs	350,000

Total for Revenue Departments £870,000

Grand Total .. £3,333,650

THE CONSTABULARY (IRELAND)—THE FREE FORCE.

MR. PARNELL said, that the question he was about to address to the Treasury Bench was one which might more properly be put to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, yet the right hon. Gentleman, not having been in Office at the time to which he was about to refer, was not so well acquainted with the circumstances of the case as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and, as a matter of fact, was not responsible. Indeed, he (Mr. Parnell) might say that neither he nor the late Chief Secretary for Ireland were responsible for the subject of his inquiry, since the latter had practically left Office at the time—that was to say, his health having failed, he did not attend the House, and the duties of his Office consequently devolved on the hon. and learned Gentleman. The question he wished to ask the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland was this. What had become of the Bill which he promised, last August, he would introduce at the commencement of the Session, for the purpose of enabling the Lord Lieutenant to distribute the Free Police Force every three years, instead of quinquennially? The hon. and learned Gentleman would recollect the circumstance now that he called it to his mind. He would remember that, in consequence of the discussion which took place in Committee upon the Vote for the Irish Constabulary, the Government, through the mouth of the hon. and learned Gentleman, were induced to promise, in the event of Lord Spencer assenting, that power should be taken to enable Lord Spencer to distribute the men of the Free Force up to the amount they were entitled to by Act of Parliament. He (Mr. Parnell) then pointed out that the strength of the Free Force was some 500 or 600 officers and men under the full amount, and that, in consequence of the Free Force not being up to its full strength, the extra police in Ireland were very much swollen in numbers. The arguments used by himself and his hon. Friends produced such an impression on the Irish Government that the hon. and learned Gentleman afterwards promised to introduce a non-contentious Bill, which should be passed through Parliament, for the purpose of enabling the Lord Lieutenant to redistribute every three years, instead of five years—that was to say, for the purpose of enabling him to distribute the Free Force at once. He had been expecting all through the Session to see a Notice given by the hon. and learned Gentleman to introduce this non-contentious Bill; but his patience had not been rewarded, for no such Notice had appeared. Therefore, he begged leave to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman what had become of this Bill; why he did not give Notice of its introduction; whether he intended to give Notice of its introduction; and whether he could give any explanation of the delay which had taken place? He would be glad to hear the Solicitor General for Ireland on all these points, and he would remind him that he received value in advance for the consideration of this Bill. At a period of the Session when time was of great value to the Government, Irish Members gave up their right to continue the discussion, on the promise of the Prime Minister that it should be discussed on Report, and that the Report on the said Vote should not be brought on after half-past 11 at night. Of course, the Government yielded to the justice of their claim; but, at the same time, they received a valuable consideration from Irish Members. Having previously given up their right to discuss the Vote in Committee, they afterwards gave up their right to discuss it on Report, in order to allow the Prime Minister to make a statement in regard to foreign affairs. Now, he would just refer to the statement of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, made on the Report of Supply. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that—

“When this Vote was under consideration an argument was brought forward by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in reference to the number of police for Ireland, as fixed by Act of Parliament; and the complaint was made that the free force was not fully distributed among the counties and cities of Ireland, and that, in consequence, a great grievance was imposed on the country. Now, the argument of the hon. Member had since that time been very carefully considered by him (Mr. Walker); and he confessed that it appeared to him that if it was a fact, as had been stated, that the free force of 10,000 men, over and above the ordinary vacancies taken at 5 per cent, was not really distributed, it was a case for favourable consideration; and, consequently, he was prepared to recommend that a communication should be made to the Lord Lieutenant to that effect. If it were found to be the fact that the free force was not fully distributed, the matter could only be remedied by legislation, because there was no means of remedying it, except at the quinquennial redistribution, which would not take place before 1887. If the grievance existed, legislation would be introduced for the purpose, and he would be prepared to introduce a provision, making the redistribution triennial instead of quinquennial, as at present. To give effect to the arrangement, a Supplementary Estimate would be brought forward by the Secretary to the Treasury.”—
(3 Hansard, [192] 232-3.)

Upon that statement it would be in the recollection of hon. Members that the Vote was allowed to go through. Up to the present time nothing further had been heard about the matter. The understanding was that the Government would have introduced the Bill during the Winter Session of Parliament were it not that they had pledged themselves to the position only to convene the Session for the purpose of passing the Franchise Bill, and that no other Government legislation should be brought forward. Therefore, no steps were taken during the Winter Session; but since then the new Session had practically recommenced, and he had been waiting to see the hon. and learned Gentleman introduce the Bill, and redeem his promise for the purpose of putting a stop to imposts on the Irish people which they were unable to pay.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he remembered the promise he made. The Bill might have been introduced within the last week; but it had not been brought in owing to the backward state of other Business before the House. He would, however, be prepared to give Notice of it within the next few days, and lay it on the Table of the House.

MR. PARNELL: Will it be confined to that point, or will other matter be introduced in it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I will explain the provisions of the Bill fully when it is laid on the Table of the House.

MR. PARNELL said, he should like to be informed upon the point now. He did not wish to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to enter into the details of the Bill; but when this matter was being discussed last August it was distinctly understood—it was expressed in fact—that the Bill should be a non-contentious Bill. If the Government were going to introduce matter other than the alteration of the redistribution of the police from a quinquennial to a triennial term, he maintained that the promise of the hon. and learned Gentleman would not be kept. If other matter, repugnant and odious to him (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends, and which they should feel compelled to oppose, were introduced in the Bill, it would be impossible for the measure to be passed this Session, or, at all events, a very long delay would take place before it was passed; whereas if the Government fulfilled their pledge in its spirit and its letter, and introduced a non-contentious Bill, it would not be blocked on that side of the House, and he should imagine by nobody on the other side of the House, since hon. Gentlemen were under the control of the Leaders on the front Ministerial Bench. This was a matter, in his opinion, which was capable of a plain answer; would the Bill in question be confined to the single point connected with the alteration of the term from five years to three years; or was it the intention of the Irish Government to take advantage of the promise made to him, to try and force down their throats matters foreign to the particular subject under discussion when the promise was made, matters which were repugnant to them, and which would necessarily compel them to prevent—if it was in their power—the passing of the Bill?

Mr. Parnell

Mr. HEALY said, it was to be regretted that the Government had not put at once a stop to this discussion. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had stated a matter which involved the public faith, not only of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), but of the Prime Minister. Surely such a matter was not to be tampered with lightly. It would be in the recollection of every Member of the Committee that when, at 6 o'clock on a Saturday Sitting last August, it was necessary for the Government to make a statement with regard to Egyptian Finance, the Committee were discussing the Irish Constabulary Vote, and the Irish Members agreed to allow Progress to be reported at that hour—because everybody in the House and in the country was anxious to know what was the result of the Conference of the European Powers which had just concluded its labours. He and his hon. Friends agreed to allow Progress to be reported on the distinct understanding that the Vote would be brought up on Report before 11 o'clock at night. An arrangement, however, was come to between the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork, who was always extremely anxious to prevent anything like discussion if matters could be arranged without it, and the Government, the latter agreeing that they would bring in a Bill to reduce the term from five years to three years. That was a square arrangement, and thoroughly understood by every Member of the House and by the Government. It was understood that the Bill should be brought in at the earliest possible moment, and that it should be confined to two points. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman), both of whom were anxious that the quinquennial term should be reduced to a triennial term, approved of the arrangement—indeed, it was approved on all sides. What was now found? The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork asked whether the promise was to be fulfilled, and he could not get an answer. He (Mr. Healy) really did think that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland Mr. Walker ought to be able to give, on this point, the most straightforward answer. If the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister were in his place, he would not hesitate for a moment to give an answer. The noble Lord the Member for Flint (Lord Richard Grosvenor), who was now present, thoroughly understood what the arrangement was. Why did he not now get up and state what his impression was? He (Mr. Healy) grieved to have to say it, but his experience was that if he and his hon. Friends ever came to an understanding with a Member of the Irish Government, they were sure to find that the Gentleman they had been dealing with was overruled—in fact, he could do nothing, unless he had a Member of the English Government by his side. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) would bear him out when he said that last year an agreement was come to in order to enable a statement to be made with regard to the Egyptian Conference; that the Irish Members allowed Progress to be reported; that they afterwards allowed the Vote to be taken; and that, subsequently, an arrangement was come to that, if they forewent the discussion on the Report of Supply, the Bill would be introduced to reduce the term from a quinquennial to a triennial one. Now, they asked if the Bill was to be introduced in a non-contentious form, and they could not get a straightforward answer. Was that the way to treat hon. Members? Unquestionably, it was understood that the Bill was to be inoffensive, and that all sides would agree to it. He could not say what the Government wished to put in the Bill; but it did look very evident that an agreement honourably made was now about to be broken by the Government. He appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to save the time of the House by getting up and saying whether the agreement come to with the Prime Minister was to be kept.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that he was not personally aware what the agreement or understanding of last Session was; indeed, he did not know that an agreement had been arrived at. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends seemed to attach considerable importance to the understanding, especially to what they maintained was the fact, that the legislation was to be embodied in a Bill by itself. ["A consent Bill!"] A consent Bill! There was no such thing as a consent Bill. They never could tell what part of the Bill might give rise to dissent. But he would undertake, at all events, to look into what occurred, and see if any such understanding was expressed. Now they were asked to state what the nature of the Bill was that they contemplated bringing in. It was a most unusual thing to be asked to do that, when the Bill was to be brought in within a day or two. Hon. Members had only to wait until the Bill was introduced; then they would become acquainted with all its provisions. They had been told that it was impossible to get a straightforward answer, and that no bargain could be made by a Member of the Irish Government, unless there was a Member of the English Government by his side. He assured hon. Gentlemen that that was not the case, and he could also assure them that there was no intention of breaking any agreement which had been arrived at. It would, however, be most unusual for the Government to state what the provisions of a Bill which had not been introduced were.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very sorry he could not accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) as a satisfactory one. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that he did not know, not having been in Office at the time, what the nature of the promise of the Government was. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not know; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), who was sitting by the right hon. Gentleman's side, did know. Would the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland get up, and state that he (Mr. Parnell) had or had not given a correct account of what took place? He (Mr. Parnell) had stated two things; first of all, that the Government agreed to take into consideration the fact as to whether there was this shortcoming regarding the number of the Free Force; and, secondly, if they found it was so, they would introduce not only a Bill, but a Supplementary Estimate, to remedy the grievance. Now, that was his first statement; and his second statement was that it was expressly stated at the time by the Solicitor General for Ireland that both the Bill and the Estimate were to be non-contentious. He did not ask—indeed, it would have been unfair to expect—the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to answer either of these questions, or to assent to these propositions; but it was not unfair to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, who, at the time, was acting for the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), and who made the promise in question, who took part in the proceeding, and who, in fact, was the Irish Executive, to whom he (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends had to look—it was not unfair to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether the two statements he (Mr. Parnell) had made formed a true representation of the facts of the case; and whether, if they did, would the Bill be introduced in accordance with those facts? Now, this was a question for plain dealing, and for plain statement. He submitted that without going into the merits of the Bill, of which Notice had not been given, without departing from any of the customs which were usual in discussing Estimates, the Solicitor General for Ireland was bound to answer the question now put to him. The hon. and learned Gentleman was in a position to say whether his (Mr. Parnell's) account of the affair was correct or not, and he was also in a position to say whether he would carry out the pledges he made—carry them out in their spirit, and in their letter. The hon. and learned Gentleman might not consider himself a free agent in this matter; but he (Mr. Parnell) asserted that nobody was free to break his word, and that, however subordinate the position of the hon. and learned Gentleman might be to a higher authority in Ireland, he ought not to allow himself to be placed in a position of refusing to carry out a distinct agreement—an agreement which he must know perfectly well was entered into. In dealing with Irish officials, he (Mr. Parnell) did not know on what they could depend, if they were to be treated in this way. He did not know what they were to depend upon, if they could not depend upon plain declarations, or upon plain assurances, made both in and out of the House, and in this case they had had both in abundance. There was no doubt whatever in the mind of the hon. and learned Gentleman at the time of the occurrence. Any doubt that had arisen since had arisen in consequence of the action of somebody else besides himself. He believed that if the hon. and learned Gentleman had been left to himself, he would, as an honourable Irishman, have repeated the intention of fulfilling that which he promised. The engagement and the understanding was a perfectly distinct one, and there could be no doubt whatever as to the merits of the case. He (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. Friends were strongly supported from the Conservative Benches. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) supported them from the Front Opposition Bench; and that right hon. Gentleman was very much annoyed that, during his absence, they, in consequence of the promise given them by the Solicitor General for Ireland, allowed the Report of the Vote to be taken. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) also supported them, and thought they were fools to trust to the Punic promise of the Government. He (Mr. Parnell) submitted that they ought not to be put off with the evasion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. Either his (Mr. Parnell's) account of the transaction was a correct one, or it was incorrect. If it were incorrect, the hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to point out in what respect it was incorrect; and he could, if he would, say whether he intended to fulfil his pledge as to the introduction of the Bill.

Mr. Hooley

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he would certainly carry out to the full, not only what was stated in his promise, but what was implied. He had not, however, heard the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) read from Hansard anything relating to the promised Bill being a non-contentious Bill. [Mr. PARNELL: Oh, but you made other statements.] That matter never entered into his mind. He (Mr. Walker) did not say it might not have been the understanding of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork; but the matter certainly never entered his (Mr. Walker's) mind, one way or the other, except as he stated—and his words were very faithfully and carefully reported in Hansard. If what the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork had said was implied from his words, he (Mr. Walker) would certainly not withdraw from his words. He would read over the report of the debate in Hansard again; and if he saw that the agreement, as stated by the hon. Gentleman, was either expressed or implied, he should certainly abide by it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he was present on the occasion to which his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) referred; and he could say that nothing was more clearly understood than that a Bill would be brought in by the Government applicable to the particular case of the distribution of the Constabulary Force. Whether it was expressed or not, it was certainly understood that the Bill would be brought in for that purpose alone. In his opinion, if the Bill were to be brought in uniting that purpose with another purpose, there would be a deliberate breach of the engagement.

MR. SEXTON said, that this conversation illustrated the extreme difficulty he and his hon. Friends found in securing attention to the most reasonable claims they made. If they asked why a claim for compensation was made in the Estimates, they were told that an official had run away; if they asked why the Government resisted the claim of a surgeon for attending upon a landlord, they were told that the official concerned in the matter was dead; if they claimed the performance of a promise made last year, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) rose at the Table, and, beginning by a statement that he was not in Office, and therefore not responsible at the time the engagement was made, proceeded to endeavour a second time to put them off on this question by a perfectly hollow plea. That right hon. Gentleman told them to wait until the Bill was brought in, and then they would be able to ascertain its provisions. This was the second time these tactics had been adopted on this question. They were told last Session that if they would allow the Vote to be passed they would see this would happen—that a Bill would be brought in to meet their views. Hon. Gentlemen knew how eager the Government were at the fag-end of the Session to get through their Business, and how ready they were to make promises. What had happened in this case illustrated how easily the Government forgot any consideration they received at the hands of hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had asked for plain dealing in this matter, and he certainly had made a very plain and unmistakable statement. The Government certainly undertook to bring in a Bill and a Supplementary Estimate for the distribution of the Police Free Force. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said there was no such thing as a consent Bill, and an abstract proposition of that kind had no real bearing on the case. But the matter was non-contentious. The question was debated by all Parties, and the proposition to settle it by the introduction of the Bill received unanimous assent. He considered the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) amounted to an evasion of the question. It was no use for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say he would carry out his pledge both implied and expressed. He (Mr. Sexton) maintained that the pledge had already been broken. The Session had proceeded some length of time, and the Government were bound to introduce it at the outset. They had not made any attempt to lay the Bill before the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland could not persuade the Committee he was keeping his pledge if he brought in a Bill which was not limited to matter which was undeniably non-contentious. If he brought in a Bill not limited to the subject specified, he would be grossly violating the spirit of the engagement into which he entered. He (Mr. Sexton) felt bound to point the moral of this proceeding. It was quite evident that there would be great economy of public time if hon. Members could arrive at understandings such as that which his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork thought he arrived at; but he (Mr. Sexton) said—and he said it calmly, and with a desire to impress the reasonableness of what he said on hon. Members—if he and his hon. Friends found that undertakings and understandings solemnly and publicly concluded were broken, and that the violation was attempted to be justified by such flimsy pretexts as had just been expressed from the Table, no such undertakings would be concluded in future; and whenever debate was raised they would be obliged to pursue it until they got an immediate settlement of the subject. If promises made at the Table especially by Members of the Irish Government were broken, no such promises would have any effect on Members; and so, in consequence, the debates in the House would be undoubtedly prolonged far beyond what was really wished and desired.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who had spoken with great severity of the conduct of the Irish Government in this case, had made the charge that Members of that Government had entered into an engagement in which they expressly stipulated that they would introduce a Bill of a non-contentious character; and he added that that was an engagement not only implied but expressed. The hon. Gentleman referred to Hansard as to the expressions of that pledge and read a passage from the volume. Now, if the assertion of the hon. Gentleman be made good there was no need of further discussion; but he (Sir William Harcourt) listened with the greatest care to the passage which was read from Hansard, and he could not find anything in it to justify the assertion of the hon. Gentleman. Now, a promise to bring in a Bill was not a promise with reference to a particular matter; it was not a promise to make the Bill refer exclusively to a particular point and no other. He had often given undertakings in that House to legislate upon a particular matter; but he never had understood, unless there was some stipulation to that effect, that the Bill must necessarily refer to the one point, and to the one point only. If that was intended by either party, where was the trace of it? It was most unreasonable, in his opinion, to expect that if an undertaking were given to legislate upon a particular point, the Bill introduced should refer only to that point. Such an undertaking would not be a usual undertaking to give. If the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork would show where what he maintained was expressed, and how it was expressed, there would be no need for the debate. If it were expressed in terms there could not be any further room for discussion; but if it was not expressed in terms, then he (Sir William Harcourt) considered it was perfectly unreasonable to expect that the Bill should relate to the one subject. Such a proposition did not commend itself to common sense or to experience. Unless the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork showed more than he had shown already, there was no foundation whatever for the charge he had made—that the Government were departing, or desired to depart, from their pledge. He (Sir William Harcourt) was a complete stranger to the matter up to this evening; and, from what he had heard, he could not admit that the charge made against the Government had been proved.

Mr. Sexton

MR. PARNELL said, his statement was quite distinct—namely, that both in the House and outside the House it was understood and expressed that the Bill should be a non-contentious Bill, and that the Supplementary Estimate should be a non-contentious Estimate. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Where is it expressed?] He would tell the right hon. Gentleman where it was expressed. It was expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), in a conversation with him (Mr. Parnell), after the hon. and learned Gentleman had received Lord Spencer's consent to the introduction of the Bill for this specific purpose. The hon. and learned Gentleman told him (Mr. Parnell), after he had received Lord Spencer's consent, that the Bill would be a non-contentious Bill; that it must be a non-contentious Bill both upon his (Mr. Parnell's) side and on the side of the Government.

The hon. and learned Gentleman also said that the Estimate must be non-contentious, because it would be utterly impossible to pass it under any other circumstances. Well, that was the distinct statement made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He (Mr. Parnell) was very sorry to be obliged to refer to a conversation which took place outside the House; but as the Home Secretary had asked him to say where it was expressed he felt obliged to answer him. Now, let him show also from the proceedings in the House how clearly must have been the understanding that the Bill was to be a non-contentious Bill. The Solicitor General for Ireland said—

"If it were found to be the fact that the free force was not fully distributed the matter could only be remedied by legislation, because there was no means of remedying it except at the quinquennial redistribution, which would not take place before 1887. If the grievance existed legislation would be introduced for the purpose, and he would be prepared to introduce a provision making the redistribution triennial instead of quinquennial, as at present."—3 Hansard, (1891) 232-3.)

Then he (Mr. Parnell) said—

"He thought the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Walker) was very satisfactory, and he and his colleagues felt very much indebted to him for his announcement. In the event of its being distinctly ascertained that the free force was not fully distributed at the last quinquennial period of redistribution, he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to undertake to empower the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by legislation, to distribute the free force at the first opportunity, and also to make this redistribution retrospective."—Ibid., 233.)

Then the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who was at that time Secretary to the Treasury, said—

"He did not understand his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) to make any statement with regard to the cost of the year."—Ibid.

The whole of his (Mr. Parnell's) statement with regard to the immediate introduction and passage of the Bill was accepted by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He asked the Committee, as reasonable men, whether the introduction of the Bill involving not alone this point with regard to the alteration of the term of redistribution of the Free Force, but involving a number of other points which had cropped up since then, and which neither the Irish Executive nor the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) had in their minds at the time, could be regarded as a satisfactory promise then made? The hon. Member for Liskeard knew something about the matter. The hon. Gentleman was aware that the point under consideration was limited, and that the promise which was made was a practical one; and he must see that the statement which had been made was not a satisfactory answer, and not a fulfilment of the pledge which had been given. It was not a fulfilment of the pledge to bring forward this other Bill, which had since entered into the mind of the Irish Executive, dealing with a vast number of other points, besides that which it had originally been intended to deal with. Such a Bill could not be passed immediately; but he had no doubt that a measure dealing simply with the redistribution of the police might easily be passed into law. It could have been passed any week, because it would not have been opposed by anyone; and they all knew that a measure involving other matters affecting the Constabulary in Ireland would be bitterly opposed by the majority of the Irish Members, and that it would not be possible for the Irish Executive to pass it. Probably no Bill would be passed this year. Was that a fulfilment of the pledge of the Government? The Irish taxpayers were, meanwhile, paying this amount of £30,000 a-year. Was that just? The hon. Gentleman lately Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) had, when an appeal had been made to him during the time he was in Office, refused to make a reduction, and the injustice accordingly had to go on. Was that injustice to continue? It appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) that the Bill which was to be proposed, and which was to contain other matters, would not pass for many months—perhaps not until the next Parliament; this unjust imposition, therefore, was to go on all this time. Again, he asked, was that the fulfilment of the pledge given to him by the Government—that they were to wait for the Bill, perhaps, until August, perhaps until January or February next, after the new Parliament had assembled? Perhaps the Government might make this measure a clause of the Crimes Act, and call that a fulfilment of their pledge.

Mr. Parnell

The hon. and learned Gentleman who had made the pledge knew perfectly well what he meant at the time. If some higher power than himself compelled the hon. and learned Gentleman to break his word, it was not his (Mr. Parnell's) fault, but the fault of the system. He should certainly do his best to prevent the Government getting this Vote, until he had some more satisfactory assurance as to their intention to redeem their pledge, and to deal—at any rate in a small degree—honourably with the Irish Members.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) had asked—which he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) thought he had no right to do—what was to be imported into this Bill—what other points beyond the redistribution of the police were to be dealt with. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not know by what right the hon. Member asked that. He did not suppose that anything of the sort was even contemplated. He had said that he would ascertain what the understanding was which was arrived at at the end of last Session, and would see that nothing was done in the Bill, in the way of introducing new matter, which would conflict with the understanding entered into. He did not know, personally, what the understanding was; but his hon. and learned Friend near him (Mr. Walker) had given his recollection of it. ["No, no!"] Yes, he had given his recollection in general terms. [MR. SEXTON: Only from Hansard.] His hon. and learned Friend had said more than that. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) did not know what the recollection of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) was upon the subject, as he had never spoken to him about it; but he was ready to abide by that hon. Gentleman's recollection. Whatever the understanding was, he could assure hon. Members opposite that nothing had been done which constituted any breach of the pledge which had been given last Session.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) stated that he was under the impression—indeed, he had gone so far as to say that he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had stated—that the Bill which would be introduced would be of a non-contentious character. Well, that was not at all his (Mr. Walker's) recollection of the understanding; such a thing had never occurred to his mind at all. It had never occurred to him that the pledge given was that a non-contentious, or a consent, Bill should be introduced. So anxious was he to be correct in the statement he made that, when he had addressed the House making the observations the hon. Member had referred to, he had written them out, in order that they might contain everything that he could promise, and the paragraph which was in Hansard's report was from the written statement he had prepared.

Mr. E. D. GRAY said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Walker) reminded him very much of the case of Mr. Hamilton, which they were discussing a little time ago. He was not able to contradict what the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) declared to be the fact, and could only give his impression of what he believed to have been the statement he himself had made to that hon. Member.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I did not make any such statement myself.

Mr. PARNEILL: You certainly did.

Mr. E. D. GRAY said, he would leave it to the experience of hon. Members to decide upon the value of a statement forced from a person in this way. The understanding was clear and distinct, and it was that the Bill should be acceptable to the Irish Members, and one which there would be no difficulty in passing; and to tell them that a Bill was to be introduced containing a variety of new matter beyond the principle which had been agreed upon, and which was to be of a non-contentious character, could not be called a fulfilment of the undertaking entered into by the Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland knew very well that a Bill, such as was now indicated, containing other matter than the one non-contentious principle, would have very little chance of passing; and for him to stand up in that House—which was supposed to be the first Assembly of Gentlemen in Europe—and to declare that what was now proposed was keeping faith with the Irish Members, was one of the most extraordinary proceedings he (Mr. Gray) had ever witnessed in the House.

Mr. HEALY said, the Committee would not have failed to notice, and would remember what Member of the Treasury Bench it was, who had imparted into the discussion its present tone. The Committee were going on with the discussion in a cool and collected style, until the Home Secretary threw his robustness into the argument. When the Irish Members gave the facts of the understanding entered into between them and the Government, and mentioned the pledge which had been given by the Government, that right hon. Gentleman asked—"Where are the traces of it?" Where are the traces?—the regular Old Bailey business. In future they would have to come down to that level. "Put it in a bond! Let's have it signed, sealed, and delivered!" That was the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, who, if his promise were questioned at all by the "Irish scum," would answer contemptuously—"My word is my bond." But now it was—"Where are the traces?" [Laughter.] In future, when the right hon. Gentleman made a promise, the Irish Members would ask him—"Where are the traces?" and perhaps the smile upon his face would not then be so pleasant as that which he was now endeavouring to assume. No traces!—there was no discussion. Why was there no discussion? Why, because the Prime Minister told them that if they gave up the matter, and allowed Progress to be reported, the Report of the Constabulary Vote would not be taken after half-past 11 at night. But that pledge was not kept. It was not kept, because the Irish Members had condoned it. Was that phrase sufficiently Old Bailey-like for the right hon. Gentleman? One would think, indeed, that that House was a Crimes Act Court, where they were putting prisoners under the torture, judging from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been conducting himself. Where are the traces? Why, judging from what he (Mr. Healy) knew to have taken place in Irish Courts of Justice within a comparatively recent period, he could confidently assert that on much less distinct evidence than that of the existence of the understanding referred to by the hon. Member for the City of Cork men had been hanged. "Is it expressed in terms?" It was expressed in terms; but British honour had come to this—that nothing could be expressed in terms unless it appeared in Hansard—unless it was set down in black and white. He (Mr. Healy) had noticed a most unusual act—a most unusual proceeding—take place on the Treasury Bench. After the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had spoken, another Member of the Government, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), had immediately followed him, a circumstance which, in connection with Irish matters in that House, did not happen once in six months; and it happened in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary having moved up to the Solicitor General for Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had declared that what appeared in Hansard were not the words he had uttered, but the words which he had subsequently written down for the official record.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I desire to say—

MR. HEALY: Allow me; you can explain afterwards.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Let him go on!

MR. HEALY: "Let him go on!" Perhaps he would a little longer than some people might care about before they got this thing through. As he had stated, they found a most unusual thing occur on the Treasury Bench. After the Chief Secretary for Ireland had sat down, the Home Secretary had moved up to the Solicitor General for Ireland, and the Solicitor General for Ireland had thereupon done what was most unusual in debate in that House, unless an incident had occurred upon which it was necessary to say something while one Member of the Government had been speaking—that was to say, the hon. and learned Gentleman had got up to supplement the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, evidently at the command of the Home Secretary. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland thereupon told them that what had appeared in Hansard was not what he had said, but what he had written, and put into it. ["No, no!"] Well, he (Mr. Healy) had understood the hon.

and learned Gentleman to say so. He had understood him to say that he had written down the terms of the arrangement entered into with his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell). On two occasions the Irish Members had made a distinct concession to the Government, when these concessions were of extreme value. The concession made by the Irish Members on one occasion—namely, upon a Saturday, when they had allowed the Egyptian Agreement to be considered, in order that City gentlemen might know what was being done in Egyptian per Cents, was of very special value to the Government. Irish Members allowed the Vote under discussion at the time to be taken at 5 o'clock on the Saturday afternoon, much to the chagrin of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), who said he wanted to discuss the matter. Why had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon found fault with them? Why, because the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had pointed out that, during the Conservative Administration, the cost of the police in Ireland had been many thousands lower than during the Liberal Administration; and the noble Lord's point had struck the right hon. Baronet so forcibly, that he had spoken upon the matter, and intended to return to the charge on the Report stage. When the Report stage came on, however, he found that the Irish Party had allowed the Vote in Supply to be taken at a late hour, in the face of a distinct promise which had been given. The consequence was that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon put a Question in the House. He (Mr. Healy) had asked some of his hon. Friends to look into Hansard to see whether there were "any traces" of that. So annoyed was the right hon. Baronet that he had put a Question to the Prime Minister on the subject. And this was all the Irish Members got for entering into an agreement with the Government in the matter. [Cries of "Shame!"] That Party opposite were a great Government, and the Irish Members were only a small Party. The English were 30,000,000 of men; the Irish only 5,000,000; but the Irish Representatives, however great the disparity of strength, would do their best to obtain in this matter what was admitted to be justice. The Government knew that if they put the provision they were discussing in the Crimes Act Bill, or that if any arrangements of an obnoxious character were made, the measure would be on the Table, and would be blocked by the Irish Members themselves, or by others. The Government admitted that the Irish people had a grievance in this matter of police, and had given the Irish Members a pledge with regard to it; but the Irish Members were now met by the question—"Where are the traces?" That was the spirit in which the Government treated the Irish Members. They admitted the injustice, but said that unless they could show that the promise was in black and white the injustice should not be properly remedied. So long as he (Mr. Healy) remained in the House he should never forget this. They were told to trust to the good faith and generous spirit of English Gentlemen. Fortunately, as a rule, the Irish Members did not act on that plan; but when, for once, they were soft enough to do so, they were met by the Old Bailey lawyer-like question, by gentlemen who were accustomed to treating with thieves in the dock—"Where are the traces?"

Mr. Healy

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had introduced an unfortunate method of dealing with these matters. The hon. Member for the City of Cork

Mr. Parnell) had made a statement with regard to the arrangement that had been entered into, and what had the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary done? The right hon. Gentleman had been long enough acquainted with the hon. Member for the City of Cork to know that that hon. Member did not use words lightly; and when, therefore, he had said that the Government had promised to bring in a non-contentious Bill, the right hon. Gentleman should have known that he was not speaking without back.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that all he stated was with regard to what the hon. Member for the City of Cork had said in the House. The hon. Member had never for a moment in his speech suggested that it was agreed that a non-contentious Bill was to be brought in, and he (Sir William Harcourt) believed the matter to be entirely now. He believed the hon. Member's meaning, in the speech he was referring to, did not embrace any reference to an understanding that a non-contentious Bill should be brought in.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the right hon. Gentleman showed himself to have been a very inattentive listener to the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had heard the hon. Member say that the understanding was arrived at inside the House and outside the House. There was no one in that House, or in the country, acquainted with the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who did not know that nobody was less desirous of violating, in the smallest or remotest degree, anything like an honourable understanding than he was. When the hon. Member had referred to an understanding outside the House, the right hon. Gentleman might have saved him the necessity of making any further references. But the right hon. Gentleman had proceeded to taunt his hon. Friend. Looking at the general unwillingness of the Government to have it believed that at any time they entered into understandings with the Irish Members, from the fact of the hon. Member for the City of Cork having mentioned "outside the House," it might have been assumed that the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee generally would have allowed the matter to pass without going further. But the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had absolutely taunted his hon. Friend into making explanations. The hon. Member for the City of Cork came forward with this explanation—that the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland Mr. Walker had stated in the Library that a Bill of a non-contentious character should be brought in. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) put it to the Committee whether, as a matter of mere probability, apart from the statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, the understanding must not have been for the introduction of a non-contentious Bill confined to a single question? The sum in dispute was something like £30,000 a year, according to the contention of the Irish Members, a great part of which was admitted by Her Majesty's Government, the Irish people were paying £30,000 a year more than they should pay for police. That was not questioned by the Treasury Bench. Surely, then, the effort of the Irish Members would be to get their constituents relieved from that burden at the earliest possible moment. It was clear that their course must have been to have prevented the Irish people from being charged with this £30,000 a-year one moment longer than it would take to legislate for the removal of the evil. So far did the Irish Members go that they asked for the measure which was to be brought in to be made retrospective; but it was refused. Surely their effort must have been to have got the burden removed on the 1st of January this year, or as near that date as possible. Was it not as clear as day that that must have been the object the Irish Members had in view? Well, if they wished to get it removed on the first opportunity, it must have been by a Bill brought in as soon as possible; and the only Bill they could have got passed into law with rapidity must have been one of a non-contentious character. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had given a crushing answer to the statement of the Home Secretary, who had asked—“Where are the traces?” What the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been alluding to had been the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and what the Home Secretary had forgotten was exactly what he should have remembered—namely, all the surrounding circumstances. The “traces” were, as had been pointed out, that the Irish Members, who had been giving a most obstinate and most prolonged opposition to the Constabulary Vote, at once ceased their opposition upon the Solicitor General for Ireland making his statement. The Constabulary Vote was one which Irish Members always contested severely and protractedly in that House; and would they have abstained from further opposition to the Vote if they had not thought that they had obtained a valuable consideration from the Government? The attitude of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) had been mentioned. That right hon. Baronet had joined the Irish Members in their opposition to the Constabulary Vote. The opposition to the Vote was growing in the House. It was not confined to the Irish Members. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had also joined in the denunciation of the swollen Estimates for the police. As he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had said, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon had joined them also; so that, having obtained this support on the first occasion the Vote came before them, the Irish Members had every reason to believe that if on the second occasion—that was to say, on the Report stage—they had again attacked it, they would have been able to do so in much greater strength. The Irish Members, however, believing that they had obtained a valuable consideration from the Government, had, so to speak, abandoned their allies. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon, on the next day, August 8, said in the House—

“It will be in the recollection of the House that, when the Constabulary Vote was taken, the Prime Minister gave a distinct pledge that the Report of it would not be taken after a certain hour—half-past 11. Now, my noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) and myself stayed here until half-past 12 o'clock last night, intending, as English Members, to take part in this Irish debate, and, understanding that it would not be taken, we went away. My noble Friend and myself were deprived of an opportunity of discussing the matter, because, as I am informed, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland told the Committee that he had made some arrangements with the Irish Members, and so the Report on the Vote came on. But, as I say, my noble Friend and myself, after the distinct utterance of the Prime Minister that it would not be taken after half-past 11—

“MR. GLADSTONE: No, no!

“SIR ROBERT PEEL: The Prime Minister distinctly stated so.

“MR. GLADSTONE: No, no!

“SIR ROBERT PEEL: Well, I am in the recollection of the House, and I say the Prime Minister distinctly stated that the Report of the Vote would not be taken after half-past 11 o'clock; but I see this morning that it was taken.”—(3 Hansard, [192] 276-7.)

The right hon. Baronet, having come down to the House to support the Irish Members, no doubt considered himself left in the lurch by them. Did anyone in his senses imagine that the arrangement entered into between the Irish Members and the Government was an arrangement to be interpreted in the light of events that occurred subsequent to that arrangement? So far as the Irish Members could understand, partly from what was said by occupants of the Treasury Bench, and partly from their silence, what the Government meant now to do was to mix a number of things together in the Bill they were going to introduce, owing to circumstances some of them subsequent to the arrangement for which the Government had got a valuable consideration. It was monstrous that the whole thing should have to be fought over again after the Government had given a pledge.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) had proved from Henceforth that the arrangement was that the Government should, as soon as possible, legislate on the matter. That they all admitted, and they had no desire to recede from their promise, and he could not understand why this discussion should be now continued. A short time ago, in addressing the Committee, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) said that if the understanding was as stated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, there would be no desire on the part of the Government to introduce controversial matter into the measure. Was not that enough? Hon. Members opposite, undoubtedly, on that occasion made a concession to the Government; and they seemed to be under the impression that Government promised that this question should be dealt with in a non-contentious way. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was under a different impression. Still, he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would go this length—as hon. Members had a strong conviction that the Government made the promise he would act on that supposition, although it was not the supposition he and his hon. and learned Friend had been proceeding upon.

Mr. HEALY said, that there was one sentence in the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) which the hon. Member for Galway had not quoted. It was the passage in which the right hon. Baronet said—

"If the Home Secretary were here, I would ask him what was the meaning of this, as he would call it, 'dirty trick?'"

Mr. PARNELL said, he was perfectly willing to accept the statement of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland as most conciliatory; but not more than they were entitled to have.

Vote agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE EXCESSES.

5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,045 6s. 7d. be granted to Her Majesty, to make good Excesses on certain Grants for Civil Services, for the year ended on the 31st day of March 1884, viz:—

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

	£	s.	d.
Diplomatic and Consular Buildings	107	17	6

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

Privy Council	81	10	6
Registrar General's Office, Scotland	3	4	3

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

Constabulary, Ireland ..	7,780	8	6
--------------------------	-------	---	---

CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES.

Superannuations	72	6	0
-----------------------	----	---	---

Total £8,045 6 7"

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, these excesses included a charge for persons picketed in Ireland; and he should like to ask the Government where the Treasury got the right to distribute public money without the assent of Parliament? There were really two sums in excess of those voted in Committee of Supply. These services were not contemplated or provided for by the Committee of Supply. The items were not mentioned in the Paper; but if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would refer to the Constabulary Vote he would find that £80 had been so distributed. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £80.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,065 6s. 7d. be granted to Her Majesty, to make good Excesses for certain Grants for Civil Services, for the year ended on the 31st day of March 1884,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

House adjourned at a quarter after Five o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 17th March, 1885.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading
 —Referred to Select Committee—Water Companies (Regulation of Powers) (21).
Select Committee—Report—Infants* [No. 45].
Report—Infants* (14-46).
Withdrawn—Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.) (18).

ROMAN CATHOLIC DISABILITIES
 (ADVOWSONS, &c.) BILL.

(Viscount Barrington.)

(NO. 18.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT BARRINGTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was intended to remove a disability which had existed for a long time affecting Roman Catholics, and which was not removed by the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, who were owners of advowsons of the Church of England, and had a right to make next presentations. In his humble judgment Roman Catholics suffered from a deprivation of right which was most unfair and unjust, and quite contrary to all those principles of liberty which were recognized in 1829. All other classes of Dissenters, and even Jews and Mahomedans, could present to livings, and Roman Catholics alone were excluded. To allow this distinction to remain any longer would be most invidious. The present system, which in the case of livings in the gift of Roman Catholics led to a chance election by members of the Universities, was particularly objectionable. The Bill provided that the person nominated by a Roman Catholic patron should be submitted to the Bishop for approval, and thus safeguarded the interests of the Church. If their Lordships would give a second reading to the Bill he would be prepared to propose Amendments in Committee which he hoped would be satisfactory. As to the Amendment on the Paper, it appeared to him that it was intended to defeat his very small measure by a side wind, as he was not aware that it was proposed to bring in any general measure which would deal with the subject of Church patronage. All that he asked for was that even-handed justice should be meted out to all Her Majesty's subjects alike, and with that view he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d.
 —(The Viscount Barrington.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE, in moving an Amendment of which he had given Notice, said it was short, and though it repealed parts of many Bills, its objects were simple—namely, to enable Roman Catholics who might have the patronage of livings in the Church of England to present to them. The reasons the noble Viscount (Viscount Barrington) gave to induce their Lordships to assent to his proposition were equally simple. All Dissenters, except Roman Catholics, having this patronage were permitted to present; why, then, were Roman Catholics excluded? There were several reasons. First, the whole system of Church patronage in the Church of England was anomalous, scandalous, and objectionable in the highest degree, and had been acknowledged by their Lordships' House to require amendment. When the Acts were passed preventing Roman Catholics from presenting to livings, they had the right of presenting to a large number of livings; while other Dissenters had few, and other Dissenters were not excluded on the principle, de minimis non curat Lex. He knew that many Roman Catholics possessing the right to present to livings had sold their rights. It was open to every Roman Catholic to do so; so that, so far as the value of property, they were in exactly the same position to realize as any other subject of Her Majesty. He might say for himself that he had accepted the principle of giving the same rights to Roman Catholics as to other subjects of the Queen; but not because they were Roman Catholics to give them extraordinary and exceptional privileges. If the noble Viscount would propose a Bill excluding all persons not members of the Church of England from presenting, he (Lord Oranmore and Browne) should be glad to support him; but as two wrongs did not make a right, if this Bill passed the evils of Church patronage would be increased, not diminished. That Roman Catholics had not the power of presenting was said to be a hardship. It was so, if it was a hardship for the Mahdi not to appoint officers in the British Army in Egypt. The Bill purported to remove Roman Catholic disabilities. Well, it seemed to him that the disability of Roman Catholics to appoint clergymen to livings in the English Church was a disability somewhat similar to that which the right rev. Bench of Bishops suffered from; for they could not attend the Councils of the Church of Rome, neither could the Pope bestow upon them dignities higher than any that the Crown could bestow on any of her subjects. The emptiness of the right rev. Bench might show how much they regretted these disabilities. But it seemed beyond dispute that Roman Catholics were, for many reasons, more objectionable as patrons of livings in England's Church than other Dissenters. The existence of the Church of England, the position of her clergymen, the possession of her vast possessions, began and continued on the ground that she repudiated the authority as well as the doctrines of the Church of Rome. In fact, the two Churches were hostile and antagonistic to one another. He had met some friends who disputed this. He need only refer them to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church. They might sympathize with the sophistry of the Prime Minister, who discovered that we were not at war in Egypt—but any person with common sense would agree with his (Lord Oranmore and Browne's) statement. Let him a minute claim their Lordships' attention to the view taken of the relations between the two Churches by Cardinal Manning. In addressing the third Provincial (Romish) Council of Westminster, Cardinal Manning said—

"This nineteenth century will make a great epoch in the history of the Church. . . . It is good for us to be here in England. It is yours, right rev. Fathers, to subjugate and to subdue, to bend and to break the will of an Imperial race, the will which, as the will of Rome of old, rules our nations and people, invincible and inflexible. . . . You have a great commission to fulfil, and great is the prize for which you strive. Surely a soldier's eye and a soldier's heart would choose by intuition this field of England for the warfare of faith. None ampler or nobler could be found. . . . It is the head of Protestantism, the centre of its movements, and the stronghold of its powers. Weakened in England, it is paralyzed elsewhere, conquered in England, it is conquered throughout the world, once overthrown here, all is but a war of detail. All the roads of the whole world meet in one point: and this point reached, the whole world lies open to the Church's will. England is the key of the whole position of modern error."

He made no complaint of this statement by the head of the Roman Catholic Church. It was as manly, as straightforward, as true to his Church, as it was aggressive against the Church of England. Would the members of that Church assist him? Now, one of the points most insisted on by the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Peterborough) and other speakers on the Patronage Bill, when it was before that House, was that patronage was a pious trust. How would a good and obedient Roman Catholic exercise that trust, but to subjugate, to subdue, and overthrow their Church? For what reason could a Roman Catholic desire to exercise this patronage, save to appoint a minister of his Church, having a dispensation to a living in the Church of England? It would be said that could not be; he must pledge himself to agreement with the Thirty-nine Articles. If that was the only difficulty, a dispensation would get over it; but it was not necessary, for there were many advowsons in the English Church called "donative," in which no induction by the Bishop and no declaration was necessary! Their Lordships would remember that, in the debate on the Patronage Bill in that House, the right rev. Prelate he had just referred to declared that the patronage, as exercised, made the Church of England stink in the nostrils of persons who, otherwise, would be within her fold. Would the passing of this Bill make it smell sweeter? The congregations were sick enough already at being bought and sold; but now they would appoint as spiritual guides for them those who were here in this land declaring a deadly crusade against all they valued as most holy and most dear. In his mind, there was no blot so great on the nobility and gentry of England as the way they had used their Church patronage, and their wealth and influence, to set the laws of the land at defiance. For more than 30 years, through patronage, they had done so, in the pulpit and through the Church schools—setting at defiance the honest convictions of the congregation, taking advantage of their poverty to oblige them either to have no churches or no schools, or to attend at services distasteful and illegal, and their children to receive education in tenets of another and hostile faith. The Liberation Society were friends to the Church, compared to those who had pursued that course; and now, by this Bill, they would impose another and a heavier burden. He would only ask their Lordships one more question. First, let him ask Roman Catholics was there one of them who would consent to Protestants appointing their spiritual guides? He would ask members of the Church of England, who was he who would accept a pastor appointed by a Roman Catholic? If both sides answered that they would not, they must both join in throwing out this Bill. Again, one more question. Liberals and Conservatives feared losing the Roman Catholic vote. It was unduly large; but, mistake not, the new Franchise Bill would bring into action a still larger Protestant vote. Beware lest they lose that! Remember precedents. The Irish Church was now representative—no patrons—this was the work of Liberals. The Scotch Church was representative—rest assured ere long so would be the English. He asked them to reject the Bill and accept his Motion.

Amendment moved,

To leave out all the words after ("That") and insert ("this House deems it unnecessary to pass this Bill, awaiting a measure being introduced dealing with the whole matter of church patronage.")—(The Lord Oranmore and Browne.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he could not pretend to follow the noble Lord who had moved the Amendment in all his arguments; but he believed that the course which the Amendment recommended was the right one to follow now. The question of the disposition of patronage in the Church of England required to be dealt with and adjusted as a whole; and he hoped that with the assistance of noble Lords he would be able to introduce a Bill which would be acceptable to their Lordships, and have some chance of passing the other House of Parliament—a Bill which would deal with all the rights of patronage, and provide a better system in respect of Roman Catholic patronage. He strongly deprecated the raising of small parts of a large question and introducing little Amendments, instead of dealing with the question in a comprehensive spirit. There had been no attempt to show that there was any real grievance, or that any persons entertained a sense of injury. If the Bill should be passed, it would place Roman Catholics in a remarkable position. He could not understand a Roman Catholic desiring to present to a living in the Church of England. If he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) were put into a similar position, and had to nominate to preferments in the Roman Catholic Church, he should be only too thankful to relieve himself of the duty, and should probably delegate it to a body of intelligent Roman Catholic laymen, just as at present a Roman Catholic patron could, and often did, delegate his power to members of the Church of England. The noble Viscount told them he had brought in the Bill entirely proprio motu, and on his own authority; and he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had not heard that Roman Catholic patrons desired the Bill; he therefore, saw no justification for it. He should entertain these objections to the Bill even if he were disposed to minimize the differences between the Church of England and that of Rome. But he was not by any means disposed to minimize those differences; they had left their mark on history, and were of a fundamental character. It was argued that the Bishops would have a check on the appointments, and though they would cheerfully discharge that responsibility if called upon to do so, yet it must be remembered that that responsibility stood greatly in need of definition. The Bill dealt with a large and historical matter; and he would ask the noble Viscount to withdraw his Bill and wait for the larger measure, which would deal with the question of Church patronage generally, and make more clear the responsibility of the Bishops. If the Bill were not withdrawn he must support the Amendment of the noble Lord.

Lord Oranmore and Browne

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he did not like to oppose his noble Friend; but he was extremely unwilling that the vote he was about to give should be misunderstood. He should be the last man to say one word against the privileges exercised by the Roman Catholics; he should wish that they had every privilege the same as other subjects of Her Majesty. But he looked at the subject from the point of view of the parishes of the Church of England, and not from the point of view of patronage. He thought it even possible that some of those belonging to the Roman Catholic Church would make a better choice of a minister than some Protestants would. But it was not a question between Roman Catholic and Protestant; it was a question of much wider scope. He would ask the House whether in any other Church in the world a state of things existed in which a Mahomedan or a Jew, or anybody else, would be able to appoint a minister to a Church of another faith? Was it possible that any other religious creed would allow a member of another faith to appoint ministers for them? Was that not in itself a monstrous and horrible thing? He would go further, and say it was not the intention of the English law. It was an accident of the time that gradually people had acquired landed property, and with it the presentation. But English legislation had not in any case committed itself to the course that persons who did not belong to the Church of England ought to appoint its ministers. And would it be tolerated that the Church of England should appoint ministers either of a tabernacle or a synagogue, or even a Roman Catholic place of worship? If they looked at it from that point of view it was really absurd. No doubt, abuses existed; but he was at a loss to understand why they were to take that very important step of legalizing what they would consider the abuse of appointing the ministers of one Church by the members of another faith. A clergyman of the Church of England had enormous powers in his hands. He could alter the whole conditions of the service. If there was a musical service he could sweep it away and substitute a simple one, or if there was a simple service he could abolish it and substitute a musical one. To a great extent, he was the educator of the young in the parish, and was supreme in many matters; and yet it was proposed to legalize the appointment of such an important person by a professor of another religion. It was impossible to rest such a change on the ground of fitness or justice. Then on what ground did it rest? Upon the rights of property? He must say they would be running foul of the whole current of modern public opinion if they stretched the rights of property to such an extent in regard to Church patronage. The whole question seemed to him to be one of the most delicate and difficult matters to deal with. But private patronage was a valuable inheritance, and one they ought to preserve. For himself, he believed the Church of England owed more to private patronage than to almost any other circumstances in her organization. But if they strained private right with regard to patronage too far, he was afraid they would soon make it so odious that the whole structure would break down. For his own part, he should be inclined to remedy present defects by giving power to the Bishop to refuse unsuitable persons. He trusted the noble Lord who had introduced the Bill with great thought and with a good object would consider the advice given him by the head of the English Church, who had just spoken, and would feel that it would be wise to withdraw it. Most of them would be extremely sorry to put themselves in a position of animosity to any projected reform in connection with Church patronage; but he, for one, could never consent to that proposal to strain the rights of property in a way which might be extremely prejudicial to the future reforms which they hoped to see carried out.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he should not have risen to speak in the debate had it not been for the remarks of the noble Lord, who had stated it as his opinion that the Bill would be availed of by Roman Catholics to undermine the Church of England.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he did not think he had used the word "undermine;" if he had used it it was unintentionally.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he could only repudiate the suggestion altogether. It would be the bounden duty of the gentlemen in whom the power would be vested to obtain the best man possible, and inquire into his antecedents. He had no property in this country, therefore he could speak freely; but if he took his own case he should consider it his duty to make the most strict and rigid inquiry; and if he were in the diocese of the most rev. Prelate who had addressed the House so admirably he should think it his duty to take the advice of the Archbishop on the subject. Was it wiser and safer to distrust the Roman Catholics, who had the right of presentations, than to trust to their honour and their sense of duty? He thought it would be wiser to trust them.

A noble LORD: In this country?

LORD FITZGERALD: The noble Lord said, "In this country;" if he alluded to Ireland, such a thing did not exist in that country. They were to trust in this matter the Turk, Jew, and Atheist, but not the Papist. What could be more important to a man than to have a proper clergyman presiding over his district? Therefore, it would be his object, interest, and duty to select the best man possible. He did not support this Bill from any desire to undermine or destroy the Church of England; he would rather see her strong and vigorous, and he thought that this Bill would tend in that direction.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that if a division took place upon this Bill he should vote without a moment's hesitation against the second reading. He wished to protest against the representations of the noble and learned Lord who had just spoken that the question before the House was whether Roman Catholic gentlemen in possession of the right of presentation would or would not act in an honourable way towards the Church of England. That was not the question. He had the utmost confidence in the sincerity of the noble and learned Lord, and believed that he would exercise patronage, if he had any, in the most conscientious way. Among his own Roman Catholic friends he knew many who had exercised their patronage in the most admirable manner; but that was not the question they had to consider. Much deeper questions were involved in this matter, for, as the noble Earl opposite had said, there was no subject connected with the Church of England more delicate than the right of private patronage. The great question to be considered with regard to patronage was whether it should be treated as a public trust or as a mere right of property. Historically it was considered a public trust, and most men exercised it in the spirit of a public trust. But in the course of centuries it had, unfortunately, come to be regarded as a mere right of property. He agreed that there was no more painful subject connected with the management and existing condition of the Church of England than the sale of advowsons and next presentations, for that system presented the right of patronage distinctly in the light of a mere right of property, and not of a public trust. If any change in the law were made at all patronage should be changed from its position of a mere right of property to a public trust. The change proposed by this Bill was in an opposite direction, for it treated patronage still more than at present as a mere right of property. They were going to place patronage in the hands of men who, whatever their feelings of personal honour, were not well-fitted trustees for the exercise of such a privilege. He agreed with the most rev. Prelate that no man could be placed in a more painful position than to have to exercise the right of patronage over the spiritual interests of those with whom he did not agree. The mere idea of an absolute right of patronage in the spiritual concerns of the people of a whole parish was to him a most odious conception. In his own country they had abolished patronage. At one time he had the honour and the misfortune to hold the patronage of no less than 30 parishes; but then he was a member of the Church in which he held them. In spite of that he always felt that it was a most difficult and onerous duty which he had to perform, and he was painfully conscious of many failures in exercising the right. In Scotland they had a system which gave the congregation a veto upon the appointment of a non-popular minister. The congregation appointed a committee, and were considered as having a veto upon any appointment. There was no such system in England; and if they made patronage more an absolute right of property than ever, they would drive a nail into the coffin of the Church of England. It might be said that it was impossible to deal with patronage, because there were so many opponents of the Church in "another place" who would fight against any measure, however just, if it would tend to strengthen the Church. But, in his opinion, there was no more urgent reform needed in the Church of England than some measure to modify the right of patronage and the sale of advowsons, and whenever that reform took place it must be in the direction of making it more a public trust and less a matter of mere abstract property. He could conceive that under certain circumstances private patronage might be the best mode of appointing clergy—if it was in the hands of a gentleman owning large property in the parish, belonging to the Church, and taking an interest in the spiritual concern of the people of the parish. But there ought to be some check on the absolute power now exercised. The fact that advowsons were now sold and bought by persons who were not even members of the Church in which they appointed clergymen constituted a most painful state of things which would not long be tolerated. He opposed this Bill, not because he distrusted the personal honour of any person of the Roman Catholic faith, but because it was contrary to the public interest to alter the right of private patronage distinctly in a wrong direction.

Lord Fitzgerald

EARL CAIRNS remarked that the issue raised by this Bill was part, and a small part only, of a very large question. They had been told by the most rev. Prelate that this whole question must before long come before Parliament for its consideration; and he had shown that it would be most unwise now, with the prospect of having to deal with the question as a whole, to come to any decision that night upon what was, after all, a very small fragment of a great question. There was another reason which made him unwilling to give a decision on that question at that time. This Bill presented the right of patronage in Church appointments in the most bald and naked form of a right of property. He trusted that his noble Friend would, by withdrawing the Bill, save the House the necessity of dividing upon it.

VISCOUNT BARRINGTON said, that after the discussion that had taken place, and especially after the assurance of the most rev. Prelate that in the proposed Bill dealing with Church Patronage the claims of the Roman Catholics would receive due consideration, he did not feel justified in putting their Lordships to the trouble of going to a division.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE wished, before the debate closed, to state that the noble and learned Lord Lord Fitzgerald was mistaken in supposing that he attributed dishonest motives to Roman Catholics. He had as much faith in the honour and integrity of Roman Catholics as of other Members of the House.

Amendment, Original Motion, and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

WATER COMPANIES (REGULATION OF POWERS) BILL.—No. 21.)

(The Earl of Camperdown.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to regulate the powers of the Water Companies—to improve the system, but not to take the powers entirely away. The present state of the law was that a householder was assessed on the annual value of the premises, and he was also required to pay in advance the quarter's water rate. If he failed to pay that amount in advance, the Company had the absolute right to cut off his water supply without further question. Such was the present state of the law; but since it had become so the Valuation Act and other Acts had been passed, by which this annual value became a shifting one, and one which was difficult to decide. The first point raised in this Bill was the proposal in the 4th clause that every Company should send in to every owner becoming liable a claim or demand note containing a statement of the particulars. The object of this proposal was perfectly simple. It was to insure the consumer receiving a full and complete statement of the demand made upon him and the particulars of that demand. In making a proposal of this kind, he was not proposing any course that was in any way exceptional. It was the course followed by a parish when it collected parish rates, as well as by the Crown in collecting taxes. It was also what was done in every case where a private bill was presented to a customer, the amount and the particulars of that amount being stated. But there were even stronger reasons to advance in favour of this proposal. It appeared to him most important, not only that the consumers should know the charges made upon them, but also that they should know, when changes were proposed to be made in their assessment, what those changes were, and all the details of them. The present practice of most Companies was, when they were making a change in the assessment, to give no information whatsoever. He did not wish to go into details, but he would give one instance of the working of this practice. When he had raised a similar proposal before in that House, a friend of his, a Director of a Water Company, had said that he thought he was a little hard on the Companies, and that some of the cases he had quoted were hardly founded upon fact. He had replied that he would take his own case, and he applied to the Grand Junction Water Company for details of their charge. As soon as he had received the details, it appeared that the surveyor in his statement was charging him twice over. On asking for an explanation of this he had received the answer that they found he was perfectly correct, and that an error had been made; the excuse given being that the amount of work in the re-assessment of the district had compelled them to employ new and untried hands. That was the result of the test case which he had taken up, and for which he could vouch. The Company had, afterwards, finding that they had been entirely wrong, sent him a new note altogether, and the result was that his premises were twice re-valued in six months. With regard to the right of the Companies to cut off the water supply, he was not proposing to take it away altogether; but by Clause 5 he proposed to make it necessary to obtain leave to do so from a magistrate or some Court of summary jurisdiction. It was necessary that some restriction should be placed upon the exercise of this power; because, in his opinion, it was one which was being improperly used for purposes which the Legislature had never contemplated when it gave the power. When the Waterworks Act, 1847, was passed the Legislature had never foreseen that this power would be used in cases of disputes. His great complaint was not so much that the Companies had exercised their power in enforcing payment of their bills, as that when disputes as to amount had arisen between them and consumers in many instances the Company had threatened the consumer with the entire removal of his water supply unless he consented to the demands which they made upon him. These instances could be multiplied to a large extent; but there was great difficulty in getting small consumers of water to come forward and give their names, as they were afraid of the Water Company. There was another danger which he would like to point out, which was that the Companies had used this power in some cases against tenants when they had disputes with the landlord. He would not have troubled their Lordships further if it had not been for a Paper which he had received that morning, and which he supposed had been circulated among their Lordships, bearing the names of Messrs. Baxter and Co., and other eminent firms of Parliamentary agents, and which he presumed was the statement of the case of the Water Companies in answer to this Bill. He would invite their Lordships' special attention to the contents of that Paper. It was there stated that this Bill would cause serious loss and inconvenience to the Companies, that it was un-called for, and that, if passed, it would be unjust. But this Bill only proposed that the Companies should render accounts in the ordinary form as a parish or the Crown did. With regard to the statement that the proposal had been brought in without any communication with the Water Companies, his experience of making an application to them was that they would offer opposition in every possible way, direct or indirect, in Parliament and out of Parliament. One of the Companies having appeared before Parliament for a Bill, he took the opportunity of endeavouring to introduce clauses into the Bill, and the Company objected to his proposal, saying that it was a mean and petty mode of legislating. Now that he had introduced the measure in a form in which even the Companies could not object to it, they said that if it was desired to alter the existing law the change should be undertaken by the Government of the day after careful inquiry, and that the matter should not be hastily dealt with by patchwork legislation. Under those circumstances, he asked their Lordships whether it would have been of much use for him to have appealed to the Water Companies if they were disposed to receive his proposals in that manner? The next allegation in the Paper to which he referred was that the restrictions now sought to be imposed had never before been suggested. But then Parliament had never supposed that that power would be used for settling disputes; it was a question of the payment of rates, and not of settling disputes. It was further alleged that the necessity of delivering demand notes and particulars to each consumer would involve serious trouble and inconvenience to the Companies. Of course it would; but it appeared never to have occurred to the Companies that the consumers had some rights in that matter, and that they incurred most serious inconvenience from the Companies giving them no information whatever. Then the Paper stated that Section 5 of the Bill would deprive the Companies of that which was practically, as respects a certain class of houses, their only mode of obtaining payment of the rates. That he took to be the real sting of the Bill, and to be the chief cause of the opposition of the Companies. They said that very seldom was the power of cutting off the water supply exercised, and never except after repeated applications for payment; that they issued over 50,000 notices of their intention to cut off the water unless the rates were paid, and that, with but few exceptions, the notice had the desired effect. The same plea might be urged in defence of the kourbash in Egypt—namely, that it was seldom actually used, the threat of its employment being sufficient to secure the payment of the taxes demanded, regardless of whether they were just or unjust. The Companies said they had 700,000 consumers, and they annually served those notices on nearly 8 per cent of that number, the notices not being very often pressed, because they generally had the desired effect. The kourbash in Egypt had the desired effect; but was it desirable to apply it? Now, he maintained that it was not desirable that when a dispute arose it should be settled summarily and at the arbitrary will of the Company. The Companies utterly ignored the fact that they had any duty towards the public; and it seemed that, in their opinion, the object of water supply legislation was simply to enable the Companies to extract from the consumers the amount of rates which they thought fit. He held that some legislation was absolutely necessary to protect the legiitimate interests of water consumers, and therefore he asked their Lordships now to read that Bill a second time.

The Earl of Camperdown

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD BRAMWELL, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, his experience of law-making was very little; but he thought there never was a case brought before a Legislative Body asking for an Act to be passed with so little ground or foundation as the present one. That was a proposal to interfere with all the Water Companies in the Metropolis and throughout the country. He did not know whether the noble Earl was aware that he had left out those water suppliers who were Corporate Bodies, and not private Companies.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Yes.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he supposed, then, that Corporations were to possess those powers which private Companies were to be required to give up. The Bill was an interference with all the Water Companies in England and Wales, an interference with millions of capital, and that without any case being made out before their Lordships, except that which the noble Earl had told them of his own particular knowledge and particular acquaintance. Was that reasonable? Was it right that the bargain that was made between the public and the Water Companies in the Acts which constituted them should be interfered with at all, or, at all events, without some better reason than any which the noble Earl had adduced? He knew that at that moment the Water Companies were not at all popular. They were considered proper objects of plunder and of ransom; and the reason for that, he supposed, was because they had been successful—at least, he knew of no other reason. There was a great outcry about the tyrannical conduct of the Companies; that was one of those cases in which he often thought it would be desirable if they could collect the voices of the silent. Everyone who supposed that he had a grievance against the Companies thought fit to make it heard, and cried—"Down with them;" but those who were contented, and had no complaint, held their tongues. Then, great reliance was placed on what was called the extortionate disposition shown by the Companies; and reference was made to the decision of their Lordships' House in Mr. Dobbs's case. What happened in that case? The Companies thought they had a right to charge on the gross value; their Lordships' House thought that they had not, but that they must charge on the net value only. Were the Companies entirely to blame? Three of the most distinguished Judges of the Court of Appeal agreed with the Companies, and their Lordships' House had reversed their decision; and if three of the greatest Judges held that view, were those unfortunate Companies to be severely blamed for sharing it? The noble Earl had quoted his own experience in that matter. Let him mention his. He had obtained the particulars of the Water Company's demand against him; and, finding that they had undercharged him in regard to several items, being honest to the extent of a few shillings a-year, he had paid what was due to them. He had presented to their Lordships a Petition signed by the Chairmen of eight Metropolitan Water Companies, and also Petitions from the Water Companies throughout England. The Metropolitan Companies had 700,000 customers; and, as stated by the noble Earl, they gave 50,000 notices of the cutting-off of the water supply in the year, because until they did so they could not get paid; nor would the notice induce the payment; it was only when the workman came with his tools in his hand to cut off the water that the Company could get paid. And the result was that, for non-payment and otherwise, they cut off the water in only 1,400 instances. That was at the rate of but one case out of every 2,000 customers; and yet there was all that outcry against the Companies. The noble Earl talked of the kourbash, but the Companies did not use the kourbash; the threat of it was enough. If, by applying the mere threat of doing what you had a right to do, you induced people to do what they ought to do, it was a very good thing. What would be the consequence of taking away this convenient and summary remedy? The Company, before cutting off the water, would have to apply to a magistrate, who, if the customer still failed to pay, would make an order that the water should be cut off. Thus the Company would be put to considerable inconvenience, and the customer would incur heavy additional expense. As matters were now, if the Company exercised their power wrongly, they had to pay a penalty of £10. But, in fact, this penalty was never imposed. Why? Because the power was never wrongly exercised. The proposal of the noble Earl was most mischievous, both for the Company and the consumer, and was an unjust interference with rights conferred on the Company by the Legislature. It was not unreasonable that notice should be given by the Company of the amount and items of the claim. He thought it was given.

Lord Bramwell

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: They do not.

LORD BRAMWELL: Then one had only to write and ask. Then, with the proposed application to the magistrates, people would be sure to say they had had no notice of the claim. In "another place" a right hon. Friend of his said that he had strong views on property, and would have given Shylock his pound of flesh. Well, he had one strong view on property, that it should not be stolen. In the case of Shylock he would have decided with the fair Portia, on the ground that the Jew was attempting to infringe the law, which said, "Thou shalt not kill." It did not follow that, because you might not kill, you might steal. He asked their Lordships to discard any unworthy prejudices against Companies, which had their rights as well as individuals; and he hoped, therefore, that they would reject the Bill.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Bramwell.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that when he saw the Notice of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) he was full of curiosity to know what reasons his noble and learned Friend would assign for moving the rejection of the Bill. The principal clause of the Bill interfered with no rights or powers of the Companies. It only required that they should give information of the grounds of their demand to their consumers. The other clause, to some extent, no doubt, interfered with their power of cutting off the water. But the method of exercising that power was a matter for Committee, and not a ground for throwing out the Bill on the second reading. The case for the principle of the Bill appeared to him to be a perfectly reasonable one. He was full of wonder when he heard the arguments of his noble and learned Friend, who went off into a speech on references made in "another place" to Shylock, and talked about stealing and the rights of property, and that on a Bill which contained nothing which could be construed as an attack on property. The Companies had obtained from Parliament the practical monopoly of the supply of one of the first necessities of life on very favourable terms. The Metropolis and other large urban populations were wholly dependent on them. They supplied the water, not according to the amount used, but according to the valuation of the house supplied. The Bill did not take away any of their rights, or interfere with their property or the bargain which they had made with the State. All that the principal clause did was to require the Companies to let the consumer know what the valuation was, what real charges were, and upon what items of consumption they were based. In the only two cases they had heard of, in which particulars were detailed, it turned out that the Companies had made mistakes; and how could they know that no mistakes would be made again? The recent case of Dobba, to which the noble and learned Lord referred, proved that those Companies had for many years been making their charges upon a false principle of valuation. As for the other clause, about which there might be some room for controversy, when they got into Committee, all that need now be said was, that when there were disputes concerning the liability, and when the consumer was not told the particulars of the charge made against him, using, or even the threat to use, the summary power of cutting off the water was a thing which perfectly justified some safeguard to protect the consumer against being so treated.

LORD TRURO said, he regarded the Bill, not as an interference with the Water Companies, but as a measure for the protection of the public. It was intended to secure the public against the excessive charges which the Companies, perhaps inadvertently, but still illegally and unjustly, attempted to enforce. Therefore, he thought their Lordships were deeply indebted to the noble Earl who introduced the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he must confess he did not think that a case had been made out for rejecting the second reading of the Bill. The 4th clause was, in his judgment, a most reasonable one; but he hoped that, in agreeing to the second reading, he should not be supposed to assent to the 5th clause. That was a very stringent clause indeed, and if it were passed, he did not think the business of the Water Companies could be carried on. At present the remedy of cutting off the water could not be regarded as satisfactory, inasmuch as there were sanitary objections to it, and it often happened that, in consequence of a change of tenancy, it hit the wrong person. He did not think Parliament was bound to continue a system which had sanitary evils, and was injurious to the health of the population, merely on account of a previous bargain having been made with the Companies by Parliament. If, however, Parliament removed the remedy of cutting off, it ought to provide the Water Companies with some other remedy equally efficient. He asked the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill whether he could see any objection, when the Bill had passed the second reading, to refer it to a Select Committee, by whom this point might be considered?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS hoped that the Bill would be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, so that the Committee might have an opportunity of stating their objections.

LORD BRAMWELL admitted that it was not unreasonable that people should be supplied with particulars of the charges made by the Companies; and he was quite content that the Bill should be read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he disclaimed all desire to do any injustice to the Water Companies, and expressed his willingness to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, on the understanding, however, that no counsel should be heard before it. He was perfectly able to state certain portions of the case himself on one side, and he knew that the Water Companies had among their Directors and officers persons perfectly able to bring the case of the Water Companies before the Committee.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill read 2^a, and referred to a Select Committee.

CENTRAL ASIA—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA
—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether an engagement has been concluded between the British and Russian Governments agreeing that the Afghan and Russian outposts shall not advance beyond their present positions; what is the date of such an agreement, if it exists; and for what length of time will it remain valid; and whether the Afghan Government is a party to it? If I understand correctly what the Prime Minister is reported to have said last night, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Afghan Government is not a party to the arrangement. The important point is, what is the length of time during which it will remain valid? If it remain permanently valid, England has abandoned the greater part of that for which she was contending; and I fancy that the language which has been used by the Government on former occasions will be at variance with such a result; but if it is not permanently valid, of course these remarks do not apply. There is another Question which I wish to ask, and it is, whether the agreement, or rather arrangement, as I believe I ought to call it, with the Russian Government is of an absolute and an unconditional character, or whether words have been introduced into it which will enable the Russian Government to depart from it if they should think proper to do so?

EARL GRANVILLE: I think that it will be better to read to your Lordships the telegram which has been received by the Government from Sir Edward Thornton in response to the inquiry which I made on Saturday. It is to this effect—

“St. Petersburg, March 16, 1885.

“The Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs states that the Russian troops will not advance from the positions now occupied by them provided that the Afghan Forces do not advance or attack, or unless in the case of some extraordinary reason—such, for instance, as a disturbance in Penjdeh. He also states that the strictest orders have been sent to the Russian Commanders to avoid by every possible means a conflict or any incitement to a conflict, and that these orders will be repeated.”

With regard to the further Questions put by the noble Marquess, I have to say that as to the date of the agreement the noble Marquess has quoted correctly what was said yesterday by Mr. Gladstone; but Mr. Gladstone's statement was founded upon several telegrams, the last of which was dated the 5th of March, and this telegram is dated yesterday. The noble Marquess asks an important Question as to the length of time during which the agreement will remain valid. I think that the noble Marquess asked that Question under a misconception. This arrangement has nothing whatever to do with the final settlement of this most important question; and I trust that both Governments will be able to bring that question to a satisfactory conclusion. This is merely an arrangement at the present moment to prevent what there is very great risk of—namely, that by an unauthorized action on the part of the Afghan or of the Russian Forces a collision might arise which would embitter the whole subject and make it much more difficult to deal with. With regard to the communication of the arrangement to the Ameer, our instructions to Sir Peter Lumsden are to exercise all his influence to prevent the Afghans from making an attack on the Russians, and Sir Peter Lumsden is in constant communication with the Ameer and his officers who are on the spot.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Do I understand the noble Earl to say that the engagement into which the country has entered involves the acquiescence for an indefinite time of the presence of the Russian troops in the places where they now are?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: As I understand the matter, the answer is certainly “No!” It is a temporary arrangement to prevent a collision between the Russian and Afghan troops, in order that the negotiations may proceed. The agreement, therefore, does not involve our acquiescence in the presence of the Russian troops in the places where they now are for an indefinite time.

LORD STRATHNAIRN was understood to ask whether, when the Afghan Boundary Commission resumed their duties, the Russian Forces would retire towards Russia, and the Afghans towards Afghanistan, or whether both Forces would be drawn up in array opposite to each other?

EARL GRANVILLE: I think that it is only fair that I should tell the noble and gallant Lord that even if he gives Notice, I can only say that I do not think it desirable, during these difficult and delicate negotiations, to raise such a point by means of Questions.

EGYPT—ZEBEHR PASHA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY: My Lords, the action of Her Majesty's Government has imported some degree of strangeness into the subject of the Question which I have put on the Paper relating to Zebehr Pasha. They have always insisted that they have no control in Egypt, and they have always acted on the advice of the Khedive; and we all knew the way that Zebehr has been arrested in Egypt and put on board a British ship and taken away, without the form of a trial, to some place unknown. This suggests the inquiry whether Her Majesty's Government have departed from the position they had previously assumed, and have taken charge in Egypt, or whether we are to understand that the Egyptian Government have requisitioned our troops, and made use of our ships, and deported Zebehr without a trial, such as was considered necessary in the case of Arabi Pasha. These are the circumstances; but without expressing any opinion whatever as to the propriety of the arrest and deportation of Zebehr Pasha, I will simply ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether martial law now prevails in Alexandria; and in virtue of what law or custom the deportation of Zebehr Pasha has taken place; and, whether Zebehr Pasha was arrested by order of the English or the Egyptian authorities?

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Viscount has stated no opinion as to the acts which have been done, and therefore I will simply answer his Question. I do not see that any object would be gained by going into the question of Egyptian law, nor am I aware of any new policy having been adopted; but we certainly hold that as long as the English Army is in Egypt we are bound to take such steps as military necessities require. Having received information from Lord Wolseley on the subject of Zebehr Pasha, we have, on our own responsibility, after communication with the Khedive, and as a matter of military necessity, arrested Zebehr Pasha and his two sons, and made the seizure of their papers.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)

QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is now in a position to make any statement to the House as to the settlement of the Egyptian financial arrangements?

EARL GRANVILLE: A Declaration embracing the whole agreement between the Powers has been signed this afternoon, and to-morrow Her Majesty's Government hope to sign the Financial Convention embraced in that Declaration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Will these Papers be laid upon the Table of the House with the Egyptian Papers?

EARL GRANVILLE: Yes; and as soon as possible.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th March, 1885.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEES—Army (Commissariat and Transport Services), appointed and nominated; Town Parks (Ireland), Motion for Appointment [House counted out].

PUBLIC BILLS.—Second Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) 1884. Committee—Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), (re-comm.) [49]—A.P. [Fifth Night].

QUESTIONS.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS—PRICE OF BARLEY IN 1884.

MR. HICKS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he can state the number of quarters of barley returned in 1884 as having been sold at and below 32s. a quarter, and the number of quarters returned as having been sold at a price exceeding 32s. a quarter; and, whether he can state the lowest and the highest price per quarter of barley returned in 1884?

Mr. J. HOLMS (who replied) said: I regret to say that I am unable to give the information asked for by the hon. Member. It could only be obtained by the examination of several hundred thousand entries; and the Return would consequently be extremely troublesome and costly.

PRISONS BOARD (IRELAND).

Mr. HASTINGS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the constitution of the Irish Prisons Board has been altered by the reduction of one of the two paid members; and, whether it is intended to adopt the further proposal made by the Chairman of that Board to the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons, that his own powers should be increased and those of his colleague be diminished; and, if so, whether the instructions defining the respective powers of the Chairman and the other paid member will be laid before the House?

Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS asked, whether any steps had been taken to give effect to any of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons; and, if so, what steps?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: One of the three paid members of the Prisons Board will retire on the 1st of April next, and his place will not be filled up. In lieu of it, a medical gentleman of experience, who has been for some years an Inspector under the Local Government Board, and who was previously Superintendent of the Orminal Lunatic Asylum at Dundrum, has been appointed to the newly-created office of Medical Officer to the Prisons Board. I presume some re-arrangement of the duties of the Board will necessarily follow upon this change; but there is no intention of increasing the powers of the Chairman. With regard to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I may say that steps are being taken to carry out a great many of the recommendations of the Commission—as many as could be carried out in such short notice. I will, however, answer more in detail and with greater accuracy if the right hon. Gentleman will give Notice of his Question.

Mr. Hicks

Sir R. ASSHETON CROSS: I will put the Question on Monday week.

THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE— ADMISSION.

Mr. D. GRANT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether a Despatch has been received by the Secretary of State for India from the Government of India, stating its views on the subject of the rules for admission to the Indian Civil Service, and of the Statutory Civil Service; and, if so, whether any reply to that Despatch has been sent by the Secretary of State; and, whether he will lay the Documents upon the Table of the House?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: There has been Correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on the subject referred to. It is not yet complete, and as the matter is still under consideration, it is not expedient that the documents should be laid on the Table of the House.

PRISONS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1877— APPOINTMENT OF PRISON CHAPLAINS.

Mr. A. R. D. ELLIOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the case that, by the Prisons (Scotland) Act, 1877, the appointment of prison chaplain is restricted to ministers and licentiates of the Established Church; and, if so, whether the Government will endeavour to pass a Bill abolishing this restriction?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): It is the case that by Section 10 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act, 1877, the appointment of prison chaplain is restricted to ministers and licentiates of the Established Church. The Bill was passed by the late Government. In the present state of Public Business, I am unable to hold out any prospect that a Bill dealing with the subject of prisons will be introduced this Session.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF BEATTY AND MR. WILLIAMS AT ARMAGH ASSIZES.

Mr. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, on the trial of the Orangemen, Mitchell Beatty and M'Williams, at Armagh Assizes, charged with having caused the death of Francis Hughes, a Catholic, the petty jury consisted of eleven Protestants and one Catholic, who from his name was believed by the Crown officials to be a Protestant; whether the jury found the accused guilty of "common assault;" whether Mr. Kilkelly, the Crown Solicitor, on the calling of the jury directed Mr. John O'Hare, of Catherine Street, Newry, an extensive building contractor, and by religion a Catholic, to stand aside; whether as Mr. O'Hare resides at a considerable distance from the scene of the occurrence, and as he had no connection with any of the parties, there was any exception to him except his religion; and, whether the Crown Solicitor of county Armagh has received instructions to exclude all Catholics from juries, or whether in doing so he is acting on his own responsibility; and, if the latter, is his conduct approved?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The Crown Solicitor informs me that he does not know, and made no inquiries about the religious persuasion of any of the jurors in the case referred to in the Question. The jury found two of the accused guilty of a common assault. Mr. Kilkelly did direct Mr. O'Hare to stand aside, not on account of his religion, of which he had no knowledge, but because he was a licensed vintner. The Crown Solicitor has no such instructions as are referred to in the last paragraph. I may add he is himself a Roman Catholic.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the observations of Mr. Justice Johnson at Armagh Assizes on the 11th March, on the trial of Thomas Mitchell, Robert Beatty, and Henry M'Williams, charged with an assault on Francis Hughes which caused the death of said Francis Hughes, wherein the judge said that—"If the grand jury had the evidence before them which had been given in that Court, it was a proper case for them to find a bill for manslaughter," which observations are reported in The Belfast News Letter of the 12th March; whether the grand jury found a bill for assault only; and, whether the grand jury had before them all the evidence for the prosecution given on the trial; and, if not, why was not the evidence produced?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Justice Johnson made the observation referred to in the Question in answer to an argument of the prisoner's counsel. The grand jury found bills for grievous and common assault against the three accused. They had before them all the witnesses who were examined for the prosecution at the trial.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) ACT, 1883—AMENDMENT.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is the intention of Government, before the Seats Bill comes into force, to introduce a Bill amending the Corrupt Practices Act, 1883, c. 51, with reference to groups of burghs in Scotland with varying numbers, populations, and distances from each other, providing in each burgh for (1) the candidate's personal expenses; (2) expenses of printing, advertising, publishing, and issuing and distributing circulars; (3) expenses of stationery, messages, postages, and telegrams; (4) expense of holding public meetings, and paying for committee rooms and other official expenses; and (5) for paying agents, sub-agents, and other necessary officials?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): When the Corrupt Practices Act was passed in the Session before last it was understood by the Government that the provisions applicable to groups of burghs met with the full assent of the burgh Representatives from Scotland. If I rightly apprehend the Question, the suggestion of the hon. Member is that the scale of expenditure fixed by the Act should be increased in no less than five directions. I have not as yet seen any evidence that the statutory scale is inadequate. I shall, however, be glad to confer with the hon. Member and other hon. Members representing groups of burghs on the subject.

LUNACY LAWS—CASE OF MR. CHARLES HILLMAN.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Charles Hillman, an alleged lunatic, as reported in The Times of the 24th February; whether his attention has been called to the comments of Mr. Baron Huddleston, in delivering judgment, as follows:—

“Somebody—who it was we do not know, and everybody repudiates it—somebody sent the policeman and the other man with the blacksmith to the house to break open the door and take him away. Somebody had hired a carriage to take him and two men to go with him. Somebody had caused this to be done without any order, or any previous inquiry, or any personal examination: without any of the conditions prescribed by the statute to authorise the exercise of the jurisdiction, the applicant was put into a carriage and carried away to the asylum;”

and, whether he can state what action, if any, the Commissioners in Lunacy have taken in the matter. Will the complainant be left to his own resources to vindicate the Law, or will any steps be taken by the authorities to find out and punish the “somebody” to whom the learned Judge referred?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Secretary of State has called the attention of the Commissioners in Lunacy to this case; and they have reported to him that, after consideration, it appears to them that certain persons have been concerned in the unlawful taking and confinement, as an insane patient, of Mr. Charles Hillman; but they are of opinion, having before them the certificates of three medical men and the statement of the Medical Superintendent of the Lunatic Asylum for the county of Sussex, that Mr. Charles Hillman was in fact insane, and a proper person to be placed under care and treatment; and finding no evidence of malice or bad faith on the part of any of the persons referred to, they do not consider that a prima facie case exists for the prosecution of such persons.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will inform the House whether the details of the Redistribution of Seats Bill are the same as those originally drafted and laid before those Members of the Government and of the Opposition who met last year to come to an arrangement on the Bill; and, if not, whether he will inform the House what changes have been made?

Mr. W. J. Corbett

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am sorry I cannot give the information for which the hon. Baronet asks. I can only say that the draft scheme of the Government was greatly changed at the meetings which took place. I should not feel justified in stating the form in which the scheme was first placed before the conference of the Leaders.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—ACCELERATION OF THE MAILS BETWEEN BELFAST AND NEWTOWNARDS.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Postmaster General, Whether he received a memorial from the Town Commissioners of Newtownards (county Down) in December 1884, complaining of the alteration in the postal arrangements in that town; whether he is aware that, under the old arrangement, letters were posted at Newtownards at 10.20 A.M. and delivered in Belfast soon after 12 o'clock, whereas, under the present altered arrangement, letters are posted at Newtownards at 1.30, and are not delivered in Belfast until after 4 P.M. thereby causing the greatest inconvenience and loss to the business community of Newtownards; and, whether he can see his way to remedy this just cause of complaint?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The delivery in Belfast, which formerly commenced at 12.25 P.M., has, since the acceleration of the English Mail, via Dublin, commenced three-quarters of an hour earlier, and the train from Newtownards does not now arrive in time for the Newtownards letters to be included in the delivery as formerly. If the Railway Company could see their way to bring the train from Newtownards into Belfast earlier the difficulty would be met, and I will have further inquiry made on this point.

LAW AND POLICE—SUNDAY NEWS-VENDORS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will now instruct the Police to protect the public, more especially on Sunday mornings, from the great and increasing nuisance of itinerant newsvendors crying their goods in the streets?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am as sensible as my hon. Friend of the nuisance to which his Question refers; but I am sorry to say the police have no power to put a stop to it.

Mr. SEXTON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman thought that it was a nuisance to the considerable section of the public who wished to purchase newspapers?

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a large number of the working classes in London and other cities had no time except on Sundays to read newspapers?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My answer had no reference to the Sunday part of the question; that is a matter of Sunday trading which it is very difficult to deal with. I understood the Question to refer generally to the extraordinary noise. I wish newsvendors would find means of conducting their business in a more tranquil, and I may say more accurate, manner.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIAN RAILWAY.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can state what point the Russian Railway from the Caspian towards Sarakhs has reached; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have information as to the movement of Russian forces from Samarcand towards Balkh?

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am not able to say to what exact point the railway is now in working order; but it is being pushed forward to Akabad. Her Majesty's Government have no information as to the movement of Russian troops towards Balkh.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Are we really to understand that at this crisis Her Majesty's Government have no accurate information with regard to the exact position to which the Russian railway is completed?

[No reply.]

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I will repeat this Question on Monday next.

Mr. ONSLOW gave Notice that he would ask whether Her Majesty's Government could not obtain some information upon this subject from the British Minister at Teheran?

NAVY—SERVICE UNDER STEAM.

Sir HARRY VERNEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there is a Standing Order from the Admiralty that, unless otherwise ordered, the ordinary service under steam is always to be performed at the most economical rate of steaming; and, whether he is of opinion that such order tends to the efficiency of the Navy as much as when, as formerly, the utmost rapidity consistent with perfect performance was the rule and practice of the Navy?

Mr. CAINE: Yes, Sir; there is an order that the ordinary service under steam is to be performed at the most economical rate of steaming. Large discretionary powers are given to the commanding officer. It is considered that this order tends to the efficiency of the Navy.

LAW AND POLICE.—ARREST OF JAMES STEPHENS.

Mr. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY (for Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it was at the instance of the English Government that Mr. James Stephens has been placed under arrest by the French police authorities; whether Mr. Stephens's opinions are opposed to what is termed the "dynamite policy," and that he has repeatedly expressed and published his disapproval of such policy; whether the Government will at once intimate its desire to the French authorities to have Mr. Stephens set at liberty before permanent injury be done him; and, whether the recent arrest of Mr. James Stephens in Paris was due to any suggestions or promptings of Her Majesty's Government?

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: The arrest referred to in this Question was not made at the instance, or, indeed, with the knowledge, of the English Government at all. As to the second part of the Question, as far as I know, the statement as to Stephens's opinions upon the use of dynamite is correct. As far as regards the last part of the Question, it is not a matter in which the Government would think themselves justified in interfering with the action of the French authorities; and from information which has reached me—not official information—Stephens is not in custody, nor is he in France, but was ordered to leave the territory, and I believe he has done so.

CENTRAL ASIA—ENGLAND AND RUSSIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRON-TIER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the new agreement between the British and Russian Governments is still in force; whether any advance of the Russian troops has taken place since the date of that agreement; whether this agreement in any way recognises that Penjdeh, Ak-Rabat, and Zulfagar, are on debatable territory; and, whether he can now, consistently with the public interest, state that Her Majesty's Ministers intend to protect the absolute integrity of all Afghan territory, including these important positions, from Russian occupation and influence, in accordance with their own pledges and those of the Czar's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I believe that there has been no forward movement of Russian troops since the Russian Government agreed that no advance should take place. The agreement does not touch on the question of the ultimate possession of the places mentioned. As I informed the hon. Member yesterday, it would not be in the public interest to make any declaration of the nature suggested by him.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Prime Minister whether he could answer the last part of the Question?

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. GIBSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Has the Government yet received any, and, if so, what reply to the telegram of Lord Granville, sent on Saturday to the Russian Government, asking for a confirmation of the Prime Minister's statement on Friday last?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether an answer has been received from the Government of Russia on the subject of the agreement or arrangement, shadowed forth in the Despatch of the 5th of March, from Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, for the governance of the Russian and Afghan forces on the frontiers of Afghanistan; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table the precise terms of the agreement or arrangement?

MR. GLADSTONE: The two Questions are very nearly identical in substance, and I will answer both at once. Under the circumstances stated yesterday to the House, after having consulted Lord Granville on the subject, a telegram was sent to St. Petersburg; and, although it is an exceptional thing to do, I will read the telegram in reply—which arrived late last night—in the exact form in which it will appear in the Papers. It is to this effect—

"The Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs states that the Russian troops will not advance from the positions now occupied by them, provided the Afghan forces do not advance or attack, or unless in case of some extraordinary reason—such, for instance, as disturbances at Penjdeh. He also states that the strictest orders have been sent to the Russian commander to avoid by every possible means a conflict, or any incitement to a conflict, and that the orders will be repeated."

We accept this communication as made in good faith, and, of course, as applicable both sides, to both parties; and acting upon our responsibility in the conduct of what I described as a National and Imperial policy, I and my Colleagues deprecate any pressure for further explanations at this juncture.

MR. GIBSON: Are we to understand from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government reserve to themselves on behalf of the Afghans the same right which the Russian Government retain for themselves of advancing "for some extraordinary reason?" I also wish to ask if the Prime Minister feels himself in a position to say whether this provisional arrangement would at all interfere with the business of the Boundary Commission, and when the Commission may be expected to have completed its work?

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect to the first part of the Question, I thought I had disposed of it by saying that we accept the arrangement as applicable on both sides. As regards the second point, I think I drew the other day a distinction between the case of a military advance which, however serious in itself, has no bearing whatever on the matter of right—I drew a distinction between that question and the question of right at issue between the two countries, and which, therefore, has been treated by us entirely apart. I accept the arrangement that has been made as fair, and I do not conceive that it can have any effect but that of facilitating the course of the inquiries. With regard to the precise position of those inquiries, I am correct, I think, in saying that General Lumsden has made very considerable progress in what hitherto was quite unknown in that country—namely, the actual tracing of the frontier; but I would rather not give any information on that point.

Mr. M'COAN asked whether Her Majesty's Government accepted this conditional agreement in satisfaction of their former demand that the Russians should withdraw from the positions they occupied?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: The Prime Minister has stated that the Russian Government have sent orders to their officer commanding on the frontier. Can he inform us, without prejudice to the public interest, whether the Russian Government are in communication with their officers on the frontier, or how soon the orders sent will reach them?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I cannot state the precise time which it takes for a message from St. Petersburg to reach the Russian Commander; but the communication made to us is perfectly unequivocal and frank—first, upon the point that the strictest orders have been given; and, secondly, upon the point that they will be repeated. I have not the slightest doubt that they will be repeated.

Baron HENRY DE WORMS: Is it not a fact that it is over 200 miles from the nearest telegraph station to where the Russian troops now are?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I do not know the precise distance.

Mr. ONSLOW: May I ask whether the substance of the agreement or arrangement arrived at with Russia is to the effect that the Russians have determined not to advance into what they consider the proper boundary of Afghanistan; or that they will not advance from the positions they now occupy?

Mr. GLADSTONE: That is disposed of by the words of the telegram I have read. I will repeat them again—“The Russian troops will not advance from the positions now occupied by them.”

Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask whether this agreement is to rest merely on the verbal assurance of the Russian Minister to Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg, or whether it is to be consigned in any formal way into a diplomatic document?

Mr. GLADSTONE: It is difficult to answer a question of that kind. The reply has come to us by telegraph from St. Petersburg, and I cannot doubt that it is a perfectly authentic statement.

Mr. E. STANHOPE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to the statement of the Government in December last, that a communication had been addressed to the Government of Russia pressing for the withdrawal of the Russian troops from the position they then occupied beyond Sarakhs, whether any answer has been received to that communication; and, if not, whether it has been withdrawn?

Mr. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend is substantially quite correct in the reference he makes to what passed on a former occasion, when my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated, I think in November, that we had pressed the Russian Government to withdraw from the position which they then occupied beyond Sarakhs. Then he asks “whether any answer has been received to that communication; and, if not, whether it has been withdrawn?” Upon that communication a correspondence ensued, and the Russians declined to withdraw their troops. They gave certain explanations about them, but declined to withdraw them; and they founded their answer upon the belief they entertained that the territory is theirs, and that they claim it as a matter of right. We, of course, had addressed a requisition to them in the belief that it was Afghan territory; but that being the state of the case, as the Russians made a serious claim to be the rightful possessors of the territory, we could do nothing in the matter consistently, I think, either with prudence or with any honourable regard to the interests of peace, except to prosecute measures for bringing about a proper investigation and decision of the claim that had been preferred. It was a presumptive claim, it was repeated by the Russian answer, and then it put us upon another course of procedure; and that being so, undoubtedly there has been—I will not say actually a withdrawal of the requisition—but substantially it comes to the same thing. The application that was made has lapsed from the circumstances of the case, and on account of the contentions that are raised on the two sides respectively.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I understand this communication, addressed to the Russian Government, was to the effect that before Her Majesty's Government would resume negotiations, they should withdraw their troops from the positions they then occupied beyond the boundary. The Russian troops, we are told now, have not been withdrawn, the Russian Government refusing to withdraw them; but Her Majesty's Government have resumed negotiations.

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a matter I will not trust my memory to answer without a further reference, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give Notice of the Question.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Substantially, as I understand, we made a demand. Have we withdrawn that demand; and are we satisfied with the reasons given why the Russians would not withdraw?

MR. GLADSTONE: We made a demand unquestionably, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, in the belief that the territory was Afghan territory. We found that that was the matter in contest—that it was part of the very matter that had to be decided in a regular, pacific, and, I hope, friendly inquiry. That being so, there certainly was no formal act of withdrawal; but substantially the demand was withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps have been taken to inform the Ameer of Afghanistan of the "new agreement" arrived at between England and Russia?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have no particular information on that subject. All we know is that Sir Peter Lumsden is in constant communication with the Ameer, and we have not the slightest doubt that he has communicated with him in reference to this matter.

MR. ONSLOW asked if Sir Peter Lumsden had been communicated with on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware of that. It would be much more convenient if the hon. Gentleman would kindly address the Departmental Ministers on the subject.

MR. ONSLOW gave Notice that on Thursday he should ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government had communicated the agreement between Russia and Her Majesty's Government to Sir Peter Lumsden with instructions that he should inform the Ameer that such an agreement had been come to?

EGYPT—THE MAHDI.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have arrived at any definite conclusion on the terms to be exacted from the Mahdi and his adherents as conditions of peace; and, if so, whether, in order to avoid further expense and bloodshed, Her Majesty's Government will instruct Lord Wolseley to take steps to make such terms known to the Mahdi and Osman Digna before resuming offensive operations?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it would not be expedient on the part of the Government to enter into any statement as to the terms on which it would be possible for us to make any agreement with the Mahdi. If the hon. Gentleman will kindly refer to a statement previously made by me on the part of the Government, he will find that I stated it is our conviction that any attempt on our part to approach the Mahdi, even with the best possible intentions, would be much more likely to defeat the object in view than to effect it. That state of things still exists; but I am not aware that we have either repelled any advances from the other side or lost any opportunity on our part.

ARMY—THE ROYAL INFIRMARY, DUBLIN.

MR. EATON asked the Secretary of State for War, How many deaths occurred in the Royal Infirmary, Dublin, during the first week of March 1885; if it is true that there are no Military surgeons or orderlies of the Medical Staff Corps doing duty at the Royal Infirmary, and the patients are attended by untrained soldiers from the various regiments in the garrison; if it is true that, under the former regimental system, trained regimental hospital orderlies would have been available to attend patients belonging to their own regiments; and, if he will take steps to provide trained female nurses to attend to the more serious cases in the Royal Infirmary and other large Military hospitals?

Mr. Gladstone

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: During the first week of March two deaths occurred in the Royal Infirmary, Dublin. According to the latest Returns, there were on duty in this hospital one surgeon-major in charge, four civilian surgeons, one sergeant of the Medical Staff Corps, with orderlies from Line regiments. It is quite true that under the former system the hospital orderlies would have been drawn from the regiments, and that they would have had a certain amount of hospital training, though far less than is now given to men of the Medical Staff Corps. Under that system, during war the regimental hospitals at home would have had their own orderlies; but in the field the trained orderlies would have had to be largely supplemented by untrained men, on whom the base hospitals would probably have entirely depended. At present, when an army is in the field, the hospitals at home afford for it an ample supply of trained orderlies, though their employment necessarily, to some extent, denudes for the time the hospitals at home. An augmentation in the female nursing staff at home is proposed in the Estimates for the ensuing year.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Agreement between the Powers with regard to the administration of Egypt has been signed; and, if so, whether he is able to communicate to the House the character of that arrangement?

MR. GLADSTONE: I was rising from my seat at the moment when the right hon. Baronet rose to make some observations on this very matter. I take this opportunity of thanking the right hon. Gentleman and those who sit round him for the great consideration which they have shown in refraining from putting Questions on this particular subject. The delay has been a very long delay, and certainly much longer than I expected it would be when Questions were at first put to me. But at last I am happy to say that these deliberations have come to a close. I would observe, with reference to the words used by the right hon. Baronet, that it is an Agreement, not for the administration of Egypt, but for the regulation of the finances of that country. The matter is now substantially closed, and a Declaration relating to the Agreement has been signed to-day at the Foreign Office by all the Ambassadors who assembled there, and the Convention itself is to be signed to-morrow. With regard to the nature of the Convention, it would not, I think, be convenient that I should attempt to enter upon it now, nor could I, perhaps, give a perfectly accurate account of it on all points. Papers are in progress of preparation with all possible speed, and will be laid upon the Table at the earliest possible moment. In the course of to-morrow or the next day my noble Friend, I daresay, will be able to state the precise date when those Papers will be presented. I can assure the House that we are most anxious not to lose a moment; and when they are laid upon the Table we shall be equally anxious not to lose a moment in bringing the matter under the notice of the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: As the printing of the Papers must take some time, it would be greatly for the public convenience if we could be furnished, without delay, with information as to the general character of the Agreement that has been made.

MR. GLADSTONE: The remark of the right hon. Baronet is quite just. It is desirable that the House should have as much time as possible for examining the matter; and I will consider what, upon the whole, would be the most convenient course to adopt.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I will put a Question on the subject to-morrow.

MR. GORST: Could not this particular Paper be printed separately?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is just what I am going to consider.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES—REPORT OF THE CHIEF REGISTRAR, 1883.

MR. ACLAND asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to the concluding paragraphs of Part VII. of the Report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, 1883, page 20, with reference to the sale by sheets of the Abstract therein referred to; and, whether he is willing to take any, and, if so, what, steps to carry out the suggestion made in the concluding paragraph?

MR. HIBBERT: The paragraphs referred to relate to matters upon which the Treasury has for some time been in communication with the Chief Registrar, and we shall be glad if arrangements can be made to carry out his views.

MR. ACLAND asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to Part XI. of the Report referred to in the preceding Question, which deals with the Independent Mutual Brethren Society; and, whether the Returns of that Society establishes its ability, as now re-organised, to discharge its present liabilities to its members?

MR. HIBBERT: I have read the paragraphs of Mr. Ludlow's Report which refer to this Society, and have nothing to add to them. The Government is not responsible for the solvency of Friendly Societies; and my hon. Friend will hardly expect me to express an opinion on the subject.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 49.]

(Mr. Gladstone, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Attorney General, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th March.]

[FIFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

REDISTRIBUTION.

Boroughs.

Clause 8 (Division of Parliamentary boroughs).

MR. RITCHIE: Several attempts have been made on more than one occasion to ascertain from the Government what they consider to be the vital points of the Bill; but these attempts have always failed, or have been met evasively. It is evident to the Committee, however, that the Government are clearly determined to maintain the Bill, as it has been presented to the House, not only on questions of principle, but also on questions of even what some of us consider matters of merely minor detail. I am one of those who have always advocated, as strongly as I could, the arrange-ment in the matter which was ultimately come to between the Government and the Leaders of the Opposition, and I have not changed my opinion that that arrangement was a desirable one to come to, and that it was good for all parties concerned. But I am bound to say that the extremely hard-and-fast manner in which the Government seem determined to draw the lines of the agreement is calculated to militate strongly against any future proposal for entering into such an arrangement. We certainly did expect that there would have been some amount of elasticity in regard to questions of detail. But in whatever way these hard-and-fast lines may have been applicable to other matters which have come before the Committee on previous clauses of the Bill, I venture to say that the Government will find great difficulty in taking up that position in reference to the Amendment I have placed upon the Paper. Certainly nothing that may be said either by the Government or by the Members of the Front Bench below me upon the Amendment I am about to move can show that it is objectionable because it involves a departure from the principles contained in the Bill. So far from that being so, I believe it will be admitted both by the Government and the Front Opposition Bench that the Amendment I am about to move is one which carries out in its entirety one of the main principles, if not the main principle, of the Bill. That being the case, the Amendment which I have to move is one which not only ought not to be objected to by either Party to the agreement, but which ought to be welcomed by both Parties. I do not think I am wrong in stating that the principle of single-Member constituencies is one of the main principles, if not the main principle, of the measure. It was so described by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the division of constituencies into single-Member constituencies was one of the main principles of the Bill. The question then for consideration has reference solely to that principle. I may say that I do not wish to pause here to discuss whether it is a good principle or a bad principle—for my own part, I think it a good principle, and a principle the House ought to accept; but I can understand that there are Gentlemen in the House who may consider that the principle is not a good one. I can understand that there are many reasons why hon. Members should arrive at a conclusion of that kind. All I would lay down on this particular principle is this—that as Her Majesty's Government and those who negotiated this compromise with them have considered it a good principle, this good principle should be applied to every constituency dealt with by the measure. How is it applied by the Bill, as it stands, at present? Every county is divided into single-Member constituencies. All the new boroughs are divided, and all the old boroughs which are allowed to receive an additional Member are also divided into single-Member districts; but there is this singular and, I venture to say, ridiculous anomaly in the system—that while the old boroughs which are to have additional Members and the new boroughs which are to be created under the Bill are to be divided into single constituencies, the old boroughs returning two Members are to be left undivided. The old boroughs which have had one Member added to them are to be divided into single-Member districts. I venture to say that this is a ridiculous and absurd anomaly, and I cannot conceive what possible argument can be used in support of it. I have inquired of many hon. Members on both sides of the House what argument can be advanced in support of the proposition contained in the Bill; but I can find no one who has been able to put forward a single reason or argument why these exceptions should be made. As far as I have looked into the matter there are 23 boroughs which will stand in the condition of dual constituencies, while all the other boroughs will be single-Member constituencies. So far as I can gather the only basis upon which this proposition is made in the Bill is the one stated by the Prime Minister when he introduced it—namely, that the unity of municipal life ought to be maintained in these boroughs. But what argument can the right hon. Gentleman employ for maintaining the municipal life of a borough like Dundee, and destroying the municipal life of a borough like Aberdeen? Dundee, being a borough which now returns two Members, is to be allowed to remain uncut up, while Aberdeen, which is a borough very similar in many respects to that of Dundee, is to receive an additional Member, and is to be divided into two single-Member constituencies. Surely the municipal life, of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, will be destroyed in the case of Aberdeen by cutting up that city into two districts? Then, again, let me take the case of Leicester and Nottingham. What possible argument is there for maintaining the municipal life of Leicester and destroying the municipal life of Nottingham? I might go on multiplying these cases considerably, but I think the illustrations I have given are sufficient. If there be advantages in cutting up the municipal life of some boroughs they must equally apply to all boroughs. When the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister introduced the Bill he recommended the single-Member system. He recommended it on the ground that it would be economical. Then I want to know why, if elections in single-Member districts will be attended with economy, the principle is to be applied to Aberdeen and not to Dundee, and why it should be applied to Nottingham and not to Leicester? The right hon. Gentleman stated also that the single-Member principle went a very long way towards that which many hon. Gentlemen have at heart—namely, what is termed the representation of minorities, the representation of separate interests and pursuits, and that the adoption of the principle would lead to a large diversity of representation. Then I want to know why the 23 boroughs I have spoken of are not to enjoy that large diversity of representation which the right hon. Gentleman says is a capital object in a good electoral system? As far as I can gather there is no possible argument in favour of preserving the dual representation in the case of these 23 boroughs, and I am unable to see why the advantages which the right hon. Gentleman says, and says truly, are conferred by the one-Member system are advantages which ought not to be applied to all the boroughs of England alike. As far as the argument is concerned, I maintain that it is altogether in one way. My Amendment involves no departure, whatever, from the principle of the Bill, but simply an extension of that principle to the whole of the Bill. I also contend that it is an anomaly to have 23 boroughs excluded from the general principle of the measure; but although it is an anomaly, I do not ask the Committee to reject it on that ground. I am not one of those who desire to see the Constitution of this country set out as a mathematical problem. I am not afraid of acknowledging that I have some regard myself for anomalies; but for this particular anomaly I cannot for the life of me see the slightest reason why it should be adopted, or why it should be considered a vital principle of the Bill by either one side of the House or the other. If the Committee will consent to my proposal, which is simply that all boroughs returning two or more Members should be divided into divisions, they will do away with a glaring anomaly for the existence of which no reason whatever can be assigned. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper.

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 36, to leave out the words "mentioned in the Sixth Schedule to this Act," and insert the words "returning two or more Members,"—(Mr. Ritchie),
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member has pressed the Government very much to state whether this matter is regarded as one of those vital points which entered into the agreement between the two Parties, and I therefore think it is only right that I should say that it is a vital point of the agreement, and that the adoption of the Amendment would be a breach of the agreement. The hon. Member seemed to think that the Government have determined to draw a line, hard and sharp, with regard to Amendments, in consequence of the agreement between the two Parties, and to apply it rigidly to all hon. Members who wish in any way to alter the clauses as they appear in the Bill. Now, Sir, I hope that as we go on in Committee the hon. Member will find we are by no means disposed to draw the line rigidly, but that we shall be ready to accept, freely, Amendments which do not interfere with general principles or with the lines of the Bill, and which meet with the approval of the House. When Amendments are in their natural place on the Schedules, hon. Members will find that there is a disposition on the part of the Government to meet what may be the general and freely expressed wish of the House. The hon. Member has spoken of the matter now before the Committee as if it were one of mere detail; but the view that is taken of single-Member districts is, as he has fairly stated, that the boroughs generally, as well as the counties, should be divided into single-Member districts, except the City of London, and except those boroughs which, having two Members at the present time, are not to receive more than two by the Bill—that is, boroughs which gain no advantage by the Bill. I would freely admit to the hon. Member that the arrangement that has been arrived at on this subject is somewhat of a compromise between opinions of different kinds. There are persons on that side of the House, as was shown by the cheers with which the speech of the hon. Member was received, and others also on this side, who are in favour of single-Membered constituencies, while, on the other hand, there are persons of both political opinions who are opposed to them. These differences of opinion are naturally reflected in any body of persons who may act on behalf of the different political Parties in the State. As I have said, I freely admit to the hon. Member that the arrangement to which he objects is somewhat in the nature of a compromise. I am, myself, like the hon. Member, in favour of single-Membered constituencies. I believe in them in principle, and I have argued in favour of them in discussions which have taken place in this House. But there is a great deal to be said in favour of departing from that principle, if you once adopt the principle of excepting any constituencies in any part of the Bill from the general rule. The hon. Member has pointed out that we retain in the Bill the second seat in the ascending scale of boroughs up to the point of 50,000, which gives two Members, and that in those cases we divide the constituencies to which the additional seat is given into two separate districts. He asks why, as a logical conclusion, we do not adopt the same course in regard to the boroughs which have two seats already, and which are still to retain two under the Bill. Now, the general principle we have adopted has been to interfere as little as possible with existing interests in the middle size constituencies. We have displayed great tenderness towards them, both in regard to boroughs and counties. The hon. Member has asked upon what principle—if there is any argument or principle at all—we have been guided in the system we have adopted. We desire, as little as possible, to interfere with the unity of the boroughs which are given Representatives under this Bill. The hon. Member desires to secure the representation of minorities by providing single-Membered districts. So do I. But while it is easy to secure the fair representation of minorities in boroughs which are to have their Members increased, in boroughs having already two Members that is far less easy, for if there is a minority of a considerable size, the result, of course, would be that the minority would obtain far more than its fair share, and would, consequently, neutralize the political influence of the borough. Therefore, the representation of minorities on the single-Membered system does not apply so completely to boroughs with two Members as to boroughs having more than two Members. The hon. Member has drawn a sharp comparison between the boroughs of Dundee and Aberdeen and the boroughs of Leicester and Nottingham. Aberdeen is one of the boroughs which is to gain a double representation under this Bill, and in consideration of that fact it was thought fair that Aberdeen should be asked to submit to division into two parts. So also in the case of Leicester and Nottingham. Leicester gains no new representation, while Nottingham gains an additional Member. We have tried as little as possible to depart unnecessarily from existing arrangements. If we were to listen to the wishes of the constituencies, there can be no doubt at all that those which do not receive an accession of strength in their representation by this Bill greatly dislike the idea of being divided into equal parts. As far as I know, there is only one exception—only one out of the 23 boroughs spoken of by the hon. Member is inclined to favour a division into two parts, and that from local and personal reasons. All the others—22 out of 23—are opposed to the idea of division. Their view is not confined to one political Party in the State, but is shared generally by all political Parties and by the municipal authorities. Under these circumstances, I would ask the Committee to reject the Amendment of the hon. Member; but, in making that request, I will assure the hon. Member that he will find no indisposition to meet the views of the Committee generally later on in the Bill, when we come to the Schedules.

Mr. Ritchie

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I have listened with surprise to the greater part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I was aware that the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) was an Amendment inconsistent with the terms of the agreement entered into between the two Parties, and I was, of course, prepared to find that the right hon. Gentleman would call upon us, under the terms of the agreement, to resist the Amendment, and I myself was prepared to do so on being so called upon. But there was one expression of the right hon. Gentleman which somewhat surprised me, and which renders it necessary for me, at all events, to rise, in order to prevent any misunderstanding on the part of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the proposal with regard to these 23 boroughs is in the nature of a compromise. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he, for his own part, is in favour of single-Member constituencies. Now, if these statements are allowed to stand without any comment, it might seem to imply that there had been a difficulty between the Government and the Opposition, and that it was the Conservative negotiators who objected to that principle of single-Member constituencies. I think the more accurate account would be this. Both the Marquess of Salisbury and myself were anxious to introduce the system of single-Member districts. We considered that single-Member districts would have many advantages, and among them the great advantage of aiding in a satisfactory way, to a certain extent, the representation of minorities. After consideration upon that subject, the Government agreed to accept the principle we had striven for. It was very doubtful, however, at that time how far the principle of serve it would be attended with great disadvantages in other respects. But with regard to the towns which now return two Members, and are to continue to return two Members under the Bill, the considerations which have operated in our minds have been two. First of all, the desire of the towns themselves to have unity of representation is not an unimportant element. Speaking generally, I believe there is a strong desire on the part of the towns which now return two Members, and which are to continue to return two, to have their unity preserved. That, as I have said, is an important element in the consideration of the matter, and we think that, unless some stronger reasons exist than have already been shown, and which may be applied to the case, it is not desirable to interfere with the municipal and historical unity of these communities. My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) has shown, I think, that there is a different reason which tells another way. Where you have a large town divided into five or six districts, the presumption would be that the different interests would obtain fair representation according to their magnitude and influence. Undoubtedly, it is very likely that in returning two Members, and where parties are almost equally divided, each party should return one Member, and in that case the minority would get more than it was entitled to. I admit that that is often the case now in particular towns, but it is done by the free will of the entire community. I do not object to the letting in of a second Member, although he may represent a somewhat smaller number of voters than those represented by his Colleague, provided it is done by the free will of the entire community. In the three-Member county constituencies, before the Minority Clause was introduced, where each elector had the power of giving three votes, if you will inquire into the history of the matter from the time of the first Reform Bill, it will be found that the majority had the means of appropriating the whole of the representation; but there have been a large number of cases since the Reform Bill where the minority has been allowed, under the Minority Clause, to obtain a share in the representation. Under all the circumstances of the case,

[Fifth Night.]

I trust that the Committee will give its sanction to the Bill in its present state.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER said, he was afraid that unless the Government consented to give way, the Committee would have to submit to the anomaly which had been pointed out by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). As, however, he represented a constituency (York which was largely interested in the question, he hoped to be allowed to say a few words upon it. The Bill was founded on the democratic theory that each Party of the State should be properly represented. As objections were entertained against proportional representation, or any similar system for the representation of minorities, the Government and the Opposition Leaders had agreed to adopt what was called the single-seat system. It was quite true that many hon. Members viewed that system with daily increasing dislike; but no doubt it was the fact that, however much they disliked it, they must put up with it as they best could. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) that there was no possible argument why boroughs having more than two Representatives should be divided into single-seat constituencies, and why even counties returning two Members should also be divided into single-Member constituencies, if the same principle were not to be extended to boroughs already returning two Members, whose representation was not changed by the provisions of the Bill. He desired to point out that a great injustice might be done in a large number of places—especially where those who held Conservative and Liberal opinions were pretty equally divided—if this Amendment were not agreed to. He would take the case of York, where, in 1884, his majority was only 21. He was not supporting the Amendment from any selfish motive, because he had good reason to believe that, owing to the curious freaks in which Her Majesty's Government had indulged during the last 18 months, his majority would be increased very largely at the next Election, in consequence of the votes of a number of patriotic Liberals who valued the interests of their country above that of Party. But, be that as it might, hon. Members would admit that in a constituency like York, where the Conservative and Liberal Parties were almost equally divided, it would be a gross injustice if the opinions of each Party were not duly represented in the House of Commons. Yet, under the system proposed by the Bill, that was precisely what might happen; and if the Liberal Party in York found themselves stronger by only one vote, and all its members were whipped up by the exertions of the indefatigable 400, they might obtain both seats, and the Conservatives would have none, although the strength of the two Parties was nearly equal. It was quite evident that that would be a palpable injustice. No doubt it would be said that the same thing might happen if the borough were divided; but he would confidently assert that in no double-seated borough throughout the country, where political opinions were equally balanced, would two Liberals or two Conservatives be returned. He had not had the advantage of hearing distinctly the arguments which had been brought forward against the Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke); but he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, as far as possible, the Government had been anxious not to interfere with existing interests. He (Sir Frederick Milner) confessed that he could not see how, by dividing the two-seated boroughs, there would be any interference whatever with any existing interests. On the contrary, he thought it would promote existing interests, rather than interfere with them. The only arguments he had heard outside the House were—(1) that it might happen that if the borough were divided, there might not be the actual number of voters prescribed for the return of a Member to Parliament; (2) that if the double-seated boroughs had been divided, it would have thrown much extra trouble upon the Boundary Commissioners; and (3) that it might possibly have increased the Conservative strength. The first of those arguments was the only one worth glancing at; but he did not see how any hon. Member could argue that the fact that each Member was not returned by the prescribed number of voters allowed for each Member ought to prevent such a fair system from being introduced, the general principle being to divide the urban districts in the country upon a system which would secure uniformity as far as possible. Hitherto Her Majesty's Government had not displayed much inclination to meet the wishes of those who sat on that side of the House; but he hoped they would think twice before they rejected the Amendment, and thus perpetrate an act of injustice which would remain as a great blot upon their Bill.

[Fifth Night.]

Sir Frederick Milner

MR. WARTON said he only wanted to make one short practical observation. He was very glad indeed to hear, at the beginning of this discussion, right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House say that this question was a matter of contract between both sides. It was much to be regretted that the debate on the representation of the City of London the other evening was allowed to drag on for four hours, and, after all the discussion which took place, to find that the subject had also been a matter of bargain between the two Front Benches. It was desirable on this occasion to obviate a similar misunderstanding at the earliest opportunity.

MR. HICKS said that he had an Amendment upon the Paper of a very similar character to the one which had been proposed by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). There was only this difference between the two Amendments—that his included the words "except the City of London." He wished to put a question to the Chairman upon a point of Order—namely, whether, if the Amendment of his hon. Friend were negatived, or the first part of that Amendment were rejected, he (Mr. Hicks) would then be able to move his Amendment? He hoped he had made himself distinctly understood. What he wanted to know was, whether, if the first part of the Amendment were negatived, he would be in Order in moving the one which stood directly afterwards in his (Mr. Hicks's) name?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the Amendment of the hon. Member is very much to the same effect as that which the Committee is now discussing. If the present Amendment is negatived, I do not think the hon. Gentleman would be in Order in moving his Amendment.

MR. HICKS said, that in that case he should like to say a few words on the subject now. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had told them that he was one of those who approved of the existing alliance between the two Front Benches. He (Mr. Hicks) was one of those who had never approved of it. He thought there was evil in it in the first instance, and the more he saw of the Bill the more he saw the liberties of the House sliding away from under their feet. Could anybody doubt it? What did the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Sir Thomas Chambers) tell them upon that day week? The hon. and learned Member maintained that if the Motion then before the Committee had been put in a free House, the four Members for the City of London would have been maintained. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; that was what the hon. and learned Member said, and he (Mr. Hicks) contended that the liberties of the House were being destroyed by the agreement between the two Front Benches. He came next to the question of the one seat. There again he differed from his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). He thought the one-seat principle was bad, and the principle which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister seemed to approve—namely, the principle of three-corner constituencies, was a much sounder one, and one that would be much better for the country. But if they were to have the single-seat constituencies, he maintained that the principle ought to be carried out universally, in the way it was to be applied to the counties and to a large number of boroughs, especially to those upon whom extended representation was to be conferred. There was no principle whatever in retaining the 23 boroughs to which reference had been made, with two seats for each borough. When the Prime Minister spoke of political life and historical life in boroughs, was there no historical life in the counties? Did not the electors in the counties desire to be retained as county voters, instead of having the counties cut up into wards with extraordinary names, which he believed the Committee would never, for one moment, retain when they came to the Schedules? If they would consult the county electors, he believed it would be found that they were unanimous in preferring to remain as counties, instead of being divided into districts. Her Majesty's Government, in this Bill, compelled them to become electors for divided constituencies, and yet they did not consider it necessary to apply their own convictions to the boroughs. Anyone who looked into the political constitution of the boroughs in question would find that the majority of Members they returned were supporters of this very truly Liberal Cabinet. For his own part he should certainly vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that after the discussion which had taken place, and after what he had heard from the two Front Benches as to this question being a matter of bargain between them, he did not feel justified in asking the Committee to divide. He was certainly desirous of maintaining the bargain as far as possible, and he would not put the Committee to the trouble of a division. He thought, however, that it was a greater anomaly than the existence of these boroughs to find that the two Front Benches were in favour of the principle for which he contended, and yet that they had come to the conclusion that it was impossible for them to support it. They had had one or two reasons given for retaining these 23 boroughs from the other side of the House; but he thought that probably the real reason and the real argument had not been mentioned—namely, that for the 23 boroughs which were proposed to be retained as dual constituencies the proportion of Representatives returned was four Liberals to one Conservative.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if it was the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment should be withdrawn? [Cries of "No!" from the Ministerial side of the House.]

Mr. RITCHIE said, that as the Committee would not allow the Amendment to be withdrawn he should certainly take a division upon it.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 233; Noes 44: Majority 209.—(Div. List, No. 67.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: Before this clause is agreed to, I am anxious to say a few words to the Committee. The House has allowed myself and hon.

[Fifth Night.]

Members who agree with me to lay our views on proportional representation fully before it, and I do not propose to restate the case.

MR. HICKS rose to Order. He was afraid that, by an accident, the Chairman had overlooked his Amendment, which was to omit the 3rd sub-section of the clause. He had certainly not heard the Chairman call upon him to move it?

THE CHAIRMAN expressed his regret that he had overlooked the Amendment.

MR. HICKS said, he presumed he would be at liberty to move it now?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid that the error I have committed, and which I sincerely regret, will prevent the hon. Member from moving the Amendment, the Question having been put, "That Clause 8 stand part of the Bill." It will, however, be open for the hon. Member to make any remarks he desires to offer to the Committee.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: Sir, the House has been kind enough to allow us to lay our views on proportional representation fully before it; and though this clause raises other considerations, and if the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) goes to a division, I shall, of course, vote with him, still I do not propose to trouble the Committee by restating the case. No importance is, of course, to be attached to the division which took place on my Instruction, because it was during the dinner hour. If, indeed, we had only been defeated by 100 in a full House, when we had against us the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that would be very encouraging. Moreover, though we had been deserted by one or two on whom we relied, we had received quite as many adhesions. Still we felt we could not reckon even in a full House on more than 150 to 200 Members. But, Sir, I am anxious to say one word more by way of explanation on the subject of chance. We have pointed out that if the second votes are distributed proportionally, there would be no element of chance whatever; but the mode we have suggested is somewhat shorter, and the chance which does, no doubt, theoretically exist, is infinitesimally small. We have stated that the odds would be 44,000 to 1 against chance making a difference of 100 in a constituency of 25,000. We made this assertion on the authority of Mr. Stokes, the eminent Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge. This statement has been flatly contradicted by the hon. and learned Attorney General and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. I have in vain attempted until now to induce any of our opponents to state on what authority they contradict our statement. But at length we have extracted an answer. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board seemed to regard it as a question of Oxford Mathematics versus Cambridge Mathematics, and he stated that a distinguished Oxford authority, Mr. Dodgson, "attached a far higher value to the element of chance" than Professor Stokes had done. Much surprised that Mr. Dodgson should have made any such statement, and being only anxious to arrive at the truth, I wrote to Mr. Dodgson, and asked him if he really questioned the statement we had made. In reply, he says—

"Dear Sir,—I have entire confidence in the accuracy of Professor Stokes's calculations, and fully accept his conclusion."

The statement of the right hon. Baronet, therefore, entirely breaks down, and I think the Committee and the right hon. Baronet himself will feel that we have completely substantiated our statement that the amount of the element of chance is just what we stated it to be. Whether it would be worth while to take the small amount of trouble which would completely eliminate even this minute fraction, I will not, of course, now occupy the time of the Committee by discussing. My right hon. Friend denies my statement that this Bill will multiply areas or dissociate the Parliamentary constituencies from the areas of local government. I confess I cannot understand this. Take Liverpool, for instance; it will be divided into seven constituencies. Is not this multiplying areas? In how many cases I should like to know—in how many of the whole number—will the boundaries of a constituency coincide with those of a municipality? But, Sir, though we do not propose to raise the question again, we are not convinced. In Ireland we believe the effect will be disastrous. Ulster, indeed, may, and I trust will, send Loyalist Representatives; but it is admitted on all hands that the effect of the Bill, out of Ulster, will be that our Loyalist fellow-countrymen may not obtain one, or, at any rate, not more than a single Representative. It seems unwise—might I not say it seems madness—to devise a system which will silence and exclude our friends, and give our opponents far more political power than under any just system they could fairly claim. Sir, I repeat that though we do not propose to raise the question again here, we are not convinced. The effect of this clause will be to lower the character of this House; in large districts of the country it will entirely exclude the minority from any share of representation; about once in every four General Elections it will give the minority in the country a majority in this House; and, lastly, as has been pointed out by every hon. Member from Ireland, to whichever side he may belong, it will silence and exclude our loyal fellow-countrymen in Ireland, and thus practically handing over the whole representation of Ireland, excepting parts of Ulster, to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), will render the maintenance of the Union far more difficult, or perhaps render it impossible. We have done our best to prevent this, to warn our countrymen, and to avert these misfortunes. If any exertions of ours could induce the House and the country to pause before adopting a course so suicidal, no efforts on our part would be wanting; but we feel that in this House, at least, any further struggle would be useless. We shall continue our exertions in the country; but so far as the present clause is concerned, we are unwilling to give the Committee unnecessary trouble, and will therefore content ourselves with a respectful protest, and with the expression of an earnest hope that the country may in some way be spared the evils which we foresee, but which we are powerless to avert.

Sir John Lubbock

MR. HICKS said, he very much regretted that in consequence of the unfortunate, although, he was certain, unintentional, mistake on the part of the Chairman, he was not in a position to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice in regard to Sub-section 3, and that, therefore, he was compelled to trouble the Committee with a few remarks on the subject. They had been told more than once that the Bill was not intended to deprive anyone of his vote; but this Sub-section 3 did deprive electors of their votes. It introduced an entirely new principle into the mode of carrying out the registration of the electors of the country. From the time of the first Reform Bill, persons possessing freeholds in different counties, or in different divisions of the same county, had exercised a right of voting in those several counties and in those several divisions. In this great Metropolis, which nobody could look upon but as one town, it was perfectly capable for an elector to have votes for Westminster, Marylebone, and the City of London. In the same way, the cities of Manchester and Salford were close together, and the same elector might have votes for both. But by this sub-section of Clause 3, it was for the first time proposed that this right of a person to vote in two counties or two boroughs should be abolished. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That is not so.] He Mr. Hicks) thought that he was quite right. The words were—

“Where any Parliamentary borough is divided into divisions in pursuance of this section a person shall not be registered as entitled to vote and shall not vote in more than one such division.”

That was the point, and he maintained that it involved the introduction of an entirely new principle, and that a disfranchising principle. If it was to be applied to the City of Manchester, it might be applied to counties, and to the division of counties; to counties returning two Members, and to borough districts. He thought it was the introduction, almost clandestinely, of the thin end of the wedge of the “one man one vote” principle. It was the most democratic proposal ever made in that House. It had been contended that every man had a right to a share in the representation of the country; but there was a great difference between an equal right to a share, and a right to an equal share. That was no new doctrine, nor was it a Tory doctrine. It was the opinion of a man who lived years ago, and was considered rather an advanced Member of the Radical Party—Horne Tooke. Horne Tooke said that he would give every man a vote for every bit of property he had in every parish. Horne Tooke contended, and he Mr. Hicks) thought he contended fairly, that the larger a man's property the greater the stake he had in the country, and the greater the interest. It had been contended that one man's all was equal to another man's all. But that could not be true, because the all of a man advanced in life could not be recovered, while the all of a young man of 25, if destroyed, might be recovered. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board shook his head at that statement. There was doubt that it had not been introduced into the Reform Bill of 1832, or into any subsequent Reform Bill. He found, however, that it was useless in the present temper of the Committee to oppose the clause as it stood; but he hoped on some future occasion to have the opportunity of raising the subject again.

[Fifth Night.]

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member did not quite understand the effect of the sub-section, or he would not have said that the clause was a disfranchising clause. No person was disfranchised by this sub-section. The hon. Member stated that at the present moment a man could vote for all the divisions of a county, or in two counties; so he could under this Bill. No doubt the principle was objected to, and it was intended to raise the question by Amendments to be moved later on. The hon. Member stated that, under the existing system, a person might vote in more than one Parliamentary borough. Under this Bill a man would still be able to vote for more than one Parliamentary borough, and even for a greater number of boroughs than he could vote for at present, because there would be a larger number of Parliamentary boroughs than now existed. The number of the Parliamentary boroughs in the Metropolis, for instance, was increased by the Bill seven-fold. The hon. Member stated that at present a man could vote for Salford, and also for Manchester; so he could under this Bill. The Bill disfranchised no one; but at present a man could not vote several times in Birmingham, and the Bill did not alter that state of things. A man for municipal purposes was prohibited by law from voting for every municipal division, and the municipal law was applied by the Bill to Parliamentary elections in boroughs. Probably, when they came to deal with the Amendments which proposed to prohibit persons from voting for more than one county, or more than one borough, he would find himself in the same Lobby as the hon. Member; but that question was not raised by the present sub-section.

MR. HICKS said, he had listened with great attention to the right hon. Baronet; but he still maintained that the logical consequence of this section was to disfranchise men who had property in more than one part of a borough. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of Birmingham, and had stated that no one would be disfranchised. At the present time the electors of Birmingham had three Representatives, and every elector could vote for two of them. In future the borough would be divided into wards, and each elector would only be allowed to vote for one. What he wanted to know was, why an elector, having a residence in one district and a place of business and property in another, should not be entitled to two votes as he would be under the same circumstances in Manchester and Salford? There was no principle whatever in the case; and the Government were halting on this occasion—as they did on the last clause—between two opinions.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought the hon. Member had better not insist too strongly that there was no principle in the clause. Certainly in the boroughs the rating principle prevailed, whereas in the county elections the only principle involved was the possession of property. In a borough it was far easier to defend the retention of a name on the Register than it was in a county division. There was a common authority for registration purposes in the same town; but in regard to the county registration that was not the case.

MR. GORST said, that no doubt the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) was perfectly right in stating that this clause introduced a new principle. It might not carry it further than it was carried by the present law; but if it were carried to its logical effect it would be the "one man one vote" principle. Hon. Members below the Gangway appeared to be anxious to smuggle through the Bill, without its real effect being understood. All he wanted to point out was that this was a new principle introduced into their electoral system. Hitherto no man had been debarred from voting in one Parliamentary constituency because he happened to possess a vote for another. Where the county or borough was large, and the constituencies were separated, any man could vote for each if he were upon the Register and possessed the qualification. This clause for the first time introduced this new principle—that in a limited number of constituencies carved out of what had previously been a single borough, although a man might possess votes in each separate constituency, he was prohibited by law from voting in more than one. He would not now discuss whether that principle was right or wrong. It was carried to so small an extent in the present case that it was hardly worth while fighting about except as a question of principle. He supposed that this was one of the points which had been considered and agreed to between the Leaders of both political Parties. At the same time, he must enter a protest against the danger of allowing a precedent to be set in this particular case, which, if carried to its logical consequence hereafter, would introduce a new principle into their legislation.

Mr. Hicks

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that no new principle was introduced by the clause. He thought his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) was mistaken in supposing that each ward or division of a borough was a constituency. Now, the borough was a constituency. It was only a Parliamentary town divided into divisions. The old principle was that one man might vote for more than one borough if he possessed the necessary qualification in each. That principle was still maintained; but by dividing a borough into different divisions each Member returned still remained a Representative of a borough, although for different divisions. At present, in the case of Birmingham, the Members returned were Members for Birmingham; and under this Bill the Members for Birmingham would not be Members of different constituencies in the borough, but for the borough of Birmingham. The only difference would be that, whereas at present each Member for the borough was one out of three, he would in future be one out of eight, and no elector would lose any portion of the privilege he now enjoyed.

Mr. MACARTNEY said, that the right hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Bench maintained that there was a principle in the Bill, whereas his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) maintained that there was no principle in it. Now, he did not altogether agree with his hon. Friend. He was reminded of the man who spoke of the seven senses, who, when told that there were only five, said—"Yes, there are five ordinary senses, but in addition to the five there are good sense and bad sense." In the same way he maintained that in this Bill there was a principle; but it was an abominable, bad, and unfair one. At present, if there were two Members, each elector could vote for two; but under this Bill no voter would be able to vote for more than one. It was all very well to say that the same elector might vote in different county divisions, or in different boroughs; but how would that be possible if it were provided that all the elections took place on the same day? Such a provision would effectually prevent persons who had votes for different constituencies from exercising the franchise. It certainly seemed to him that the Bill disfranchised those who ought to have a vote, and enfranchised those who ought not to have it.

Mr. NORWOOD desired to call attention to what he believed to be an omission in the Bill. Under the Bill, however many qualifications a man might possess in the same borough, he would only be able to vote for one district. He failed, however, to see that there was any provision made by which the Revising Barrister could prescribe the district in which such voter should record his vote. In the case of a borough returning three Members in three separate wards or divisions there would be a considerable number of persons who would possess the necessary qualification for a vote in each division. Certainly the division in which such persons should exercise the vote ought not to be left to chance; and he could not help feeling that there ought to be some provision giving the voter the option of signifying the district in which he desired to vote, or failing such an expression of opinion on the part of the voter, the Revising Barrister should have the right of assigning the voter to any division he thought right. For instance, if a man had a residence in one division, and did not express a desire to exercise the vote in another, an arrangement might be made by which his place of residence would be selected as a qualification. As he read the Bill, it contained no provision to meet that serious difficulty; and he thought it would be a serious difficulty in reference to boroughs divided into three or four districts, unless some machinery were provided to say where a man who possessed a qualification in more than one ward should vote.

[Fifth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the question raised by his hon. Friend was one rather for a Registration than for a Redistribution Bill. The point would not be overlooked, and would be dealt with in the Registration Bill.

MR. LEWIS said, the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) had remarked that this was the thin end of the wedge; but it seemed to him (Mr. Lewis) that a material element in the case had been overlooked. In some parts of the Metropolis the Bill would materially increase the number of votes one man might have. Take the case of Marylebone. At present an elector for Marylebone voted for Marylebone, although he might have property in Paddington and St. Pancras. By the division of Marylebone into three boroughs the same man would have a vote for each. So, also, in the case of the division of the present boroughs of Chelsea, Hackney, and Lambeth. He could refer to many cases in which there would be an increase of the franchise rather than the disfranchisement which was suggested by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire. There were many persons in London who had establishments scattered all over the Metropolis, some of them having as many as 16 or 17, and they would be entitled to some six or eight votes, if not more.

MR. GORST said, that he had not overlooked that point; but what he contended was that this clause involved the introduction of a new principle. He was quite aware that in the Metropolis, where, as a matter of fact, the number of boroughs would be increased, plurality of votes would be very much increased, and the same man might have more votes than one. That arose from the fact that in the Metropolis the principle of division of wards into districts was not rigidly applied. There might be reasons for it in other cases, such as his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had given; but certainly in Parliamentary matters and in Parliamentary voting a new principle was about to be brought in. He wished to know, as he had failed to gather any information from the President of the Local Government Board or the Attorney General, whether this principle was only to be acted upon for the day, and was to be thrown overboard whenever a more Democratic Parliament was elected? He was not inclined to carry the matter further. All he said was that he agreed with the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) that it was the introduction of the thin end of the wedge, and the establishment of a principle which might hereafter be carried very much further.

SIR HARRY VERNEY entertained very strong objections to the principle proposed to be established by this clause. He was convinced that under the proposed plan there would be a less independent class of Members returned than was formerly the case, and he recollected pointing that out when the Bill was first brought into the House last Session. He regretted that the division of the boroughs into single-Member constituencies had been made a vital part of the Bill. He believed that what the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) had stated was quite true, and it was a misfortune to the country that the two Front Benches had come to an agreement. For his own part, he was very much inclined to rebel, and to invite the Committee to join with him in an act of rebellion. At present the Committee were altogether without information. They were in absolute ignorance of the grounds on which the two Front Benches had come to an agreement; and if such arrangements were to be entered into, it would be absurd to discuss any question that might be submitted to the Committee. He maintained that there were several provisions in the Bill which, if they had been discussed by the Committee separately without the existence of this understanding, would not have been accepted—for instance, the Committee would have, undoubtedly, rejected the proposal to increase the total number of the Members of the House. That question had already been discussed all over the country, and a general opinion had been expressed that it was not desirable to increase the number of Members. Certainly he should have thought that advantage would have been taken of so good an opportunity for reducing the number of seats given to Ireland. He fully appreciated the qualities of the Irish people. He was well acquainted with them, having a large body of Irishmen always in his own employment, and he had never had the slightest occasion to complain of the conduct of any of his Irish labourers. He had known 80 or 90 of them formerly employed in his own neighbourhood to get in the harvest, numbers now reduced to 40 or 50, and reposed the greatest confidence in them. At the same time, he could not see that any good or adequate reason had been given for preserving the present over-representation of Ireland. It must be borne in mind that the population of Ireland had been brought down from 7,000,000 to 5,000,000, and it was impossible to say where the diminution would end. In the event of the population being reduced to 1,000,000, was the existing representation still to be maintained?

Mr. Norwood

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I must point out to the hon. Baronet that the question of the representation of Ireland is not involved in this clause.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he would apologize if he had, inadvertently, transgressed the Rules of the House. He would only add that he entertained a strong objection to the compulsory division of boroughs. He thought that the compulsory division of boroughs would in the future very much diminish, if not permanently injure, the character of the House of Commons.

MR. WARTON asked whether Sub-section 3 was included among the articles of agreement come to between the Leaders of the two front Benches? (SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; it is not.) He (Mr. Warton) would like, under those circumstances, to make this observation. He thought it was extremely wrong in drafting the Bill to have one part of the clause a part of the bargain, and another part not. It would be much more advantageous if those portions of the Bill which were matters of agreement had been contained in separate clauses, while other parts which were not matters of agreement were put in a separate part of the Bill.

(Clause agreed to.)

Counties.

Clause 9 (Division of counties).

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had an Amendment upon the Paper to insert, after the word "Schedule," in page 3, line 12, the words—

"Except such counties as shall hereinafter by the provisions of this Act be deprived of one Member."

He believed, however, that after the arrangements that had been made between the Leader of the House and the Leader of the Opposition, the proposal of any Amendment was like throwing water into a sieve. He had put the Amendment on the Paper with the intention of moving it, and of ventilating the point which it involved in the Committee; but he believed that he would be able to do so at a future stage of the Bill, and, therefore, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of discussing the Amendment now.

MR. PICTON moved, in page 3, line 19, after "Schedule," insert—

"Where any county is divided into divisions in pursuance of this section, a person shall not be registered as entitled to vote, and shall not vote, in more than one such division."

He ventured to differ from the hon. Member who had just spoken, and who seemed to think that it was altogether useless to propose any Amendment in that House. In spite of recent occurrences he should press his Amendment, because he remembered that in the course of the Autumn Session the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister stated, in answer to a Question, that hon. Members would be just as much at liberty to discuss the various parts of the Bill and to propose Amendments as they would have been if no agreement with the Opposition had been come to. He, therefore, intended to press this Amendment upon the consideration of the Committee, and he would do so in a very few words. As he gathered from the explanations which had been given by Members of the Government, the Bill was not intended to be a measure of disfranchisement, nor was it intended to do away with everything in the shape of an anomaly; but it was not designed each division of a county were separate boroughs and counties for Parliamentary purposes. Therefore the adoption of the Amendment would introduce an entirely new principle. The Bill not only followed the present law, which treated each division as a unit, but they also acknowledged the existence of a double qualification, which had for years been recognized in the case of different counties and boroughs. The county qualification, which was a property vote, had been discussed on the Franchise Bill, and the House had decided to retain it. Therefore there was another reason for drawing a distinction in the case of county divisions and borough districts. He might point out to his hon. Friend that if he were to carry the Amendment it would substantially convert the whole of Yorkshire into one county for Parliamentary purposes.

MR. PICTON said, that might be expressly guarded against by the insertion of the words "new divisions."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had taken the words as they stood upon the Paper, together with the speech of his hon. Friend; and he failed to see how any distinction was drawn. His hon. Friend now offered to limit his proposal to "new divisions;" but in some cases a new division would not be altogether a new division—such, for instance, as the West Riding of Yorkshire. In boroughs the same condition of things did not exist, and it would be very difficult for his hon. Friend to word his Amendment in such a way that it would carry out the principle he recommended. The Amendment, however, was altogether outside the scope of the Bill; and it not only raised franchise questions, but new franchise questions, which were not raised in the discussions on the Franchise Bill last year, or in the discussions upon the Bill of the present Session. He was of opinion that if the Committee were to insert extraneous matter in the Bill they might jeopardize the settlement which had now happily been arrived at, and therefore he must resist the Amendment.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the insertion of the Amendment would not only jeopardize the agreement arrived at, but would overturn it altogether. The hon. Member who proposed the Amendment supported it on the ground of what was called the "one man one vote" system. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was certainly surprised to hear the right hon. Baronet express his approval of that system.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked that he had done so in the discussions upon the Franchise Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that in those circumstances he was still more surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should, as a Member of the Cabinet, have given his adhesion to a Franchise Bill which did not carry out his own principles. That Bill avowedly retained the leasehold and the freehold franchise. And it was essential that the right of exercising these franchises should be continued to non-residents, unless the leasehold and freehold franchise was to be abolished altogether. He had no desire to enter at length into the arguments for retaining the law as it stood, because the right hon. Baronet had fairly stated that county voters had always possessed the right of voting for different divisions of the same county; and it was perfectly clear, as the right hon. Gentleman had shown to the Committee, that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) were adopted it would have a disfranchising effect of a very extraordinary character. There was hardly a county in England which was not included in the 7th Schedule referred to in the clause under the consideration of the Committee. He would take the case of his own county (Gloucestershire). At present it was divided into two divisions, and a voter was able, if he had the necessary qualification, to vote in each division; but by the Bill it would be divided into five divisions, and if the Amendment were carried, the voter, instead of being able to vote, as at present, in two divisions, would be restricted to the one in which he resided. That would be the case all over England, and would apply to the great county of Yorkshire as well as elsewhere. If such a proposal were to be seriously made it would require very grave consideration; and he thought the hon. Member would find that it would be resisted, not only in that House, but throughout the country, in a way he could hardly anticipate. He did not believe there was the slightest prospect of the Amendment being accepted, and therefore it was not worth while that he should detain the Committee further on the matter.

MR. MACARTNEY wished to say a word in reference to the observation which had been made by the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to intimate that the conduct of right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House was different from his own. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: I did not say so.] He (Mr. Macartney) hoped that he was mistaken in the matter; but, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman on several occasions had taken the trouble to point out to the followers of the Prime Minister that instead of the provisions of the Bill being the result of conviction, after negotiation, he did not personally agree with some of the principles contained in the measure, although he was prepared to support them; and on more than one occasion he had foreshadowed that although he was bound now to adhere to the terms of the agreement he would be free to upset them in a future Parliament. This action on the part of the right hon. Baronet seemed to be a strong hint to Members sitting on the opposite side of the House, and especially to those below the Gangway, that they were perfectly free to oppose the Bill if they thought fit to do so, and to follow the line he had indicated. The hint had apparently been taken by some hon. Members in the case of the Amendment relating to University representation, and in another instance in which the lead was taken by the Prime Minister himself.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he wished to point out what was the effect of the words of the right hon. Baronet. As he understood the case, the Committee were discussing part of a Bill which had been agreed upon by the heads of the two great Parties in the House for the settlement of the Reform Question, and that the right hon. Baronet himself was pledged to vote for the settlement so agreed upon. If, then, the right hon. Baronet got up and said that the Amendment was one of which, although he was bound to vote against it, he was personally in favour, it appeared to him that he was by so doing upsetting the very idea of agreement. He would endeavour to give an idea of the position by a reference to another subject. They were at present engaged in important negotiations with a Foreign Power. Supposing that the Russian Plenipotentiary were to say that, although a document he might sign should be represented as an agreement, yet his private opinion was opposed to it; would it not be taken that that agreement was not to be observed? He was sure that the right hon. Baronet would loyally carry out the bargain entered into; but he (Lord George Hamilton) felt bound to deprecate such language, because it undoubtedly tended to raise false expectations on the part of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. If they were to understand that these two Bills were to be a settlement of the question, that settlement ought to be a permanent one.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought the noble Lord might satisfy his mind on this subject; he would simply ask him to read a letter which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had written to the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard).

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had stated that he was sure that the right hon. Baronet would loyally carry out the agreement; but he could not help deprecating the practice of making reservations which tended to weaken that agreement.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he might refer, perhaps, to the fact that similar reservations had been made on the other side of the House.

MR. PICTON said, that the best reply to the noble Lord was that he was willing to withdraw his Amendment. He was perfectly satisfied with the expressions which had fallen from the right hon. Baronet.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause agreed to.

PART II.

SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISIONS.

Clause 10 (Qualification by occupation of premises in immediate succession in divided borough).

MR. FIRTH said, the Amendments which he had put on the Paper were not exactly after the nature of Amendments, but were in the way of extending the provisions of Clause 10, so as to prevent there being in London absolute disfranchisement of a large number of persons. The right hon. Gentleman

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

the Leader of the Opposition had the other night, as he understood, expressed the idea that this Bill should not be a disfranchising Bill. As it stood at present, however, it was a disfranchising Bill, and, as regarded London, to a very large degree. He believed it would affect a good many thousand votes in London in this way. At the present time the law was that there might be qualification occupation by succession within the particular limits of any borough; and with respect to large boroughs outside London—as, for example, Liverpool and Manchester—that provision and power was maintained, but with respect to boroughs in London divided on parish lines that power was not retained. At the present time it was possible for persons to move from Hammersmith to Fulham and from Fulham to Kensington and preserve their right of voting; but under this Bill in future it would not be possible for a man to move into any one of the boroughs into which London was divided without losing his qualification. Clause 10 as it now stood was not intended to preserve that right; and, therefore, so far as those who now resided in large London boroughs moved from one part to another, unless they remained in the same parish, this measure would in respect of them be a disfranchising measure, and a disfranchising measure to a very large extent indeed. With one or two exceptions, there was no common stereotyped character about the London borough boundary line as it existed now. There was an Amendment on the Paper, put down by the right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), which had apparently the object of preserving the existing boundary lines. He admitted that if that clause were passed this Amendment would not proceed; but when it was reached he believed it would be shown that it was not a practical clause which could be inserted in the Bill. Dealing, therefore, with the Bill as it stood, he thought the clause would be a largely disfranchising provision. He had suggested that there should be occupation in immediate succession with respect to parts of the Metropolis. Now, for his purpose it must be admitted that the Metropolis was as much one town as were the many towns which would retain this power. They found constantly that people who only moved from their houses one street or two lost their qualification according to the part into which they moved. He did not suggest that his proposal should be extended to the lodger qualification; it was purely a household qualification, and it was suggested in the clause that it should apply throughout the whole Metropolis. Of course, if this were a crude and vague suggestion, standing alone without any intimation of the manner in which it should be carried out, it might be urged that it had not been properly placed before the Committee. Therefore he had added a subsequent clause, by which the Committee would see that the provision would be easily and fairly carried out. The clause was as follows:—

“Where a person qualified by occupation (otherwise than as a lodger) to be registered as a voter shall, during the period of qualification, have moved, in immediate succession, from one Metropolitan constituency to another, he may claim in succession, provided that, in addition to his claim, he shall deliver to the overseers a declaration showing the nature, description, and period of the qualification in the constituency from which he has moved, such declaration to be certified, after due inquiry into the correctness thereof, by the overseers of the parish in which such qualification was situated, who shall make and publish a list of the persons making such declarations, and in all cases where they are certified as correct the Revising Officer shall insert the names of such persons in the list for the constituency in which they are resident. It shall be the duty of the overseers on whom the said certified declaration shall be served, immediately on its receipt, to obtain from the certifying overseers a duly certified copy thereof, which copy shall be open for inspection at such hours, and in like manner, as are claims and objections.”

That he was told by those who were more experienced than himself was a perfectly practical way of carrying his proposal into effect. Now, the number of votes his proposal would affect in London had not been exactly calculated; but according to the most reliable estimate they would amount to something like 15,000 or an average, practically, of about 1,500 votes for each of the existing Metropolitan boroughs. The Bill, therefore, was a disfranchising measure, to the extent that it divided existing boroughs. Those who were familiar with the London parish system would agree that no serious harm could accrue to the principle of his Amendment being extended to the whole of the Metropolis. He had not raised the larger question as to the extension of the principle to the country generally; but merely proposed to apply it to the Metropolitan area, of which he had considerable knowledge.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 35, at end of the Clause, to add the words—"The occupation in immediate succession of different premises situate within any part of the Metropolis, as defined by 'The Metropolis Management Act, 1855,' shall, for the purpose of qualifying a person for voting in any Parliamentary borough or division of a Parliamentary borough within the Metropolis, in respect of occupation (otherwise than as a lodger), have the same effect as if all such premises were situate in that borough or division in which the premises occupied by such person at the end of the period of qualification are situate.

"Where a person qualified by occupation (otherwise than as a lodger) to be registered as a voter shall, during the period of qualification, have moved, in immediate succession, from one Metropolitan constituency to another, he may claim in succession, provided that, in addition to his claim, he shall deliver to the overseers a declaration showing the nature, description, and period of the qualification in the constituency from which he has moved, such declaration to be certified, after due inquiry into the correctness thereof, by the overseers of the parish in which such qualification was situated, who shall make and publish a list of the persons making such declarations, and in all cases where they are certified as correct the Revising Barrister shall insert the names of such persons in the list for the constituency in which they are resident. It shall be the duty of the overseers on whom the said certified declaration shall be served, immediately on its receipt, to obtain from the certifying overseers a duly certified copy thereof, which copy shall be open for inspection at such hours, and in like manner, as are claims and objections."—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. WARTON rose to Order. The Committee had just passed a clause of the Bill which laid down a general principle with regard to existing occupation in Parliamentary boroughs. Now, the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman was to extend that general principle in the case of the Metropolis; and he therefore asked whether that could be done without indicating that it was done by way of Proviso or exception? It appeared to him that some such words as "Provided that" were required, because the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman in its present form was really contrary to the principle which had been adopted by the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had considered the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman with reference to the proposed Amendment, and he was of opinion that the Amendment was in Order.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he felt a considerable amount of difficulty with regard to this Amendment, because the general lines on which the Government wished to proceed were very clear, and were not easily applicable to this case. They did not wish to raise any enfranchising or disfranchising questions on this Bill, which provided solely for the redistribution of seats. But in the particular case of the Metropolis, it was difficult for them, as far as he could see, exactly to carry out that general principle. They must, he feared, either enfranchise or disfranchise as regarded the Metropolis. The difficulty was, that London was divided into four boroughs by the Bill, each having one Member. Now, at the present time, if a voter moved from one part of a borough to another he would still be on the Register; in future, if he moved from one part of Kensington, for instance, to another, he would be entitled to vote; but if he moved from any one of the four boroughs to another he would not get on the Register. The Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would, therefore, enfranchise very largely, because it would allow any person to vote who moved from any part of London to another. For that reason he did not see his way to any middle course, which would, by the application of any provision, meet the views of his hon. and learned Friend, and keep things at the same time in their present position. It had been suggested that the Government might keep the Parliamentary boroughs of the Metropolis for the purpose of successive occupation registration; but as the Bill was not for any purpose of that kind, he thought it would be a very inconvenient course to take, and one which it would be impossible to adopt. He would like to hear the opinion of some of those who were largely interested in the Bill, as to whether this Amendment would not have a large enfranchising effect altogether outside the Bill; and, on the other hand, he would like to hear the opinions of those who objected to the Government being compelled to disfranchise, owing to what appeared to him to be unavoidable circumstances. With regard to the general argument of his hon. and learned Colleague, there could be no doubt that his plan, if workable, would be applicable to the whole country; and, therefore, there appeared no reason why it should be limited to the Metropolis alone, if it would work without any risk of fraud. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend with regard to the community of interest in the Metropolis; but there was no common authority which could efficiently represent the affairs of each particular person in the four quarters of the Metropolis. There was greater risk of fraud in London than in other boroughs of the country. If a man moved from Hammer-smith to Poplar, for instance, he would be as much lost sight of for registering purposes as if he were to move from St. Andrew's to Poplar. The case of Wesleyan ministers, which had been referred to, was especially hard; they were moved every three years, and the result was that they hardly got on the Register until they were about to leave the place in which they had resided for that period. But that was due to the length of residence which the present law required. They had in this country an extraordinarily prolonged period of actual residence required for qualification—nominally one year's residence, but practically a residence of two or two and a half years. That being so, it was a question whether in any future reform proposed there should not be a provision for bringing the period of residence required for registration more closely into connection with the date at which the resident came into the place. He thought that shortening the period of residence was a matter which ought to be considered. As regarded the particular Bill before the Committee, he feared there would be no general consent in all parts of the House to the introduction of such a general enfranchisement as the Amendment of his hon. and learned Colleague would cover, and without that he did not think the Government could entertain the Amendment.

Mr. Firth

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, if there were no other reasons, the observation of the right hon. Baronet would be a strong reason against the acceptance of this clause, because it was very obvious that a number of questions would be opened up by it, which ought to be discussed and dealt with, and which could not be conveniently dealt with in a Bill of this character, which was for the purpose of a redistribution of seats. He thought, under the particular circumstances in which they were placed, having regard to the history of the Bill, that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that it would be entirely outside the object they had in view and the spirit of the agreement entered into, if they were to introduce into the Bill matter which did not properly belong to the redistribution of electoral areas, but appertained to questions of franchise or registration. Therefore he hoped the Government would decline to accept the Amendment which the hon. and learned Member had proposed. He thought it perfectly clear that such an Amendment would be to a very large degree adverse to the spirit of the principle of the Bill—he referred to the one-Member districts—and the endeavour to concentrate as much as possible the electorate which each Member was to look to. Their object had been, in this arrangement, to make the electorate as reasonably small as they could, and by that means to bring candidates into closer relation with the electors. But if they were to introduce a principle of this kind, and in such a way as would admit of the principle being carried out all over the country, they would in part destroy that which it was their desire to maintain—namely, the close connection between the Member and the electorate; because by this Amendment was given almost unlimited power of increasing the electorate, and making it what he might call an artificial electorate. Under the working of the hon. and learned Member's clause, it would be competent, for instance, for the hon. and learned Member, if he were inclined, for the purpose of obtaining a larger majority in his own borough—it would be competent for him or his agents to sweep up a number of supporters and bring them from the Tower Hamlets or Greenwich to vote in his borough, with which they had had no previous connection. That would be to destroy what he might call the domestic character of the measure, and it would be at variance with the principle of continuous occupation in the existing boroughs. The boroughs were recognized as the home of the voters who voted there according to occupation. They said to the voter—

[First Night.]

"If you remove from one street to another street you shall not lose your qualification, because you will still belong to the same constituency as before;" but if they adopted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman they would be bringing in strangers from a considerable distance, who would not have the same moral right to vote which long residence conferred. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made allusion to the position of Wesleyan ministers. He said they were generally appointed to their several cures for periods of three years, and that before they were well on the Register they had to be taken off, because they had to go away. But that was the case with them, not only in the Metropolis, but throughout the country. A Wesleyan minister might be moved from Exeter to Plymouth or anywhere else, and it would be very difficult to meet such cases. If they were to meet the claim of the Metropolis in this respect, they would find it difficult to refuse to do so with regard to the boroughs throughout the country, and the result would be to bring forward that which the Bill did not encourage. They would be tending towards bringing into the constituencies the whole of England so to speak, instead of giving and maintaining to them a domestic character. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that the clause could not properly be brought into the Bill, and that, under the circumstances, the Committee would not have to discuss it any further.

MR. BRYCE pointed out that whatever might be the force of the argument of the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition, that the principle of the Amendment proposed would be applicable to the country at large, the Committee were then only engaged in discussing its applicability to the Metropolis. Unless the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend were adopted, this would be a heavily-disfranchising Bill so far as the Metropolis was concerned. The constituency which he represented (Tower Hamlets) was, according to the Bill, to be divided into no less than five different boroughs; and the clause, as it stood, must necessarily disfranchise the large number of persons who had recently moved from one part of the district to another. He understood the argument against his hon. and learned Friend's proposal to rest on the ground that persons would be placed on the Register who were unacquainted with the localities. But those who knew the people in the localities of the Metropolis knew that their migrations were mostly within narrow limits. They migrated, for instance, in the part of London which he represented, for the most part, within the range of a mile or two. In the East of London many removals took place from Poplar to Limehouse, from Limehouse to St. George's-in-the-East, and from St. George's-in-the-East to Whitechapel, while hardly any took place from Poplar to Chelsea or Kensington, because the habits and occupations of the people did not lead them to migrations of that kind. Therefore, he said that the argument of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) hardly applied to the Amendment before the Committee; and he hoped that, if it was to be made a question as between disfranchisement and enfranchisement, the more liberal interpretation would be adopted, according to the well-known maxim of the civilians. It was better, in his opinion, if the Bill could not be kept from effecting enfranchisement, that it should be prevented from disfranchising a large number of the people in the Metropolis.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that the proposal was that a man should have a vote if he came into the borough at any time before the 31st of July, even the day before, which was absurd. He thought there ought, at least, to be a Proviso that the individual had been resident in some part of the Metropolis. But even with that Proviso the proposal would be wholly unacceptable, as it would give the inhabitants of the Metropolis a qualification differing widely from the qualification now possessed by the nation at large.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 138: Majority 119.—(Div. List, No. 58.)

MR. LEWIS said, that one reason for looking carefully into the clause was that, under the new Act, it would be possible to manipulate votes in such a way as would allow of 300 or 400 votes to be transferred from one constituency to another just before the end of the qualifying period. It was not difficult to do that where the occupation related to houses, and it would be very much easier where one room would qualify. In cases where a constituency was closely divided this might be effected by Party combination easily.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Returning officers in new boroughs).

Mr. HICKS said, the Amendment standing in his name having been put down before the Bill was reprinted, it was no longer applicable, and he should not move it.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, before the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Carbutt) moved his Amendment, he would suggest that it would be more conveniently moved at the end of the clause.

Mr. CARBUTT said, the object of the Amendment he was about to move was that the Writ of Election for the Monmouthshire District Boroughs should be directed to the Mayor of the borough which had the largest population. Monmouth had hitherto been the polling place for the boroughs; but the population of Newport had, since that arrangement was made, largely and rapidly increased. It had now 46,000 inhabitants, whereas the population of Monmouth was only 6,000. The Committee would, therefore, see that there was some reason for his Amendment. But, in addition to what he had stated, the rateable value of property in Newport was eight times that of Monmouth. The arrangement he proposed would lessen both time and expense, so far as the officers were concerned who had to count the votes.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 21, at end of Sub-section (3), insert—"Provided, That, with respect to the Monmouthshire District Boroughs (notwithstanding that it may have been otherwise determined, the Writ of Election shall be directed to the Mayor of that one of the municipal boroughs which has the largest population, according to the last Census for the time being."
—(Mr. Carbutt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had personally no objection to the words of the Amendment; but he pointed out that they raised a question which applied to other groups of boroughs, not only in Wales, but throughout the country. The Writ of Election had been sent to the borough of Monmouth by immemorial custom, and the hon. Member wanted it to be transferred to Newport. Newport was a very much larger place than Monmouth now, and he had no objection, if the feeling of the Committee was that the alteration should take place, to the Proviso being added; but he thought, if there was likely to be any discussion upon it or waste of time, the question was hardly worth the trouble that would be spent upon it.

Mr. WARTON said, it was all very well for civilities to pass between the right hon. Baronet and one of his supporters with regard to this Amendment; but he thought the right hon. Baronet himself must have a conviction in his own mind that it would not be allowed to pass without comment, and without other similar proposals being made. There ought to be some understanding how far the principle was to be applied, or the door would probably be opened to a very wide discussion on other cases.

Mr. SCLATER-BOTH said, he hoped the Committee would pause before accepting this Amendment, the adoption of which would lead to all sorts of difficulties. On the other hand, he thought it was important that the Writ should be made returnable at the place having the largest population, although the principle must not be carried too far, or many difficulties would arise. He did not wish to prevent a regulation being framed with that object, provided it did not appear in the form of a piece of special legislation, in which case some Court or authority would be required to prevent the principle thus admitted being made applicable to the innumerable county districts which might set up rival claims to be made the place where the Writ was returnable. He thought all the questions of the kind that would arise would be extremely inconvenient; and therefore he considered that the principle of the Amendment was one against the admission of which the Bill ought to be carefully guarded.

Mr. MORGAN LLOYD said, he did not think that any inconvenience could arise if the proposal of the hon. Member for Monmouth were adopted. Newport had not only the largest population, but it was the most convenient centre. If the right hon. Baronet thought it necessary to apply the principle to the other Welsh boroughs, he did not think there would be any difficulty in the way of that being done, because, although it would make a slightly different arrangement in Pembrokeshire and Glamorganshire, it would produce no change in the boroughs of Carnarvonshire, Denbighshire, Montgomeryshire, or Flintshire. Therefore, he thought there was no difficulty in the way of the Amendment.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. HICKS said, he did not wish to express any opinion as to the desirability of removing the Writ from Monmouth to Newport; but he thought the clause of the hon. Member, in its present shape, would open the door to a very great deal of inconvenience in future by the creation of these movable centres. He thought that if they were to have any change in the present case, it ought to be made in the Bill by simply substituting Newport for Monmouth. If they were to do the same thing with regard to the other groups, the question might be raised on each group as to whether the Writ should be sent to the largest town. He was in favour of a steady and uniform system being established.

MR. LEWIS said, the interruptions by some hon. Members opposite were most disorderly, and he must claim the protection of the Chair. One hon. Member had indulged himself by interrupting every Member who had risen to speak on the Amendment from that side of the Committee. If the hon. Member did not want to take part in the deliberations of the Committee he could be spared. With regard to the Amendment, the hon. Member who moved it had not stated to the Committee what the Monmouth Mayor thought of his proposal. He did not understand from the hon. Member that it had received the assent of the Mayor of Monmouth; and, therefore, he thought there might be some complaints if the Committee were to take one side or the other in this particular case. Under the circumstances, he thought that the proposal should be made in some more definite form, and that it should be taken after full Notice on Report, otherwise its adoption might come as a surprise upon the Mayor of Monmouth.

Mr. Morgan Lloyd

COLONEL STANLEY said, that if there really was an earnest desire, as there seemed to be, to make progress with the Bill, it was as well that the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) should be accepted. The adoption of that suggestion would in no way prejudice the Amendment; but it would give an opportunity of notice being attracted to the question. It might be possible that on Report the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see his way to deal with the matter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Carbutt) would adopt the very sensible suggestion which had been made—namely, to withdraw the Amendment now, and allow the question to be discussed on Report.

MR. CARBUTT said, he would be glad to accept the advice of the Government.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12 (As to boroughs divided into divisions).

Clause 13 (Registration of freemen in divided boroughs).

Clause 14 (Adaptation of 46 and 47 Vic. c. 51, to divided borough).

MR. WARTON said, he had Amendments to this clause to propose which he had not had an opportunity of handing in. The first Amendment was a very small one; but he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the wisdom of accepting it. He proposed to move the omission of the word "and," in line 39, and to substitute the word "or." It was quite clear that if they meant to deal with "election agent, sub-agent, polling agent, clerk, messenger," their meaning would be better expressed by the use of the word "or" than "and." It might be that some person would discharge the functions of "clerk or messenger." Surely it was intended that the clause should apply to election agent or sub-agent, a polling agent, or clerk or messenger? He was supported in this by line 42, where it stated "agent, clerk, or messenger."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 39, to leave out the word "and," and insert the word "or,"—(Mr. Warton,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'and' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he thought the word "and" was correctly used. It was desired to apply the provisions of the Schedule to all persons named. It was not at all necessary to say "or."

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that if the word "and" was retained, the words election agent, sub-agent, &c. should be put in the plural.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) pointed out that the word "any" meant "every."

Mr. TOMLINSON said, that if they had regard to the word "any" the clause was a disjunctive one. If the word "or" were used, the substantives ought to be made plural.

Mr. WARTON said, that in line 42 the matter was properly expressed. If it was right to say "and" here, why did not the Attorney General insert "and" for "or" in line 42? He should persist in his Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 13: Majority 62.—(Div. List, No. 59.)

Mr. WARTON said, he had another Amendment to this clause to propose. He desired to move the omission of the words "the whole of a county at large or of" in line 40; and, of course, if the Amendment were adopted, it would be necessary to propose subsequently several consequential Amendments. Up to the present it had been loudly asserted—it had been asserted that night by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in charge of the Bill—that county constituencies were separate constituencies, and that borough constituencies were not so separate. Union was kept up for certain purposes in borough constituencies; but county constituencies were held to be essentially different. Each division of a county was a county in itself, so to speak. That was a principle laid down so late as that very day by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and that was a distinction which was particularly emphasised in Clause 9. It was very proper to put down corruption; but it seemed to him to be perfectly absurd that a man who happened to be employed in one division of a county as a polling agent, for instance, should not be allowed to vote, if he had a qualification, in another division of the county possibly 80 or 90 miles distant. The effect of the Amendment he had the honour to bring before the Committee was to omit all the words which related to counties, and to restrict the clause to Parliamentary boroughs so-called. The county of York was divided into 10 or 11 different divisions; surely a man who was employed and paid as an agent or clerk or messenger in one division of the county should not be debarred from voting in any other division of the county in which he might have a vote.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 40, to leave out the words "the whole of a county at large or of."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, it was quite true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) had said, that for the purposes of voting divisions of counties were regarded as different constituencies. But this was a question of corrupt practices, and when they saw what might be done and the evils they had to meet he doubted the wisdom of accepting the Amendment. Some of the divisions of counties were very populous, and great organizations would be found to exist in them. Of course some divisions adjoined, and the result would be that as the elections did not necessarily take place on the same day the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act would be defeated if they made an arrangement by which a person should be employed in one county division and vote in another. If the arrangement made in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act was right in the first instance, surely it was well now to insist that persons who were paid should not evade the provisions of the arrangement by being employed in one division and voting in another. On the whole, he wished to adhere to the principle the House endeavoured to carry into effect upon the Parliamentary Elec-

[Fifth Night.]

MR. MACARTNEY observed, that there were organizations which took cognizance of what went on throughout the country. There were in London a Conservative organization and a Liberal organization, and they controlled what was done by the Parties in the country generally. It seemed to him that if a man was prevented from voting according to his opinions in one division of Middlesex because he happened to be employed as agent in another division of the same county, he ought also to be prevented from voting in the Orkneys.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT said, it appeared to him that this Bill was intended to disfranchise all political agents. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had suggested that the organization for different divisions of counties was the same. Now, the county of Sussex was divided into East and West. He (Mr. Scott) had the honour to represent East Sussex; but he had nothing whatever to do with West Sussex, nor had the people in the East of the county anything to do with those in the West. Was his (Mr. Scott's) political agent, who might have very considerable property in West Sussex, to be deprived of his vote in the Western Division? It seemed to him that to this matter "distance lends enchantment." He supposed that if an agent in East Sussex had property in Yorkshire he would be allowed to vote in Yorkshire? Suppose that a man employed as an agent had a vote in Sussex and another in Surrey. Was he not to be able to vote in Surrey because Surrey and Sussex adjoined? [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): We allow that.] He (Mr. Scott) had understood that the different divisions of a county practically formed different counties. Now, in Sussex, there was to be a division of Rye and a division of Chichester, and these divisions were 40 miles distant. Was a man employed in one division as an agent to be deprived of his right to vote in the other division? A proposition more unjust—he was almost inclined to say tyrannical—was never made. If his hon. and learned Friend divided the Committee, he (Mr. Scott) would certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. WARTON said, it was all very well for the Attorney General to pooh-pooh this matter; it was much more important than the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to imagine. He (Mr. Warton) was extremely obliged to his right hon. Friend the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth) for assisting him on the present occasion, and in support of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman he begged to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General that now there could only be one paid agent; the number could not be multiplied, as it was fixed by the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act. He thought the Attorney General desired to draw the line very strong. An agent was to be permitted to vote at a borough election in the county; but he was not to be allowed to vote in another division of the county, which might possibly be 80 or 90 miles from the one in which he was employed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that this seemed to be something like a discussion as to the prohibitive degrees of marriage—how far they might go, and how close the intimacy was. He did not understand that anybody had the least intention of casting a reflection upon the characters and fitness to vote of those excellent persons who did good service as election agents. It was, however, quite reasonable and proper that a man should be precluded from voting in the particular division in which he was employed as agent; but it would be very hard that, because a man was agent in one district, he should be precluded from voting in another district which his agency did not affect. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) thought it would be desirable to accept the Amendment which had been proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), though he was not anxious to press anything on the Government that they did not see the reason of in that respect. As he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was willing to consider the matter on Report, he was not at all sure it would not be well to adopt the Amendment at once.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he should feel disposed to accept the view of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) if it were pressed. It was a very small matter; but if the hon. and learned Member thought it

[Fifth Night.]

Mr. SMALL said, he was very happy to hear that announcement from the right hon. Baronet; and he had no doubt that either he (Mr. Small) or some of his hon. Friends would be able, on Report, to show that the words were not sufficiently guarded.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 (Saving of rights of voters on change of Parliamentary area if otherwise qualified), agreed to.

Clause 17 (Detached parts of parishes).

Mr. WARTON said, he desired to make certain with regard to the details of this clause when considered in connection with the Divided Parishes Act. He wished to ask the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke) whether certain parts of a county could be taken from certain parishes and united to another county? If that was so, what was the reason for it? How could it be done?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Government had power in the Local Government Board, under the Divided Parishes Act, to issue Orders for the purpose of throwing divided parishes into other parishes; but their Orders at the present moment would have no power to change the voters from one county division to another. In his opinion, it was doubtful whether Parliament would like to give the power in the case of detached places of changing voters from one county to another.

Mr. WARTON said, he was under the impression that the Local Government Board had already issued Orders beyond the 42nd section of the Divided Parishes Act. They had issued Orders, he believed, that for all purposes certain parts of a county should be taken from certain parishes and united to others. The doubtful point of law that was raised would not affect this clause. There had been great doubt as to what Parliament meant at the time of the passing of the Divided Parishes Act. The fact was that Parliament had forgotten the question—it had local boundaries in its head, and did not provide for Imperial matters. It did not consider what should be done in the case of Parliamentary boroughs. The words in the clause would not have given the power to transfer Parliamentary voters, if that power was not already conferred by the existing law.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 25, inclusive, agreed to.

PART III.

DISQUALIFICATION OF VOTERS FOR CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Clause 26 (Adaptation of certain enactments as to disqualification of voters for corrupt practices).

MAJOR CURZON said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Southampton (Mr. Giles), who had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out this clause, he should like to ask the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke) whether the Government would consent to postpone it until the Committee had dealt with Clause 27? There were a number of hon. Members in the House very much interested in several of the corrupt boroughs mentioned in Clause 27. They were not so much interested in the boroughs mentioned in Clause 26; and he was afraid that if Clause 26 were taken now, it would rather prejudice the case of those hon. Members when they came to argue it in connection with the next clause. If the Government could see their way to the postponement of Clause 26 he should be extremely glad. He was not sure that they would be able to do it. He should like to point out that in the case of four boroughs they had been already disfranchised 18 years, and in the case of the four remaining they had been already disfranchised 15 years. Perhaps the right hon. Baronet could consent to postpone the clause.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, who was not now in his place, but who, he hoped, would be in the House in the course of a few minutes, was disposed to make a concession in this matter. In fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman had already said as much. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not know that there was any necessity for postponing Clause 26, as he thought that the Committee was perfectly able to deal with it now. However, to meet the views of hon. Members, he would consent to the postponement until Clause 27 had been disposed of.

Clause postponed.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. JOHN BRIGHT said, he had not been able to gather what the Government proposed to do with Clause 26.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is only postponed for the present.

Clause 27 (Disqualification of certain voters for corrupt practices).

MR. RAIKES: I rise, Sir, to move an Amendment of which I have given Notice with regard to this clause, and I hope that it will afford an opportunity to the Government for tempering justice with mercy in their dealing with the particular constituencies to which it relates. The Amendment is—

“Page 10, line 17, leave out ‘for ever,’ and, after ‘incapable,’ insert ‘during the period of seven years next after the presentation of the said Reports respectively.’”

The clause, as it stands, proposes to inflict disfranchisement for life upon the persons who have been found guilty, or who have been reported in the Schedules of the Reports of Election Commissioners to have been guilty of bribery, treating, or personation, at elections held in the year 1880 for these respective boroughs—the boroughs being those mentioned in the second part of the 8th Schedule of the Act, and whose names are already sufficiently notorious. Now, I feel that this question is not, by any means, without difficulty—that the Committee will find some difficulty in dealing with it. It would certainly be difficult for the House to assent to the very severe penalty which the Government has proposed to attach to the persons guilty of corrupt practices at these elections. Perhaps, as the case of Chester is likely to be mentioned in the course of the debate, I may say that I am appearing here rather as an apologist for persons who did me very considerable injury at that election than in any other capacity. I cannot help thinking that the Committee will be unwilling to inflict retrospective penalties upon persons who on that occasion were guilty of corrupt practices. The Act of 1883 was not passed when these offences were committed; and the offenders, who rendered themselves liable to the just resentment of this House, exposed themselves, presumably, only to such penalties as the law, in its then form, might bring upon them in regard to their particular cases. The Amendment I have ventured to put upon the Paper is one which proposes to deal with these offenders exactly as they would have been dealt with if the Attorney General had in 1881 followed the precedent of Norwich and Boston, and brought in a Bill proposing to inflict certain political disqualifications upon the persons who had been scheduled by the Commissioners. The various boroughs that had been visited by Commissioners at different times have been dealt with, as we know, in more than one way. In the majority of instances there has been inflicted upon them the penalty of complete extinction. Those boroughs that are mentioned in the first part of the 8th Schedule of this Bill, the well known boroughs of Beverley, Bridgewater, Sligo, and Cashel, and, in former years, the boroughs of Lancaster and Great Yarmouth, were absolutely and totally disfranchised by the action of Parliament after the Commissioners had reported upon them. But in the case of Norwich and Boston a different and more lenient course was adopted. I will not trouble the Committee with the details of the Norwich case, which were rather special. I will only say, in passing, that in this case the Writ for the election to fill the vacancy was suspended, and certain persons—I think freemen—were disfranchised. I would rather rely upon the precedent established in the case of Boston. In the case of Boston the voters scheduled by the Commissioners were subsequently, by Parliamentary enactment, deprived of their electoral rights, with regard to their qualification in boroughs, for seven years. It will be seen that the distinction as between the course proposed in the clause of this Bill, and the course to which I am referring, is a considerable one, and that my proposal leans very much to the side of mercy. On the other hand, it differs, I believe, somewhat widely from the course which has been proposed by the hon. Member for West Cheshire (Mr. H. Tollemache), and the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Giles), who are disposed to dispense with this clause altogether, and to grant to these persons a complete amnesty. I have to put to the Committee this consideration. You are now passing an Act of Parliament by which, in future, it will become practically impossible to disfranchise a constituency, because the whole country being divided into districts in which the franchise is in the main the same, any disfranchisement which may light upon political offenders will have to be confined to them personally. How are you to set forth on a course of dealing with offenders for corrupt practices personally, if the first step you take in that course is to be one of granting a complete and absolute amnesty for offenders at the last Election? You have passed since that Election an Act which imposes very much more serious penalties for corruption, and on that you propose, for the future, to rely. I would ask you, will you obtain credit for sincerity and earnestness in doing so, if the first thing you do after passing that Act is to remove, absolutely, the penalties that attached to corrupt practices at a period a little before that at which that Act became law? Now, I do not want to dwell upon the details of corrupt practices in these different constituencies, but, at least, I may be permitted to say that you have already dealt out a somewhat severe measure to two out of the six "peccant boroughs," as they were called, by formally stigmatizing Sandwich and Macclesfield as unfit, hereafter, to retain the status of Parliamentary boroughs. Will it not look strange if, having dealt out that severe and uncompromising justice to Sandwich and Macclesfield, this House is afterwards to accept any Amendment for absolutely releasing from all penalty the other boroughs which appear to have offended, if not absolutely in the same degree, at least in the same way? I should be extremely sorry to see this House stretch too hard, too tight, and too fast a line of strict austerity in dealing with this class of boroughs. I should be very reluctant to accept any proposal which would deal with Oxford, with Canterbury, with Gloucester, and with my own old constituency Chester, in the same way in which we have already dealt with Macclesfield and Sandwich; but I cannot help thinking, at the same time, that this House would put itself in a false position if, in its anxiety to be generous and indulgent, it should altogether remit any penal consequences whatever for offences that only varied in degree from those which have been visited by political annihilation. I feel sure that in dealing with this question the Government will be anxious to, as I said in the first instance, temper justice with mercy; and I very confidently appeal to the Prime Minister with regard to this particular class of persons. The Prime Minister throughout his long and distinguished career has, I think, always been conspicuous, if I may say so, for the robust common sense with which he has dealt with questions of this sort. He has never used the extravagant language which has sometimes been in favour, first upon one side of the House and then upon the other. He has regarded this evil as more or less inherent in our political system, and when it has been necessary to apply a penalty he has imposed it, but, at the same time, he has not been among those who have allowed themselves to be carried away by sentiment; and thus, I hope, he has considered the matter on the one side or the other, and that we shall hear his views on it before the discussion closes. The Committee will understand, perhaps, that in endeavouring to take the course which I have pointed out by my Amendment to-night, I have been moved entirely by a sense of public duty. It is a difficult thing for me to deal with this matter at all; but I feel that I should be unworthy of a position in this House if I shrank from dealing with a question of this difficulty, because I might be suspected of having some personal feeling in the matter. I have done my duty, I think, in proposing the Amendment that stands in my name. I hope the Committee will deal with it fairly and in a judicious spirit, and will not allow itself to be carried away by passionate appeals of misericism on the one hand, or on the other by a too rigid adherence to the severe penalties of the Act dealing with corruption at elections last placed upon the Statute Book, so far as the elections that took place shortly before that Act was passed are concerned.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 17, to leave out the words "for ever," and, after the word "incapable," to insert the words "during the period of seven years next after the presentation of the said Reports respectively." — (Mr. Kees.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

Mr. MONK said, that in the few remarks he desired to address to the Committee on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), he desired, in the first place, to express the strong sense which he entertained of the fairness and equity which had been shown by the Government in not including the borough he had the honour to represent (Gloucester) in the Penal Clause No. 3 of this Bill; and though he had been prepared to show the House very good reasons why Gloucester should not meet with the fate which it was originally proposed that it should meet with under the Bill of a previous Session, he, at the same time, was ready to acknowledge, on behalf of that city, the leniency which had been shown to it by the Government in the Bill which was now before the Committee. His right hon. Friend had pointed out, with very great force, that since the Election of 1880 a new Corrupt Practices Act had been passed which inflicted upon those who received bribes a lighter penalty than that which it was proposed to inflict by this clause; but, in moving his Amendment, his right hon. Friend had omitted to point out that the Royal Commissioners who were appointed in 1880 took every means, and very properly took every means, in their power to ascertain who had given bribes and who had received them. They even went so far, in some cases, as to invite persons to send in lists of suspected bribers or bribees, and at the same time they called the electors before them, and, before examining them as to their complicity in these illegal acts, promised them a certificate of indemnity if they answered freely all questions which were addressed to them. In some instances, to his knowledge—and he was sorry his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was not present, because he could have brought one of these cases very clearly before his mind—in the city with which he was connected, the Commissioners had had given to them the names of several gentlemen as bribers who certainly had nothing at all to do with bribery. There were as many as 97 electors scheduled in Gloucester, some of whom were absent from the city during the sittings of the Commission, while others had not had an opportunity of being heard before the Commissioners and of stating that they had nothing whatever to do with bribery.

Mr. Monk

In one case especially, a most respectable man, an employé in the Post Office, attended before the Commissioners, was examined by them, and was exonerated by them from the charge which had been brought against him; yet through inadvertence his name was inserted in the Schedule. This gentleman's name having appeared as having received a bribe, the voter would be disfranchised for life. As he (Mr. Monk) had said, the Commissioners had acknowledged that this gentleman was not guilty; but the case was very difficult to deal with, for, after the Commission was dissolved, the Secretary stated, in reply to representations made to him with regard to this case, that there was no power to remove any name from the Schedule after the Commissioners had presented their Report. And this was no solitary case. There were many cases of the same nature. Another case was that of a highly respectable medical practitioner in the city. This gentleman's name was also returned as that of a person who had received a bribe, and it was needless to say that there was not a word of truth in the statement. There was another point to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee, and that was this—that if the clause passed in its present state, disqualifying voters for life, any one of these voters might come forward at the next General Election as a candidate, and would be perfectly qualified to be returned as the Representative of the borough in which he had been scheduled as a briber. Though that was an improbable case, yet the fact remained the same; and he believed that, in some cases, the fact of a man's name having been scheduled would not be considered as a disqualification for being returned to Parliament. Now, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes) had proposed that, instead of a disqualification for life, these scheduled voters should be disfranchised for seven years, which was the penalty inflicted by the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act of 1883. He wished to point out that the electors who attended before the Commissioners and were subsequently scheduled, had no opportunity of bringing evidence before the Commissioners to show that they had not been guilty of these practices. Under the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, no one could be convicted who had not been fairly tried; and, on their trial, accused persons could retain counsel, and bring forward evidence to show that they had not been guilty of these practices. He thought there was a strong reason why the same punishment should not be inflicted on those who had been examined before the Commissioners on the faith of a certificate of indemnity being given to them if they spoke the truth. In that case, of course, the voters had not had the aid of counsel. There was another point in which he was sure he should be confirmed by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General when he rose to reply, and that was that in the case of some of these boroughs the inquiry on the part of the Commissioners had been of a most exhaustive nature; and he was sorry to say that they would find that as many as 1,500 or 2,000, and even more, voters had in consequence been scheduled. But in the case of more than one borough the inquiry was of a most perfunctory character. He was sorry to have to mention names, but he must mention the name of one borough, and that was the City of Oxford. The Commissioners said on page 16 of their Report—

"It is unnecessary to observe that Schedules II. and IV. do not by any means purport to contain the names of all who, under colour of payment for employment, received money for their votes.

"So far as the employer is concerned, it is comparatively easy to detect bribery under colour of payment for services; but when the inquiry is directed to the motives and knowledge of a voter who has been employed, it is difficult to decide whether he has accepted the employment with a corrupt intent. We, therefore, did not pursue this inquiry further than was necessary for verifying the accounts laid before us by the several district agents, for testing the particulars filed in support of the Petition, and for forming an approximate estimate of the number of persons employed."

Would the Committee hear with him when he told them the result? The result was that the Oxford Commissioners scheduled 84 persons as bribers. How many were scheduled as bribees? In the Report it was intimated that more than 1,000 voters had received payment for their votes, but only 55 were scheduled as having been bribed. Of course, in those cases where they found 1,200, 1,500, or even 1,900 persons scheduled as having been bribed, the Commissioners had gone down into the borough for several weeks and had made a most full and careful inquiry into all the circumstances of the case. His right hon. Friend Mr. Raikes had, he thought, alluded to the case of Norwich—the election of 1875. In 1876 the Commissioners presented their Report in regard to that election. On page 29 the Commissioners said—

"When we had ascertained, from the evidence of numerous witnesses whose examination extended over a considerable period, that a corrupt, systematic, and extensive employment of a large number of voters had been resorted to at the last two elections 1874 and 1875 by the various agents of both Parties, it became necessary to consider to what further extent, if any, it was our duty to prosecute the inquiry. Upon this subject we regretted not to have the concurrence of our late colleague, Mr. McMahon. He thought, notwithstanding the extent and cogency of the evidence already obtained (as to the effect of which, and the political responsibility of the constituency in respect of it, he fully agreed with us), that the Statute was peremptory, and left us no discretion in the matter: that it was, therefore, obligatory upon us to examine without exception all the persons employed at the said election, and to report to Your Majesty their names, if we should find them guilty of a violation of the law.

"In this view, however, after full consideration, we were not able to concur. It was our opinion that under Your Majesty's commission we were at liberty to direct the course and scope of the inquiry, and that the Statute did not imperatively require us in any event, and contrary to our judgment of the expediency of the case, to submit to examination 4,000 or 5,000 additional witnesses for the purpose of ascertaining their individual responsibility.

"Having regard, therefore, to these considerations, to the serious difficulties and objections that existed to the examination of a few, only, as a sample of so large a body; to the extent and importance of the information before us, and believing that no benefit could be obtained, commensurate with the vast expenditure of time and money which would be involved in the course proposed by our learned colleague, we concluded that it was our duty to dispense with the proposed examinations, and to present this Report without such evidence."

The consequence was, that although 4,000 or 5,000 voters might have been bribed, there were only 56 bribers and 29 bribees scheduled in 1875. Now, no doubt his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, whether he considered it was the duty of the Commissioners to make an exhaustive inquiry or not, knew that there were other cases in which the inquiry was, as he had said, of a perfunctory nature; and therefore the point which he wished to bring particularly before the attention of the Committee and the Government was this—that in the cases where there was an exhaustive inquiry they had the names in the Schedules of every person who had received a bribe; whereas, in other cases, they had only the names of some 29 or 55. After that, he thought it would be a very great hardship if the persons who were induced to give this evidence, admitting their complicity in illegal acts, were for ever deprived of their votes; whereas, a much larger number who were equally guilty, were allowed to go free. There was a further reason why he could not offer his support to the Amendment of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes). He thought this was a case in which, after the passing of so stringent a measure as the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, the two Houses of Parliament might very well overlook the offences committed in 1880 in boroughs which had already suffered a certain amount of punishment. With two exceptions, all the towns where corrupt practices had occurred had been deprived of their representation during the present Parliament; and on behalf of his own and other constituencies he would urge that this was a case in which Parliament might well afford to exhibit its leniency.

Mr. H. TOLLEMACHE said, he thought it would be generally admitted that the Bill, as drawn by the Government, was so monstrously unjust that that House would not for a moment consent to pass it. He did not for a moment think it would be contended that the punishment of disfranchisement for life of scheduled voters ought to be adhered to. But, if that was so, then came the question as to what ought to be the punishment in these cases. For his own part, he considered that half a loaf was better than no bread; and therefore he was prepared to accept the Amendment prescribing seven years' disfranchisement, unless the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would tell them that the Government would consent to abandon the clause altogether. In his opinion, a great many people had been unnecessarily scheduled. He understood that treating was not a corrupt practice at all, under any Act which existed at that time; and therefore the Commissioners ought not to have scheduled those persons who had merely been guilty of treating. There were many reasons also why some of the persons who were scheduled should be let off altogether, and the first was that they had not had an opportunity of being heard in their own defence; and it was laid down by the Act of 1854, and re-enacted in the Act of 1883, that persons should only be found guilty of corrupt practices after they had had an opportunity of being heard. Lord Blackburn had laid it down in the Bewdley Election Petition Inquiry—

"That a person giving evidence upon the hearing of an Election Petition has not had an opportunity of being heard in a legal sense, and, therefore, unless he was tried and convicted before a jury, disqualification did not attach."

And he would venture to suggest to the Committee that those individuals who had been brought up before the Election Commissioners had not had an opportunity of being heard in the sense laid down by Lord Blackburn. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) had pointed out that in the case of Norwich that House did disqualify those persons who had been scheduled by a special measure, although it was not necessary by the law at that time; but, for his part, he considered that the decision of Lord Blackburn was a much wiser one than that of that House. But he would give a higher authority than even Lord Blackburn. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, speaking on April 6, 1881, of the Taunton Election Petition, said—

"There are certain disqualifications attaching to candidates in consequence of being reported personally guilty of bribery by an Election Judge. These disqualifications are imposed by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 126, s. 43; but no disqualification of any kind attaches to any person so reported other than a candidate except the prohibition of his employment as an election agent during seven years. The reason for this is to be found in the wording of the 45th section of the Act I have mentioned, which says: 'Any person other than a candidate found guilty in any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard,' shall be subjected to certain disqualifications. It has been determined by Lord Blackburn, in the decision given by him in the Bewdley Petition case—and it seems to me quite correctly determined—that a person giving evidence upon the hearing of an Election Petition has not had 'an opportunity of being heard' in the legal sense, and that, therefore, unless tried and convicted before a jury, the disqualifications do not attach. The same rule applies with greater force in relation to the Reports of Commissioners, for even candidates are subjected to no penalties or disqualifications in consequence of being reported by Commissioners as personally guilty of bribery. The result is that unless persons be prosecuted and convicted, which they cannot be in the face of a certificate of indemnity, no consequences of any kind result directly to anyone from being reported guilty of corrupt practices by Election Commissioners."—(3 Hansard, [160] 760.)

Mr. Monk

The hon. and learned Gentleman laid down there that no consequences of any kind resulted to anyone from being reported guilty of corrupt practices by Election Commissioners.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member had omitted the word "directly."

MR. H. TOLLEMACHE could not say what the hon. and learned Gentleman meant by the word "directly;" but it certainly seemed to him to be "direct" punishment to disfranchise those people for life. If those persons had had an opportunity of explaining their conduct by counsel, he believed that hundreds and hundreds of them would not have been scheduled. They in that House had had an opportunity of clearing their characters by the Act of 1883. They had, so to speak, held themselves up as paragons of electoral purity; they had called heaven and earth to witness that they were not as other men were; and he thought that now they could extend to those innocent persons that measure of generosity which they had claimed for themselves. He admitted that there were many people who would not have been unfairly treated by the punishment which appeared in the Government Bill; but, after this lapse of time, he did not think it was possible to discriminate between the different offences of which these people had been guilty; and it would be well that the first principle of the English law should be applied to this case—namely, that it was better that the few guilty should get off than that the many who were innocent should suffer. What was their crime after all? It was not a serious one. Their real crime was that of being found out. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had left the House; but he remembered that the hon. and learned Gentleman, who spoke with great authority on all these subjects, distinctly told the House that all boroughs were more or less corrupt. He had told them, in regard to the case of Knareborough, that he believed that if inquiries were made in all cases, no borough would come out purer than Knareborough. Well, there were about 10 per cent of the electors of Knareborough scheduled; and if Knareborough was, comparatively speaking, so pure, he did not think he was going too far in saying that it was not a very serious offence which had been committed. Those individuals had been hardly dealt with by being disfranchised for life; and he put it to the Committee, as a matter of justice, that those people who had not had an opportunity of explaining their conduct should be replaced on the Register. He would like to support a proposal for striking out this clause altogether; but, failing that, he should certainly support the Amendment before the Committee to limit the disfranchisement to seven years.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD would tell the Committee, in one word, what made him place a similar Amendment to the one under discussion on the Paper. When the words "for ever" came up in the Parliamentary Elections Corrupt and Illegal Practices, Bill, he had willingly joined some of his hon. Friends in endeavouring to get them struck out, because he held very strongly indeed that those words ought not to find a place in any Act of Parliament. He did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), or the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for West Cheshire (Mr. H. Tollemache), that this was an occasion to make light of those offences. He could only say that if the prayer which had been addressed to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General were listened to, the electors of other places would have very good reason to complain. He thought, for example, that there would be inequality of treatment in the case of places like Totnes, where the scheduled electors had been disfranchised by the Act of 1867, and had remained so for 18 years, and whom by another clause it was proposed to disfranchise perpetually. He had refrained from placing on the Paper any suggestion of his own as to the punishment which ought to be awarded; but he did hope that the Committee would not take any course which might lead to the conclusion that they regarded this matter lightly.

MR. MONK desired to say, as a matter of personal explanation, that he was the last man in the House to regard these matters with levity.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that the Government had already stated that this clause had been arrived at after consideration; but they desired to know what was the feeling of the Committee on the subject, and to leave the decision of the matter in their hands. The Government had no desire to act with any undue harshness or with any undue severity, and wished to know what was the general feeling of the Committee. Perhaps the Committee would allow him to remind them of what was the usual course in these matters. The hon. Member for West Cheshire (Mr. H. Tolle-mache) had stated very clearly that until the passing of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, no penal consequences attached to a person found guilty by admission of corruption, and therefore the Legislature had always dealt with each case individually. Hitherto legislation had never been tempered by those considerations which had been urged on the Committee that night by his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), and which had never been urged in the House before, although the considerations urged had existed before all the Reports were made by the Commissioners. The legislation which had been passed on this question had always had a certain stated purpose, and that was to check the continuance of corrupt practices. Two rules had been invariably followed, notwithstanding what had been said against that mode of procedure. Persons so scheduled had either been prevented from voting in the particular constituency in which they had their qualification, for life, or from voting anywhere, wherever they might move to, for seven years. There was one notable example of this. That was contained in the Representation of the People Act, 1867, which was not, as some of these measures were, an Act for the particular purpose of dealing with these persons. Full attention had been called to the question of corrupt practices. There were four boroughs dealt with. The electors in those boroughs would have been entitled to vote in the counties in which the boroughs were; but, under the Act of 1867, they were disfranchised for life from voting in the county districts in which the boroughs had been merged. He thought that, at the time, that was the legislation of general acquiescence. Under these circumstances, he hoped it would not be attributed to the Government that in drawing up this Bill they adopted a severe course. They had thought that it would be better to follow the precedents, and then to deal with the matter as the Committee might think fit. Inasmuch as they reframed the old Act of 1867 in this Bill, it occurred to them that it would be inconsistent if they made any other rule than the one they had done. They had to approach the question that night, no doubt, with some different considerations. For instance, he was sorry to say that they had to deal with a far different number of offenders than they had to deal with formerly. They had to deal with upwards of 9,000 persons who had been scheduled. It might be argued, in consequence of the large number of persons scheduled, that a greater amount of leniency should be shown them than if they were few; but he thought it might also be said that the greater the amount of the offence the less the punishment on the constituency. From all the Reports which had been received, and judging from the proceedings at recent bye-elections, there seemed to be amongst those who had hitherto had the conduct of electoral contests an earnest desire to produce, if they could, a different and a better state of things. Under such circumstances, the question arose whether the Committee would give effect to the hopes thus created, and impose a mitigated penalty? If it should seem right to the Committee to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), and thus limit the punishment to seven years, the Government would offer no objection.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE rose for one moment to express his personal satisfaction at the statement that had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It appeared to him that they had to consider the character of those who were now about to be admitted to the franchise. Considering what a very large addition had been made to the electoral roll, and considering that many of the new voters had not been trained to look upon the possession of the right or privilege of voting as a matter of trust, it was very important that at the outset of the new state of things the new electors should have before them the distinct warning that the corrupt practices of old times were at an end, and it would be impolitic to make them believe that all the sentences of the past were entirely wiped out. On the other hand, he thought the general feeling of the Committee was that it was not desirable, if they could avoid it, of keeping up perpetual punishment. Useful warning had been given as to the future, and he thought by accepting the moderate proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) the Government really met the exigencies of the case.

Mr. Monk

Mr. CLARE READ called the attention of the Attorney General to the fact that there were some Acts still in operation for the disfranchisement of voters. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would introduce words to embrace the repeal of those Acts. His hon. Friend the Member for Norwich (Mr. Colman) would hear him out when he said that in 1870 there was a special Act passed for the disfranchisement of certain voters in that city. An Act for the disfranchisement of voters was also passed in 1871. Now, those Acts disfranchised voters for life, whereas the Act passed in 1876 only disfranchised voters for seven years. He hoped the Attorney General would take care that these Acts were repealed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RAIKES moved to insert, after the word "incapable," in line 17, "during the period of seven years after the presentation of."

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 17, after the word "incapable," to insert the words "during the period of seven years after the presentation of."
—(Mr. Raikes.)

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS proposed, in page 10, line 25, after sub-section (b.), to insert the words—

"(c.) Of being a candidate for any borough or division of a county in the United Kingdom."

The hon. Member said, he hoped that all the expressions of sympathy and kindly feeling for the illiterate voter, for the poor man, who was bribed by a pint of beer, or by a sum of money up to three sovereigns—that being the range of bribery as far as experience went—had not been thrown away, and that the Committee had exercised a generous consideration for parties who had been more tempted than tempters. But he thought that to include the name of a person who had been proved to be guilty of bribing a constituency in the list of scheduled voters, and then to enable the man to sit in Parliament for any constituency, was as great a farce as the House could be capable of enacting. In the case of one constituency completely disfranchised, it was perfectly clear that one person was guilty of the most widespread, deliberate, and elaborate bribery. The borough to which he referred was, he was persuaded, well known to the Committee. The gentleman to whom he referred had been described as "an agent of great experience and success;" he had recently succeeded, it was said, in returning certain Conservatives for one borough and certain Conservative Members for another borough. Hon. Members knew what the success of the man meant with regard to one of the constituencies—a constituency which had been described as the centre of the wealth of England. In the second constituency there was a large body of poor voters, and matters were so manipulated that, apparently through the agency of this person, all the electors who were susceptible to bribes received them. What was the course the man adopted? He first of all declared that he had nothing to do with bribery; next, he instructed his sub-agents to declare or swear that they were not guilty of bribery; and then he went before the Commissioners and attempted to adopt the same plan. At last he got alarmed, went into the witness-box, declared he had bribed wholesale, and then, of course, as before, snapped his fingers in the face of the Commissioners. Why the Commissioners allowed the man to get into the box and make a clear breast of his doings, he (Mr. Thorold Rogers) could not understand. It would have been quite possible for them to have got evidence against him, and then to have brought him to book. It seemed to him (Mr. Thorold Rogers) that if they were to punish persons who were guilty of accepting bribes, they should a fortiori punish the persons who had been guilty of bribing. He believed that hitherto the practice had been to disqualify a candidate from sitting during the existence of the then Parliament for the constituency in which he was convicted; but at present there seemed to be no means of punishing an agent except by declaring that for seven years after the presentation of the Report of the Commissioners an agent guilty of malpractices should be debarred from sitting in the House. He confessed that in a case so flagrant, so obvious, and so scandalous as the one he had referred to—and there were others of a like nature—a punishment such as even what he proposed was wholly inadequate. The Committee were aware that if legal perjury was proved against a Member, and there had been such instances in the history of the House of Commons—he did not recollect the number of cases, but there was an instance in 1787—the Member was immediately expelled. He thought that the common sense of the House ought to be strong enough to declare that if a person had not been legally convicted of perjury, but morally convicted, he should be prevented from sitting in their midst. The man to whom he had referred was practically exempted from the consequences of his own admissions, because the practice of giving an indemnity relieved him from those consequences; but he (Mr. Thorold Rogers) did not think the House as a Court—if he might say so, as a Court of Honour—ought to ignore such practices committed by agents at elections, but should visit them with very severe punishment. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 25, after sub-section (b.), to insert the words,—“(c.) Of being a candidate for any borough or division of a county in the United Kingdom.”—(Mr. Thorold Rogers.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was sorry the Amendment had been defended by the hon. Member who proposed it simply by a reference to one individual case. The hon. Gentleman had used one word, at all events, with reference to that case which would scarcely be justified if the matter were fully gone into. He (Mr. E. Clarke) did not think there was any question of perjury in the case to which the hon. Member referred, or anything approaching perjury; but he, at the same time, cordially agreed with the hon. Gentleman in the Amendment he had moved. He should be very happy to vote with the hon. Gentleman if he pressed the Amendment to a division. He could not imagine they were justified in saying that voters should be precluded for seven years from the power of voting for Members of Parliament in consequence of having been scheduled, and that one of the persons who had been guilty of bribing should have the right to stand as a candidate for Parliamentary honours. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted by the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not wish to dwell too much upon the particular case which had been cited, though he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) that it was one of the worst cases it was possible to conceive in the annals of their electoral system. The person hinted at bribed 1,100 persons, then went before the Judges who tried the Election Petition and swore there was no bribery, allowed other persons to make the same statement, and then went into the witness-box, and, under cover of the indemnity, disclosed the whole system of bribery that had been employed and the names of his confederates, against whom he subsequently appeared to give evidence. But, after all, he (the Attorney General) did not think Parliament ought to be guided in legislation by one particular case. This Parliament had imposed new penalties for corrupt practices at elections. The facts of this case occurred in 1881, and they were known to everybody who took part in the discussions on the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, and, whilst the case was mentioned, the House did not then by general legislation dare to make the penalties retrospective. He thought it would be unjust to do so now. Much as he sympathized with his hon. Friend (Mr. Thorold Rogers), much as he should regret to see Parliamentary honours bestowed upon a person who had acted as the person to whom reference had been made acted, he thought the safer course to pursue, both as a matter of precedent and as a matter of justice, was not to introduce legislation of a retrospective character. Such a precedent might lead to great evil. To his mind, it would be a very evil precedent to impose one day a retrospective penalty for a crime committed the previous day. Although he was in sympathy with the object of his hon. Friend (Mr. Thorold Rogers), he must look at the matter in a broad spirit. When he did that, he did not think any good purpose would be served by making the penalty retrospective.

Mr. Thorold Rogers

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 90: Majority 13.—(Div. List, No. 60.)

Mr. WARTON proposed to insert, at end of line 28, page 10—

"As if the disqualification of such person had arisen after the commencement of the said Act."

He pointed out that in the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act there were the words—

"By reason of having after the commencement of this Act been found guilty," and so on. They had already disqualified certain persons by the Amendment just carried; but they had not disqualified them for ever, but for a period of seven years from the Report of the Judges or Commissioners in 1880. It was perfectly clear that when the corrupt practices took place in 1880, they did not take place after the commencement of the Act of 1883, and he was inclined to think that some of the guilty might escape unless steps were now taken to guard against their escape. It was to guard against that that he moved this Amendment. He would call the attention of the Attorney General to an effect which might be produced by the application of this section. If they looked at all to the machinery they would find that the persons who were to be included in this proposal would have the same right of being heard and of showing cause. Had they a right to be heard as to the particulars of the case?

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, at end of line 28, to insert the words "As if the disqualification of such person had arisen after the commencement of the said Act."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES said, he was sorry that he had very imperfectly heard the observations which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton). It appeared to him, however, that the point raised was of a very technical nature, and as the Amendment was not on the Paper he was unable to express any opinion upon it. If the hon. and learned Member would be good enough to send it to him in writing, as he had described it as one of the greatest importance and which ought to be accepted, he the Attorney General) would bestow upon it that attention which it deserved.

Mr. WARTON: On that understanding, I will withdraw the Amendment for the present.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 27, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Mr. H. TOLLEMACHE said, he wished to make one more appeal to the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill. He regretted that several hon. Members, who unquestionably would have given their support to the change he wished to bring about in the Bill, had they been present, and who ought to have been in their places, were not now in attendance. He would not go into all the questions he had raised in his speech a while ago; but he would draw the attention of the Attorney General to just one question which he had omitted to answer. He wished to know whether the Commissioners who were appointed to inquire as to the existence or prevalence of corrupt practices at elections in 1880, had power to inquire into practices which were not corrupt until 1883? Scores of people had been found guilty of treating and of being treated during the General Election of 1880; but in that year these things were not corrupt practices. He should like also to draw attention to another point. He did not wish to argue this question from a local point of view; but, in the case of Chester alone, there were a great many individuals scheduled for being treated. He thought he was right in saying that all the Commissioners, except those who inquired into the Chester case, had not mentioned in their Reports cases of individuals being treated. In the case of

[Fifth Night.]

Macclesfield, the Commissioners stated at the head of their Report that no person who had been treated had been scheduled. He would ask, therefore, whether it was fair for the few hundred people in Chester who had been scheduled for having been treated to be disqualified for even seven years, when other people in similar cases had not been so treated? There was just one other point which he had forgotten to mention—namely, that all the Commissioners in holding their Courts of Inquiry had stated that no further proceedings, either criminal or civil, would be taken against any person who made a clean breast of the matter; and on the faith of that assurance very many persons had come forward and confessed to electoral offences. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would answer his case about the scheduling of the people who had been treated in Chester, and nowhere else. If he got any support, he should ask the Committee to divide upon the question of expunging this clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could hardly think the hon. Member was in earnest in asking the Committee to expunge this clause, seeing that the Amendment which he moved just now had been taken as a settlement of the question. ["No, no!"] Well, then, why did not the hon. Member divide against his Amendment? As to treating and being treated, there could be no doubt that they were corrupt practices even prior to 1880. The hon. Member was quite mistaken in supposing that a person guilty of either of these offences escaped all punishment. He lost his vote thereby. If some of the Commissioners had performed their duty zealously, had made an exhaustive inquiry, and had scheduled all persons guilty of treating or of having been treated, it was not a fair plea to say that, because other Commissioners had not done so, therefore the persons scheduled, in the first instance, should escape the consequences of their illegal action. That would be a very dangerous principle to lay down.

Motion agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Adaptation of certain enactments as to disqualification of voters for corrupt practices).

Mr. H. Toller-mache

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was necessary for him now to draw the attention of the Committee to the position in which they stood with regard to this clause. He presumed that in the opinion of hon. Members this section would now require some alteration. He presumed it would apply to the boroughs of Bridgwater and Beverley, and the other four boroughs he had already mentioned, and, to be consistent, the Committee would not desire to re-enact a light punishment for these. It only affected six boroughs, because the framers of the Bill had only to deal with the boroughs which were in the counties, and which were now in the divisions of the counties. There were other boroughs which would have to be dealt with—for instance, Norwich—which did not require to be dealt with in this clause. A clause should, he thought, be brought up in respect to Norwich on the Report. So as to make the Bill consistent, this clause should be reframed, and he therefore hoped the Committee would allow it to be struck out.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that before any of the new clauses were introduced at the suggestion of private Members, he would ask the Government to bring up the Notes to the Schedules in the form of a new clause. Taking the form of the Bill as it stood, it seemed to him that this mode of drawing up an Act of Parliament was perfectly novel. He could not help thinking it wrong, and, with all due respect to the draftsmen, he was confident that it would be more consonant with previous legislation if what were called "Notes to the Schedules" were introduced as a new clause, in order that they could be properly enacted, and would not stand as a hybrid subject, so that no one would understand what they were. He appealed to the Government to accept the suggestion he made, and bring up these Notes as a new clause. No doubt, some of the wording would have to be altered if that were done.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the Committee should be allowed to go through private Members' clauses. When they were disposed of—and he was very doubtful whether any of them would be added to the Bill—he should then be happy to follow the advice tendered to him, and to move that the Notes to the Schedules be formed into a new clause. He might say that personally he had favoured the course now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, but that he had been overruled by the draftsmen, who informed him that the manner in which the Notes were inserted was the best form to adopt. The draftsmen, at the same time, had assured him that there were many precedents for the course pursued.

Mr. WARTON said, they had already passed, in Clause 22, words to the effect that the Notes should be construed as part of the Act. If the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) were adopted, it was obvious that Clause 22 would have to be altered.

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: That will have to be left out.

Mr. AGNEW said, he wished, in page 3, after Clause 9, to move the insertion of a clause declaring that—

“At a general parliamentary election the polls (if any) for the divisions in a divided county shall be taken on the same day, such day to be fixed by the returning officer of the county.”

The Committee was, no doubt, aware that already provision had been made in the case of divided boroughs that the Returning Officer should be required to order the elections to take place on the same day. The object of the clause for which he now respectfully ventured to ask the favour of the Committee for was to apply the same principle to divided counties. It appeared to him that if the principle was good in the one case it must be good in the other. They had passed a Corrupt Practices Act within the life of the present Parliament, for one purpose, at least, that they might get a full, free, and an honest expression of the people's will at the poll; and he contended that if a system of one-day elections were so partially adopted as was involved within the terms of the clause he now proposed, the Committee would have done much to promote the orderly conduct of elections, and to prevent the improper conduct which was so frequently seen in the constituencies all over the country at election times. It might be said that there were difficulties in the way of carrying out the plan he advocated. He ventured to anticipate one objection which might be made. Probably it would be said that it would be difficult for the Returning Officer—the High Sheriff of the county—to find a staff of officials sufficiently numerous to conduct the elections in all county divisions on one day. Well, he would remind the Committee, and those Members especially who sat for large boroughs and constituencies, that in some towns in this country—in one 18, in another 19, and in another, he believed, 20—ward elections were contested, or might be contested, on a given day—on the 1st of November. He could not for a moment suppose that there would be any more difficulty on the part of the Sheriff or the Returning Officer of a county in providing facilities for General Elections, than it was for those provided by a High Bailiff or the Mayor of a borough for taking municipal elections on the 1st of November. He was certainly of opinion, in the interests of order and of general good conduct, which, unhappily, had not always been apparent at Parliamentary elections, that if elections were conducted all over the country on one and the same day, it would be a very good thing for the public; and he had placed an Amendment on the Paper with the object of asking the Committee to consider that larger portion of the question. He did not, however, intend on this occasion to move that Amendment, because he knew that practically it would be impossible to obtain for it that acceptance which he thought it deserved; but he did hope that there were in the Committee those who would join with him in supporting the Motion which he now made—namely, that this new clause should be added to the Bill; and, certainly, if he had any support at all, he should take a division upon the point. Many hon. Members knew that he was a thoroughly loyal Party man; but he, nevertheless, felt himself considerably inconvenienced by what was popularly known as “The Compact.” Yet the Motion he now made, he ventured to assert, favoured neither Party. It was just as much to the interests of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to support it. [“No, no!”] At any rate, while he believed those Gentlemen to be just as honest as he claimed to be himself, he believed it to be in their interests, as it was in the interests of hon. Members who sat on his side of the House, that the elections in divided counties should take place on one and the same day. It was within his experience—no; he withdrew that word, because he had no practical or personal knowledge of such things, but he had heard of a case in a borough in his own county. In a certain town, an election took place in 1880. On the following day an election took place in another town, and to that town from the town in which the first election had taken place, 200 men were drafted to take part in the electoral business—that was to say, 200 men were drafted from A to help the citizens of B to record their votes. Again, he knew a case where a political committee in a borough, which he would call C, had not scrupled to get from B, where an election had taken place on the previous day, from 80 to 100 carriages to help the free and independent electors to record their votes. These were practices that the House had in effect condemned when it passed the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal) Practices Act. If the Committee would agree to the clause he took the liberty of proposing, he believed they would be still further endorsing the expression they had given in that Act of their determination, so far as possible, to minimize and limit these extraneous and corrupting influences. He trusted that the Committee would pardon him—a Member who did not too frequently, or, indeed, very frequently, intrude himself on their attention—for having brought this subject forward; and he hoped that, however seldom they heard him speak, they would none the less accord to the proposal which he ventured to make at least a careful attention. He begged to move the clause which stood in his name.

[Fifth Night.]

New Clause:—

(Polls in divided counties.)

“At a general parliamentary election the polls (if any) for the divisions in a divided county shall be taken on the same day, such day to be fixed by the returning officer of the county,”—(Mr. Agnew.)

brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought it was very possible that, sooner or later, some action would have to be taken in the direction indicated by the clause; but at the present moment, when Parliament was throwing on the Sheriffs of counties considerably increased duties, he very much doubted whether it would be wise for the Committee to run the risk which they would run if, as in the case of Lancashire, the conduct of two or three elections would rest upon the shoulders of one Sheriff by the acceptance of this proposal. He thought the acceptance of the clause would strain the powers of the Local Authorities almost as greatly as the acceptance of the proposal which was in the name of the hon. Member lower down on the Paper, to the effect that all elections at every General Election in the United Kingdom should be held on one and the same day. Looking at the great difficulties in the way of the working of the new Franchise Act and of the new Registration Act in every case, he was afraid of doing anything which would add to those difficulties, and which might possibly lead to a breakdown. It was on this ground, more than on general grounds of principle, that he would appeal to the Committee not to accept the clause.

Mr. Agnew

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said, that if he might be allowed to make a few remarks on this subject, he would say that he thought the objection taken by the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board was really hardly sufficient, because, after all, by the very Bill which they were now about to pass, by Clauses 11 and 12, the Returning Officer had power to depute his duties in several parts of the divisions to his Deputies, who were to be paid according to a certain scale, and were practically to be responsible for the election. Though it might be said that the Sheriff was to be responsible for them, they would each, in their own part of the county, have to carry out the duties of the election itself, and undertake all the responsibilities. Therefore, he thought that, so far as the Sheriff was concerned, the adoption of the proposal would not throw additional work on his shoulders, or, at any rate, would not throw responsibilities upon him which he could not undertake. If that objection did not hold, he thought there were some very strong advantages which would spring from the adoption of this proposal. In the first place, it appeared to him to be too much lost sight of that the Returning Officer was an official, and that it ought to be absolutely out of his power in any way to influence the election. It was notorious, however, that the dates of elections at present were constantly fixed by Returning Officers in a manner and on a day that they believed would tend to the advantage of the Party to which they belonged, and put to disadvantage the Party to which they did not belong. If anyone would take the trouble to look at the dates on which the different elections in the different portions of the counties took place in 1880, he would see that it must have been largely personal influence which had caused particular dates to be chosen, and that such a system could not possess the confidence of the electors themselves. To give an instance of the evil to which he alluded, he found that in 1880, in the county of Cheshire, in which there were three divisions, in one division the Returning Officer fixed the nomination day on the 2nd of April, and the polling day on the 3rd. In another division he fixed the nomination day on the 5th of April, and the polling to take place on the 9th, which was a difference of four days; and in the third division he fixed the nomination day on the 6th, and the polling to take place on the 13th, or a difference of seven days. It must have been some personal influence which caused that enormous discrepancy between the nomination day and the day of polling, and he did not think it could be said that the arrangement had been quite legitimate, and without bias or influence. Then, again, they had now passed the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, which had fixed a maximum scale of expenditure for elections; and a fixed amount should surely involve a definite time for the period of election. In some cases, by the action of the Returning Officer, the election might be spread, as occurred in some cases in 1880, over a period of a fortnight; while in other cases only a single day might be allowed in which it could take place. He thought that Parliament having passed the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act was a very strong argument for fixing—he would not say the poll to take place on the same day throughout the country, though he should be in favour of such an arrangement as that—but the poll to take place on the same day in the various divisions of a county. There were several matters in regard to conveyance, bribery, &c., which were arguments in favour of the proposal; but he did not wish to detain the Committee, and, therefore, would allow them to pass. It seemed to him that the only possible objection which could be taken to this proposal was that the Returning Officers would have too much to do; but, as he had suggested, that difficulty could be got over by appointing an efficient Returning Officer for each division, and seeing that they did their duties.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he was afraid that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken knew very little of the practical effect of the Amendment he proposed. He had said that the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board could take no practical objection to the clause; but, as a matter of fact, the difficulty would be in working out the principle of the clause in practice. Those who knew anything about the working of county elections must know that it was almost impossible for the various County Sheriffs at present to carry out the duties which Parliament had imposed upon them, without being considerably out of pocket by so doing. The hon. Gentleman had forgotten that, in all these cases, the Sheriff did not know until the day of the nomination whether there was to be a contest or not. This difficulty existed in many counties. In some cases, no doubt, it was known whether or not contests were to take place; but in others it was not known until the certain period allowed by Parliament had passed; and it was, therefore, impossible for the Sheriff to make his arrangements within a day or two of the election, when all at once a contest was sprung upon him. The right hon. Baronet who had the management of the Bill knew the difficulty there was at the present time in the way of Sheriffs obtaining their Deputies. They were named in the Act of Parliament as if it were easy to get them; but he would remind the hon. Member that they were only allowed three guineas, and that for this remuneration they had to give up sometimes two days and three nights to the work. The proposal was an impracticable one, and he was quite sure the Committee would do right in refusing to read it a second time.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. LEAKE said, he did not understand the objection of the hon. and learned Member for East Surrey (Mr. Grantham), because it was well known that the Sheriff, or other Returning Officer, could find as many Deputy Returning Officers as were required. At present, under the redistribution scheme of the Government, it would be necessary for the Returning Officer to find several Deputies in a place like Manchester. He admitted the difficulty pointed out by the Government. They were on the eve of a very great change, and no doubt it was as well that the difficulties which would have to be faced in connection with the extended franchise and the redistribution scheme should be minimized as much as possible; but he failed to see what greater difficulty there could be than this—that was to say, to have in such a place as the South-Eastern Division of Lancashire, eight consecutive elections on eight consecutive days. Anyone who knew the excitement of electioneering could well understand what a rush there would be of the electors from one division in which the work of polling had just finished to another in which it was just commencing. Anyone who had had practical experience of elections, and who understood what this difficulty was and was likely to be under the new Bill, would without doubt do all in his power to endeavour to remove it. Formerly, there was a 14 days' poll, which, however, gave way, for the convenience of electors, first, to a two days' poll, and then from a two days' poll to a one day's poll. The tendency of legislation had been to simplify all proceedings connected with elections, and throughout the United Kingdom there would be very little difficulty in appointing the polling for the borough on one day, and that for the counties on another day. He certainly thought the proposition of his hon. Friend (Mr. Agnew) was well worth the consideration of those who occupied the two Front Benches, who had already done so much towards securing a settlement of these matters.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE said, the hon. Member (Mr. Sidney Buxton) had quoted a case of a division of the county of Cheshire, in which, as he had stated, the Returning Officer had fixed the 2nd of April as the nomination day, and the polling day on the 3rd. If the hon. Gentleman were accurate in his statement, he (Mr. Northcote) maintained that such a procedure was entirely contrary to the law, and he should like to ask the hon. Member whether he would state which division of the county of Cheshire he referred to?

Mr. Grantham

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON replied, that he was sorry he had not taken down the particular division to which he had referred; but he had obtained the information in the Library, and he should be very glad to supply it to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Northcote) afterwards.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY opposed the clause, and said, that if the same Returning Officer were called upon to manage several elections on the same day, he could not see how, in some cases, especially in his own, it was possible that this could be done. He thought that such a consideration ought to decide the Committee against the adoption of the proposal contained in the Amendment.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, there was one point to which he desired very briefly to call the attention of the Committee. At a General Election there were all sorts of local circumstances, of which the Sheriffs of counties were cognizant, that would render it exceedingly difficult to carry out the proposal involved in the Amendment. For instance, markets in different parts of the county were generally held on particular days, and if the Committee were to draw a hard-and-fast line, by fixing the election for the different divisions on the same day, it would be found that this would seriously interfere with the convenience of the electors by clashing very much with their market arrangements.

MR. ECROYD said, the hon. Members for South-East Lancashire, who had proposed and supported the Amendment, did not appear to appreciate the difference that existed between the two cases—of voting for boroughs, and voting for the divisions of counties. But the right of those who possessed property in different divisions to vote for that property had been recognized by the measure, and any attempt to hold the elections for all the divisions of such a county as Lancashire on the same day must necessarily disqualify a large proportion of those who were thus entitled to vote. He would not take up the time of the Committee further; but it was important that they should understand what was the real meaning and motive of the Amendment before them. For his own part, he should certainly vote against the proposal of his hon. Friend.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 155: Majority 93.—Div. List, No. 61.)

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in rising to move the following Clause:—

"The number of Members of the House of Commons shall be fixed at six hundred and fifty-eight."

said, in proposing the clause of which he had given Notice, he desired briefly to state the reasons upon which he founded it.

MR. BUCHANAN rose to a point of Order, upon which he desired the ruling of the Chair. The House, he said, at an earlier stage of the measure, had negatived a Motion involving a similar proposition that had been brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), although in other words—namely, "It is inexpedient that the numbers of this House should be increased." He (Mr. Buchanan) wished to ask whether, after the House had negatived that proposition, it was competent for the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) to raise the same question in a new clause in Committee?

MR. RAIKES asked whether the Chairman did not consider that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), to which the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) had just referred, did not materially differ from the clause now proposed by the hon. Baronet, Sir Eardley Wilmot, inasmuch as it was expressly intended to diminish the representation of Ireland and Wales, whereas the clause now before the Committee need not, if adopted, have any effect in such a direction? He therefore submitted, as a point worthy the consideration of the Chair, whether there was not a very material difference between the Amendment negatived on the proposal to go into Committee, and the clause now moved?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he remembered the Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), with the view of preventing an increase in the numbers of the House. That Amendment was negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would point out to the Committee that they were now in a different stage to that in which the decision referred to had been given. He must say, however, that he had had great doubt as to whether he could accept the Amendment submitted by the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot), as it appeared to him to be much more in the form of an abstract Resolution than of a new clause, and, to a certain extent, it seemed to be in contradiction of some of the decisions to which the Committee had already arrived. The hon. Baronet, in moving this as a new clause, ought to have stated the Schedule by which effect was to be given to it, and how he proposed to dispose of the number of Members so as to reduce them to 658. He the Chairman, had not thought proper to stop the hon. Baronet, nor should he do so, if the hon. Baronet chose to go on after hearing this expression of his opinion.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, after the ruling just given by the Chairman of Committees, he would state the reasons that had induced him to propose the clause. He was quite aware of what had been done on a former occasion by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), and he remembered that that proposal, being one that had a double effect involving two distinct propositions, he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had been prevented from giving his vote for it, as he could not vote for both proposals. Therefore, he had thought he should be in Order in moving the clause he had put upon the Paper. As he was allowed to proceed with his proposition, he would take the opportunity of offering a few observations in explanation of why he had brought it forward. He was not aware exactly how far he was acting in opposition to what they all understood to be the compact between the two Front Benches of that House in moving this new clause. He should be sorry to do anything that would appear to violate the solemn compact which had hitherto bound hon. Members on that side of the House in a hard-and-fast bond in regard to this Redistribution Bill. He also begged to say that, in moving his new clause, he had no wish to say anything in opposition to what he considered to be the just claims of the Scotch Members to an addition of 12 Members to the present representation of Scotland. It was not his object in any way to prevent such an addition being made to the representation of North Britain. He would, therefore, state as briefly as possible what his object really was. He considered that the present constitution of the House, which had consisted of 658 Members throughout the whole of the present century, was quite sufficient to meet the requirements of the country. Last week, he had ventured, in addressing the House, to give it as his opinion that if they could have reduced the number of Members of that House to 600, they would have done much better than in accepting the proposal to increase their number to 670. At the beginning of the present century the number of Members of the House of Commons was, as he had already indicated, 658—namely, 513 for England and Wales, 45 for Scotland, and 100 for Ireland. Previous to that period the number had been 558; but at the time of the Act of Union an addition of 100 Members was made. When, in 1832, a new Reform Act was passed, they found that no alteration whatever was made in the number of Members constituting that assembly. Lord Grey added five Members to the Irish constituencies, and also increased the number of Scotch Members; but he retained the total number of 658—namely, 500 for England and Wales, 53 for Scotland, and 105 for Ireland. Proceeding further in the direction of Reform—and he only wished that, in the present Bill, Her Majesty's Government had followed the memorable Acts to which he had referred, as closely as the Conservative Government had followed the precedents before them—he found that under the Act passed during the Government of Mr. Disraeli, afterwards Lord Beaconsfield, the number of Members which had, up to that time, composed the House—namely, 658, was still retained. The number returned by Ireland was allowed to remain—105—as it had previously been; but 15 Members were added to Scotland, by which the number of Representatives for that portion of the United Kingdom was raised from 45 to 60, that addition being obtained by the sacrifice of a corresponding number of seats in England and Wales, the total number of English and Welsh seats being thereby reduced from 513 to 493, thus making a total for the Three Kingdoms of 658. The proposal of the present Bill went, however, on a totally different principle. It was now proposed that Ireland should have 103 Representatives, that the number in Scotland should be increased to 72, and that England and Wales should have 495, making, together, a total of 670. In order to arrive at a just appreciation of this question, he would ask the Committee to take into consideration the way in which the various other Representative Chambers in Europe and America were constituted. It would be found that, comparing the number of Representatives with the population, as well as with the number of registered electors, the amount of representation in the different European countries and in the United States was very much less than in the United Kingdom. He would, first of all, take the German Chamber. He found that in Germany there was a population of 45,324,161, and a total of upwards of 9,000,000 of electors, of whom, at the last General Election, upwards of 5,000,000 voted, while the number of Representatives returned to the Reichstag was 432, the number having been increased from 397 at the time the different States of Germany became united. Turning from Germany to France, he found the result of the comparison with this country pretty much the same. The French Chamber of Deputies, at which he had been present during some of the debates, was composed of only 537 Members, the population of the entire country amounting to 37,405,290, and the number of electors at the last General Election to upwards of 10,000,000. So that, with this enormous population, and under the system of universal suffrage which prevailed there under so large an electorate, the French people were content with 537 Representatives, as against 658—or, as was now proposed, 670—in the United Kingdom. The next example he would take was that of the United States, which, to the present occupants of the Treasury Bench, would appear to present such a wonderful model for imitation in the present measure. Up to the year 1870, there were only 293 Representatives in the Lower Chamber of the United States; but it was then increased to 395, at which number it now remained, which gave one Representative to every 104,325 of the population, which, in 1880, was nearly 50,000,000, while the number of electors who voted at the last Election of President was 10,500,000. At the Census of 1880 the population had actually increased in 30 years by 37,118,743. He quoted these examples for the purpose of showing that in all the other Chambers of Representatives, both in Europe and America—and he had with him, and could quote if necessary, similar statistics to those he had already given, for Belgium and Italy—the representation of the people was much smaller in proportion to population than it was in this country. This might not go for very much; but he had still another argument which, he thought, would weigh with hon. Members of that Committee; and it was that, whether as affecting the opportunities for speaking and transacting the general Business of that Assembly, or the question of finding places in a Chamber which was already too small to accommodate all its Members, the proposed addition to the number of Members would not add to the difficulties already experienced. It was true that 12 was not, in itself, a large number to add to the existing total; but if the principle of increasing the numerical composition of the House were once admitted, it would be very difficult on any future occasion to resist the appeals that might be anticipated from different boroughs in which the population increased, as no doubt it would, for an increase in the number of Representatives sent to that Chamber. Therefore, he submitted, the number of Members of that House ought not to be increased. He based his proposal on the various reasons he had urged with regard to the practice pursued in other countries, and especially with reference to the fact that in no other Reform Bill since the beginning of the century had any attempt been made to increase the number of Members constituting that House. In view of all these examples, he contended that they would not be justified, even for the purpose of adding to the present number of Scotch Representatives, which he freely admitted was a desirable procedure, in adding to the total number of the House. It was not for him, an humble individual, to point out how the additional Members were to be obtained for the purpose of giving extra representation to Scotland. The examples he had quoted showed that great statesmen who, on former occasions, had introduced and carried Reform Bills, found opportunities for increasing the representation of Scotland. He acknowledged that Scotland was entitled to a larger representation than it had at present; but it ought not to obtain it at the expense of an addition to the numbers of the House. Therefore, with great confidence in the justice and reasonableness of his suggestion, he begged to move the new clause which stood in his name.

[Fifth Night.]

Sir Eardley Wilmot

Clause (Number of Members of the House of Commons.)—Sir Eardley Wilmot,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Baronet says it is not for him, a humble individual, to show how the additional Members for Scotland ought to be obtained without increasing the number of the Members of the House.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: I said I would not take it upon myself to do so, as I considered that incumbent upon the Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am quoting the hon. Baronet's words. He said he, as a humble individual, would not say how the extra Members to be given to Scotland should be found. Now, it is an essential part of the hon. Gentleman's case—for not only on this occasion, but on former occasions, he has announced it—that there should be no diminution in the representation of Ireland.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: I say that now.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Then he wishes to obtain the seats for Scotland from England.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: On former occasions framers of Reform Bills have found means of adding to the representation of Scotland. I think it would be quite within your power to do that now.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The only effect of the hon. Gentleman's proposal would be that seats should be taken from England and Wales and given to Scotland. I do not think the Committee generally would desire to take that course, for I am bound to say that on the two former occasions on which this matter was discussed—namely, on the Motion of the right hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), and also on the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold)—there did not appear to be any general feeling in the House against the proposal that is made in the Bill. The practical result of the proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Sir Eardley Wilmot), if adopted, would be that we should have to do exactly what he strongly protests against—that is to say, to take three Members from Ireland. The hon. Baronet has argued that if we now fix the number of Members at 670, we shall probably, at some future time, go further, and increase the number still more. That is not my opinion. I venture to think that if you look at the framework of this Bill, you will find that it is unlikely that in the future any proposal to increase the number of the House will be made. All that it will ever be likely to do in the future will simply be to increase the quota of the population.

MR. RAIKES said, he was not at all disappointed to hear what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke), because the right hon. Baronet was unable to vote in support of the Amendment which was moved when the Motion was made that "The Speaker do leave the Chair." With regard to taking a certain number of Members from Ireland and a certain number from Wales, he (Mr. Raikes) wished to explain why he thought the proposal which his hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had made now deserved the serious consideration of the Committee. It seemed to him it was a proposal which, apart from political exigencies, would probably command the adhesion of every Member of the Committee; he did not suppose that even the Members of the Treasury Bench, or of the Front Opposition Bench, would dissent from this proposition, if it were not for special and particular circumstances which had led hon. and right hon. Gentlemen to a different conclusion. But they were told that it would be impossible to deal with this Amendment so as to incorporate it in the Bill, without altering the scale in a way which would be distasteful to the Committee. He, however, differed from that view. He quite accepted the necessity that it would entail the taking of three Members from Ireland. He had always felt that it would be extremely undesirable—if not, indeed, unjust—to reduce Ireland to a representation below the Act of Union number of 100; but he believed that between 100 and 103 it was open to the Committee to consider whether they should not find an opportunity—if they could do so in accordance with the scale—of reducing the representation of Ireland to the amount prescribed by the Act of Union. He ventured to point out that, in dealing with Ireland, the scale had been departed from. There were several of the Irish counties which received from this Bill representation to which they would not have been entitled had they been English counties. There were two or three Irish counties which obtained four Members, but which, had they been in England, would only have obtained three Members; and there was at least one county in Ireland which received three Members, but which, if it had been in England, would only have received two—he referred to the county of Armagh. Now, that county contained only 162,000 inhabitants, and it was, therefore, below the limit of 165,000 entitling to three Members.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE remarked that, in order to keep up the balance between boroughs and counties, large counties were better treated than large boroughs.

MR. RAIKES said, he had no doubt that the statement just made by the right hon. Baronet was perfectly consistent with the rest of his argument; but he (Mr. Raikes) did not see that it bound the Committee. He understood that no constituency under 165,000 inhabitants was entitled to three Members—that was to say, that there should be a Member for a little over every 50,000 people. He could not see why Leicester, for instance, was to be content with two Members, while some Irish counties, scarcely exceeding it in population, and immeasurably inferior to it in wealth and every other ingredient which went to make up an important town, should have three and four Members. There were one or two Irish counties which were now to return four Members to which the same argument applied. There were Tipperary and Tyrone for example. Both these counties were over-represented as compared with English constituencies of the same population. He did not think it would be very unjust, therefore, if three Members were taken from the Irish counties he had named, and by that means the Irish representation would be brought down to 100, as prescribed by the Act of Union. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) received very little encouragement when he proposed to raise the limit of disfranchisement above 15,000 as regarded single boroughs. He Mr. Raikes observed, however, that most of the proposals made in that House by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Salford received very little encouragement, and he did not think, therefore, that they ought to argue too far on that particular case; but, at the same time, the particular question was settled by a very decided and overwhelming vote so far as the representation of the small towns was concerned. He Mr. Raikes wished to ask whether there was not another way of dealing with the towns containing 15,000 inhabitants otherwise than by disfranchising them; was it not possible that some arrangement should be made by which the small constituencies should be grouped together and enjoy representation conjointly with each other, but in such a manner as to create constituencies which would still fall short of the quota for a single Member? Peterborough, for example, had no particular claim that he knew of on the House to return any excessive number of Members. It contained some 22,000 inhabitants, and it was within half-an-hour, by the Great Northern Railway, of the town of Grantham, which had a population of 15,000. He could not see why these towns could not be grouped together; in that way one Member would be gained. He thought other constituencies might very easily be found capable of being grouped. He did not know whether grouping was objected to by the present Government, although it was invented by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister; he knew that the Government disliked the phrase, but he did not see why they should not accept the fact. They might well combine a certain number of constituencies containing populations which, in the aggregate, would amount to somewhere about 55,000, and thereby obtain three or four Members more. He was speaking now both of England and Wales. Then there came another part of the question which had not yet been raised in the Committee, but which was deserving consideration, and that was the question of the boroughs above 50,000 which still retained two Members. He had put down upon the Paper an Amendment, which he should not at all attempt to discuss now, dealing with the smallest of these boroughs—he meant the town of Ipswich. He put that Amendment down, having special regard to the fact that if the quota of representation by one Member was fixed at 54,000 or 55,000 there could not be any shadow of a reason for giving two Members to any constituency which was not, by population, even entitled to one Member. There were one or two other boroughs to be found in the same category—for instance, Stockport and Northampton. No doubt, hon. Members would be sorry to deprive the House of the ornaments which those boroughs contributed to their Assembly; but still it might be possible, with the view of public necessity, even to make a sacrifice of that description. He certainly could not see why this proposition, which was based on experience of foreign countries and supported by the experience of this Assembly, should be put aside as wholly unworthy of consideration when the materials were at hand for giving it immediate effect. Of course they heard a great deal about the compact, and he would quite admit that the scheme, as a whole, was a fairly reasonable one. He also readily admitted that the compact was an arrangement which, of course, afforded the only opportunity of passing through this House any Redistribution Bill which would have any approximation to justice; but even the best of rules admitted of exceptions, and he could not see why it should not be possible so far to infringe on this scheme in the direction proposed. He could not for the life of him understand why they should not be allowed to alter the scheme in any one single particular. He hoped the Committee would pause before rejecting the new clause which his hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) had proposed. He believed that if the Committee was free from those bugbears which were constantly paraded before it, there would be very little difference of opinion as to the desirability of accepting this clause. He appealed to the judgment of the Committee as to whether, before they started upon the Schedules, it was not proper to deal with this question, and retain, if possible, that number of Members which had been found to work so well throughout the whole of the present century.

Sir Eardley Wilmot

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I consider that the question whether the number of Members of the House should be increased is a question which the Committee itself must deal with and decide upon; but my opinion is that undoubtedly the easiest and simplest way of dealing with the difficulty which presents itself is by making an addition to the number of the Members of the House. If you enter upon a business like that of recasting the representation of the people in this House, recasting it as far as you can upon the principle of equalization, you will find that you have to go into very difficult and complicated questions; and, undoubtedly, if you had to begin with reducing the number of Members allotted to any particular part of the United Kingdom, you raise the question of equalization in a much more difficult form than you would if you add to the number of the House. Undoubtedly, the criticisms that would have been applied to your scheme would have been very great if the scheme were one involving the taking away Members from England and Wales for the sake of adding to the representation of Scotland; they would have been of such a very difficult and complicated character, that I think the Government have acted wisely, and that we are right in agreeing with them. I myself feel perfectly at one with the Government in the proposal they make with regard to the mode of dealing with the increase in the representation of Scotland. It has been said that what is to be now done will establish a precedent for further increasing the number of the House if at any future time an occasion arises; but we must bear in mind the particular circumstances under which this increase is proposed. We have just admitted no less than 2,000,000 voters to the electorate, which has thereby been raised from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. The large addition of 2,000,000 voters does supply a reason for the addition to the number of the Members of the House. Upon the whole, it is the easiest method of dealing with this question, and it is one which is most likely to produce a satisfactory result. I think the Committee may well be content with the proposal of the Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: After the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), perhaps I may be allowed to make one observation. The right hon. Gentleman says that the scheme is undoubtedly favourable to the Irish counties; but that is not the case. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the scheme after the adjustment of boundaries which took place after the Bill was first introduced, he will see that the only two counties which are out of their place in the scale, so far as population is concerned, are two English counties—namely, Worcestershire and Wiltshire. The right hon. Gentleman mentions two counties—namely, Tipperary and Tyrone, from each of which a Member might very properly be taken. Now, the populations of these counties are 197,000 and 199,000 respectively; while Dorsetshire, with a population of 191,000, has the same number of Members allotted. The other case the right hon. Gentleman mentioned was the county of Armagh. Now, it has 157,000 of a population, and is to have three Members; while the East Riding of Yorkshire has 145,000 of a population, and also three Members. I have not mentioned the cases where we have left counties with a certain number of Members; but I have specially confined my remarks to where additional Members have been given.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I am anxious to say a few words on this question, because I regret to find myself in entire disagreement with what has just fallen from my right hon. Friend

Mr. Raikes

(Sir Stafford Northcote). My right hon. Friend argued in favour of the proposal to increase the number of the Members of the House by 12, on the ground that it was the easiest way of dealing with the necessity of giving 12 Members to Scotland. I am quite ready to admit that Scotland ought to have 12 additional Members, and in nothing I should say or do in the Committee would I seek to deprive Scotland of the proposed additional representation. But I entirely demur to my right hon. Friend's argument that we ought to adopt the course of adding 12 Members to the House, merely because it is the easiest way of getting over the difficulty. I must say, with all respect to my right hon. Friend and the Government, that it appears to me to be a piece of timidity which this House ought not to sanction. It appears to me that in making this addition to the House we are establishing a vicious, because a totally unnecessary, precedent. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) has stated to the Committee that this is the first occasion since the Act of Union, at the commencement of the century, on which an addition has been made to the Members of this House. Of course, the Act of Union was a very great measure, which dealt with exceptional circumstances, requiring exceptional provisions. Sir, it cannot be necessary to add to the numbers of the House for the better transaction of the Business of the country. Why, the vice of this House is too much talk, and the more Members you add to the House, the more certain it is that the talk will be increased. It may be said that the addition of 12 Members will make no material difference; but if you once make this increase, because you have to meet the claims of Scotland to additional representation, another occasion may arise 10 or 20 years hence, when some other part of the United Kingdom may make a similar claim; and then you will have this precedent established—that the only way to meet the claim is to add to the number of Members. The addition of 2,000,000 voters to the constituencies of the United Kingdom is, to my mind, no reason for making this addition of 12 Members to the House. It cannot be argued that 658 Members are not sufficient to represent the constituencies of this Kingdom, however numerous the voters in the constituencies may be. Well, then, the simple and sole reason for this addition of 12 Members is, that it is the easiest way of meeting the claims of Scotland. Well, but have the claims of Scotland never had to be met before? They were met in the Act for which my right hon. Friend himself was responsible in 1867. Scotland then received an addition of seven Members, and those Members were taken from English constituencies. What have you now to do? The Committee are aware that there are at present six vacant seats, owing to constituencies in England and Ireland having been disfranchised for corruption. Cannot Scotland have those six seats? Then there would only be six more to provide, towards which we might take the three from Ireland, to which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Raikes) refers. Why should Ireland have more Members than was fixed by the Act of Union? I can see no reason at all. And surely the remaining three might be found out of the excess of Members which you propose to lavish on the Metropolis and great towns; or out of the constituencies between 50,000 and 55,000 inhabitants, who certainly have no right whatever to two Members, when larger towns than they are only to have one. These are propositions which I say, if Her Majesty's Government and the Committee are willing to deal with this question courageously, might meet the difficulty. By the means I have shown, it would be perfectly possible to find the increase for the representation of Scotland without any addition to the number of the Members of the House. I hope that my hon. Friend (Sir Eardley Wilmot) will press his Motion to a division, and that, if unsuccessful, he will raise the question again; because, by so doing, he will do his best to free the House from the establishment of a precedent which, in my opinion, may lead to great mischief in the future, and which ought not to be sanctioned now, because there is not the slightest necessity for it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am perfectly amazed at the speech we have just heard. The right hon. Gentleman raises objection to the quota of 50,000, which is an essential portion of the agreement that was made. I cannot understand how he can have made that speech, if he recollects what the agreement was. He has spoken of six seats which are at present vacant as if they were permanently vacant. By this Bill they are filled up; and, therefore, he would have to find nine seats, even if the Committee consented to take away three seats from Ireland—from Tyrone, Tipperary, and Belfast—which, I presume, they would not do. The nine seats would have to be taken away England—would have to be taken, as the right hon. Gentleman says, from the Metropolis and the larger towns of the country. The first county on the list which would necessarily suffer or lose a seat would be the county of Wiltshire, in which the right hon. Gentleman is a very large landowner. I do not know whether the inhabitants of Wiltshire would be satisfied with the decrease of their number of seats; anyhow, that would be the first consequence of the adoption of the Amendment. Worcestershire and Wiltshire would be the two English counties which would stand first on the list to lose seats. The Amendment before the Committee has been seconded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes). Now, that right hon. Gentleman complained the other night that we only allowed two seats to the City of London, and that, generally speaking, the Metropolis was badly treated by the Bill; and now we have the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) supporting this proposition, and telling us that seats ought to be taken away from the Metropolis.

MR. GORST said, he wished to say a word or two in support of the compact which had been arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) and Her Majesty's Government, which appeared to him to be receiving a great deal of undeserved censure in this matter; undeserved, because they were following precisely the precedent set in 1867 by the late Mr. Disraeli. On that occasion it was necessary to increase the representation of Scotland. The representation of England was settled by the Bill of that year; but no Members were provided in the scheme for the increase in the representation of Scotland. He (Mr. Gorst) remembered very well that when Mr. Disraeli was pressed as to where he was going to get the additional Members for Scotland, he said he had no doubt the wisdom of Parliament would provide. In 1868 the Representation of the People Bill for Scotland was brought in, and by the operation of that Bill the number of Members of this House was greatly increased, and the Bill was read a second time and was proceeding in the House with an increase of the number of Members of the House. The increase, however, was so repugnant to the sense of Parliament, that the wisdom of Parliament did provide for the emergency, for by the 43rd section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act there were no less than seven English boroughs disfranchised for the purpose of providing seats for Scotland. Therefore, it appeared to him (Mr. Gorst) that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) and Her Majesty's Government, in putting before the House this scheme for increasing the number of seats, were following the precedents of 1867 and 1868; and if Parliament was desirous of limiting the number of Members of the House to the magic number of 658, it must be for the wisdom of Parliament to discover where the 12 seats could be saved. There were a good many proposals made for the taking away of seats from different persons and places. There were some small boroughs even yet returning Members; and he had no doubt that if an Amendment were proposed to take away from these the 12 Members which were required for Scotland, Parliament would desire to accept such a proposal if it were before the Committee. No doubt the Government and the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) would act as Mr. Disraeli acted in 1868, and recognize the wisdom of Parliament by accepting a very reasonable proposal.

Dr. LYONS protested against any proposal for the reduction of the number of Representatives for Ireland. The representation of Ireland was fully and carefully considered at the time of the Union, and the opinion of such great statesmen as Lord Castlereagh in this matter should have attached to it the weight it deserved.

MR. BRODRICK said that, for his own part, he could not support the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) on this occasion. He could not but regret to see such an instance of absolute pusillanimity as that, when the Leaders of the two Parties had come together, an obvious measure of justice, based on population with regard to the Three Kingdoms, had not been carried out from the fear of offending a Party in the Committee. He regretted to see that the Government should have entered on the task in such a spirit and taken this step, not on grounds of absolute justice, but on the ground that hon. Members forming that section of the Committee might consider themselves aggrieved. There was not an hon. Member in the House who had ventured, during the whole course of these discussions, to assume for one moment that it would be possible to carry on Public Business in the next Parliament with the large and preponderating influence which would be given to one class of Irish Members in the House. If, with their present numbers, the fear of them was so great as to induce the Government to depart in their interest from the lines on which the measure was framed, what did the House suppose would be the state of affairs in the next Parliament? The whole power of dictating the course of Business would be placed in the hands of that section of Members by the action the Government had taken; and, for his own part, he felt it necessary to vote against an increase of the number of Members of the House. He could not help feeling that the opportunity of doing justice to all parts of the United Kingdom had been missed, and that the attempt which had been made to give extra representation to Scotland, at the expense of the numbers of the House, was one which would still leave Scotland at a disadvantage in view of the preponderating influence given to Ireland, and that the proposition before the Committee might have been avoided if justice had been done without fear or favour to all parties in the country.

Mr. H. B. NORTHCOTE said, he had voted in favour of the reduction of the number of Irish Representatives; but it appeared to him that if the Amendment were carried, the only effect would be that England would lose a number of Members, while Scotland would get her increase. He could not support the principle of giving Scotland that increase at the expense of the English constituencies. In refusing to vote for the proposal, he was simply refusing to vote for the reduction of English Members by nine.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 119: Majority 102.—Div. List, No. 62

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in consequence of a communication which had been sent across the Table to him by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to move the notes to the Schedules as a new clause he had given an undertaking to do so, and he now wished to give effect to that undertaking. He merely wished to say that he had been quite right in his assertion that many Bills had contained notes to the Schedules in the form in which they had appeared in this Bill. The Artizans' Dwellings Act was a case in point, and a similar form had been adopted in connection with other measures, although, so far as he was personally concerned, he preferred to have the notes in the form of a clause.

New Clause Notes to the Schedules,.)—(Sir Charles W. Dilke,.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Question, "That the Clause be now read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 1, to leave out the words "Notes to the."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Schedules," to insert the words "to this Act."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Mr. SCLATER-BENNETT said, that in line 6 of the Schedule the right hon. Baronet opposite Sir Charles W. Dilke) appeared to him to define obscurem per obscurem. He said "the word county means county at large." What did that mean?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had thought that surely the right hon. Gentleman would have been capable of understanding that the phrase "county at large" was a phrase commonly used to describe the whole Parliamentary county.

[Fifth Night.]

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It distinguishes between a county and a division of a county.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes; that is so.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 29, after "eighty-five," insert "for the purposes of municipal elections."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it seemed to him very absurd to put in as a definition of a Parliamentary polling district those which existed on the 1st of January, 1885, seeing that they were going to alter the Parliamentary districts in this Bill.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it had been impossible to leave to Local Authorities the power of altering the dates of elections. It was necessary to fix them by law, and it was necessary also to have some past date. They could not take some future day. It would, of course, be very easy to alter the date on some future occasion.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. CAUSTON said, he wished to move a new clause to the effect that at any General Election the elections in all cities and boroughs of the United Kingdom should be held on one and the same day. The same objection could not be raised to this clause that was raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross); and he might say that he moved this Amendment in the interests of the electors, candidates, and Returning Officers. Such an arrangement as he proposed would be fair to all parties. No uncertainty as to the day of election could possibly prevail; no pressure could be put on the Returning Officer to fix a day; and the Party opposed to the political views of the Returning Officer could not be damned by that person's choice of date for the election. He was sure that it would be much more agreeable to the feelings of the Returning Officer himself to have the day fixed in this way, and also that it would be greatly to the interest of commerce throughout the United Kingdom to have all these contests taking place simultaneously. He could see no possible objection to adopting this course. He could see that in the case of the counties there might be some difficulty in carrying out a similar proposal; but in the case of the boroughs he maintained that the clause would be found to work to the interests of Returning Officers, and would avoid pressure or Party feeling being brought to bear on the Returning Officer by either side. As to who was to fix the day for a General Election, that would have to be made the subject of another clause. There would be no difficulty in adopting a plan for fixing that day. It might be made a certain number of days succeeding the issue of the Writ, or they might say that if Parliament dissolved on such and such a day the election in all boroughs should take place on such and such a day. He could not see any serious obstacle in the way of carrying out this proposal. He, therefore, hoped that the Committee would give its careful and favourable consideration to his plan. He moved the clause in no Party spirit. He thought it was a fair and reasonable proposal, as he had said before, in the interests of the electors, candidates, and Returning Officers.

New Clause (General Elections,)—(Mr. Causton,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that this Amendment seemed to him to be a little wide of the object of the Bill. It was a mere declaration of principle also, and did not provide any machinery for carrying out the principle it laid down, and it would require a considerable amendment of the law in order to carry it out. The Rules were issued to the Returning Officers, but there was an Act which allowed elasticity with regard to distance and so forth; and provision would have to be made to enable places at a distance from London, such as those in the North of Scotland, and in the extreme West of Ireland, to receive the Writs and to arrange the elections. The Writs took much longer time to reach some places than others. But his main objection to the proposal was that it was wide of the object of the Bill.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Mr. CROPPER said, that, in spite of the remarks of his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke), he could not help thinking that it would be of very great value at the present time to assert the principle of the Amendment. It seemed to him that, in addition to other advantages which would be given, the Amendment would obviate the great inconvenience which arose from the dislocation of business, the excitement, and the troubles to a candidate resulting from the present want of uniformity in the dates of elections. They should have this very important fact before them—that in a General Election the losing Party lost a great deal more through this want of uniformity for the reason that when a few elections went against a Party the electors at subsequent elections were influenced by what had already taken place. The losing Party in 1874, and also in 1880, lost more than they otherwise would have done by reason of the effect of one borough election upon another. The result of winning some seats resulted in a considerable number of other victories being gained. There were many men who had so little political principle that they would seem to allow their opinions to be decided by the success which one or other of the Parties was obtaining around them. It seemed to him that by fixing one date for all elections they would get over all the trouble, all the excitement, and all the causes that at present existed. They themselves as candidates would be immensely benefited, and as electors they would also feel it a great blessing. He could not conceive how anyone could object to the proposal, except the newspapers, which reaped a great harvest from recording false and true reports as to the results of various elections which were going on for a considerable period. It seemed to him that the difficulty as to counties would not hold in regard to cities and boroughs. There could be no objection on the score of the Returning Officer having the work to do, because that official would not be called upon to do any more work than he would have to perform at present. As to the difficulty assumed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in regard to the distance and the difficulty of communication, it seemed to him that in the days of quick posts and telegraphs the difficulty was reduced to almost nothing. He was convinced that if it could be stated that on the Wednesday or the Thursday after the Dissolution of Parliament a new Election should take place, quite sufficient time would be granted, and it would be possible in all boroughs to carry out the arrangement. It seemed to him that the amount of trouble that was caused by persons who went from one borough to another—by platform orators, men in the moon, and the various other notorious persons who exercised some influence on election days being unable to carry on their operations in various districts at various times—would be done away with, and that they would have a much more simple, a much less expensive, and a much less exciting method of carrying on a contest at the time of a General Election than they had at present. He hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Causton) would go into the Lobby, because he believed he would see that there were a great many hon. Members in the Committee who had found from their own experience the immense difficulties which attached to not having all the elections on one day.

SIR R. ASSHEFION CROSS said, he wished to point out what an enormous inconvenience would follow from the adoption of this clause, because the same day would have to be appointed for elections, not only in all the boroughs of England, but throughout the Kingdom, including the far distant Wick Burghs. Not a single borough election could take place in England until the day appointed for the election in the Wick Burghs arrived. That would involve an enormous inconvenience; and, certainly, there was nothing that could add more to the turmoil of an election contest.

Mr. E. STANHOPE said, he thought there were certainly some strong reasons in favour of the proposed clause. It had always seemed to him—and the last two General Elections had greatly supported the view—that an undue amount of weight was attached to those elections which took place on the first day of the contest; and when the result of the first day's elections, in what he might call a few petty boroughs was in favour of one particular Party, that Party gained an undue advantage in the contests still pending in the more important constituencies. However, circumstances had occurred since the last General Election which materially affected the matter, and greatly modified that view. In the first place, these small boroughs had been got rid of—the Parliamentary boroughs of the country would now be of a much larger size than those he had referred to. In the second place, he did not think that the subsequent elections would, for the future, be affected to so great an extent by those which were decided at the very beginning of the contest. Therefore, although there might formerly have been good reason for the adoption of such a course as was now proposed, there would not be the same necessity for it now, especially as the larger boroughs were now to be divided into divisions.

MR. ILLINGWORTH thought the drawback of the proposal would outweigh its advantages. One day might be more convenient than another for election in one particular borough; but it might be just the opposite in the case of another borough.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he wished to say one word. This question appeared to him to contain a balance of inconveniences. It was inconvenient, no doubt, for any gentleman, who had five, six, seven, or eight votes in different constituencies, and who wished to utilize them all. He could quite understand why the proposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) should not be likely to be received with very much gratification by hon. Gentlemen who were placed in that position. But if the Committee would look at the matter fairly, they ought to consider, not alone the inconveniences of those who were surfeited with votes, but the convenience of those hon. Gentlemen who had one constituency to stand for. He spoke as an Irish Member, who would not be at all sorry if hon. Gentlemen opposite, who spoke with a power of language to which he never could pretend, and who followed the Leadership of the hon. Member for the City of Cork—(Mr. Parnell)—could be concentrated together in some small bailliewick. He had heard it said to-night, in reply to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), who moved the first Amendment, that the essence of this Bill was the representation of diversity of interests and of local feeling, so that the people of a locality should be allowed to express their opinions fairly and freely without interference. It appeared to him (Sir Patrick O'Brien) that a system such as had been proposed by the hon. Member for Colchester would be of advantage in Ireland. Although on other occasions he would be delighted to hear those hon. Gentlemen opposite, to whom he had already referred, and who had made their names famous all over Europe by their oratory, still, for his own part, and notwithstanding the fact that he himself in his humble person had the honour of having five votes in Ireland, he would be very willing to sacrifice four of them for the purpose of obtaining the absence of those hon. Gentlemen during his election. He did not think, in saying that, that he was pursuing a course which was very different from that of many hon. Gentlemen—he would, not of course, call them professional politicians—who believed that they occupied a status in society, which numbers of people might give to them, but which the whole community might not; and who, if they lost a seat in one place, had a chance of what he might call "trying back" in three or four others. Under these circumstances, he would be disposed to support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman; but there was one consideration which, perhaps, might remove the difficulty, and that was that there were such gentlemen as Returning Officers and Sheriffs, who looked after the returns; and it was a question for the consideration of the Committee whether, instead of laying down a hard-and-fast rule, such as that proposed by the hon. Member for Colchester, they should not leave the matter to the discretion of these Returning Officers and Sheriffs. It would, no doubt, be a good thing in Ireland to have all the oratory in one day—one orator in Mayo, another in Galway, another in Cork, another in King's County, and others in other places—and then the people in the morning who read all these efforts, which were to be admired or deplored as people might think fit, would have the advantage of getting all these orations in one morning's journal, which would be a great gratification, instead of having them spread over four or five weeks.

MR. CAUSTON said, he would not trouble the Committee to divide, as the Government did not find it possible to fall in with the suggestion he had made.

Mr. E. Stanhope

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

First Schedule.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

MR. MONK said, he wished to know whether, before the Schedules came on for discussion, it would not be as well to have the Bill reprinted, so that the Committee might see clearly what alterations had been made in it?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that hardly any Amendments had been made to the Bill; and certainly none had been made that were of the slightest importance. There would, therefore, be nothing to reprint.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

ARMY (COMMISSARIAT AND TRANSPORT SERVICES).

MOTION FOR RE-APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

COLONEL STANLEY: Perhaps, Sir, the House will allow me to say a few words in explanation of the Motion which it is my duty to make, and particularly as the circumstances under which I have to make it are somewhat peculiar. The Motion is one for the re-appointment of a Select Committee which was appointed last year to inquire into the Commissariat and Transport Services. The Committee was appointed, I believe, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Cameron), and the appointment was at that time assented to by the Government. That Committee sat during last year, and took a large amount of very valuable evidence, which remains in the form of a very voluminous Blue Book. But we were not able to conclude our inquiry; and it was particularly desirable, before the inquiry was concluded, that the evidence of Lord Wolseley, and of one or two other officers, should be taken in regard to statements which had been made before the Committee. The Committee, therefore, concluded their labours for the year by only reporting the evidence, and not entering into the consideration of a Report; and I, as the official channel of communication between the Committee and the House, had laid upon me by them the duty of asking that in the next Session of Parliament the Committee should be re-appointed. Speaking, if the House will allow me, from a personal point of view, I feel that the duty laid upon me by the Committee collectively is one from which I cannot free myself, even though there are the individual expressions of opinion from almost every Member of the Committee that it would be better that the recommendation should not be made. I, therefore, feel myself officially bound to make this Motion; and it must be for the House and for the Government to determine how, under the circumstances, it had better be dealt with. I speak without any bias one way or the other. The Committee was one of great importance, and I hope that even in the time it was sitting it may have produced some good. No doubt, with the assistance of the able Members who formed the Committee, we should have produced a Report which, without being unduly sanguine, I may say might have been of some value; but I am bound to say that if, as I have some reason to believe, the Government are now going to oppose my Motion, I must admit that the circumstances under which we sat last year, and those in which we find ourselves now, are widely dissimilar. Many of the officers whom, for my own part, I should have wished to call to give evidence are now serving in Egypt and elsewhere; and it is obvious that at the present time a very great strain is laid upon those Departments at home, the attendance of whose Representatives we should have had to require before the Committee. I can easily conceive that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) may find it his duty to oppose the re-appointment of this Committee; but, at the same time, I think that I am only fulfilling my duty in bringing the Motion before the House, and I am only fulfilling the duty which the Committee laid upon me in asking the House to re-appoint this Committee with the Instructions which are usual in such cases. I hope, Sir, that I have made my explanation of the rather remarkable position in which we are placed as briefly as possible under the circumstances. I must now leave the Motion to be dealt with by the Government and the House. Of course, I shall move the re-appointment of the Committee; and if a division should be taken, I shall certainly, for my own part, divide in favour of the proposition.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Commissariat and Transport Services of the British Army in the recent Egyptian Campaign (1882), and to consider what changes, if any, are required to secure increased efficiency in these Services, be re-appointed:—That Mr. BRAND, Dr. CAMERON, Colonel MILNE HOME, Mr. CARINGTON, Mr. BROWN, Mr. JACKSON, Sir HENRY FLETCHER, Lord EDWARD CAVENDISH, Colonel NOLAN, Mr. EARP, Mr. HERBERT, Dr. FARQUHARSON, and Colonel STANLEY be the Members of the said Committee: That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records: That Five be the quorum of the Committee."—(Colonel Stanley.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not able to assent, as I should under ordinary circumstances have done, to this Motion, as a matter of form; and perhaps the House will think it right, after the observations just made by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that I should state why it will be my duty not to assent to it. I will give the House some reasons why I think this Committee should not be re-appointed. The inquiry which was undertaken by the Committee last year was one which had to deal not only with the present state of facts and details connected with the Expedition to Egypt in 1882, but also with the much larger question of the organization of the Supply and Transport Service of the Army, and also of the Transport branch of the Admiralty. Well, Sir, at the present moment the energies of all these Departments are taxed to a very considerable extent by the operations now in progress in connection with the Expedition to the Nile and the Expedition to Suakin, and to a minor but still to a great and sufficient extent by the operations going on in Bechuanaland. Under these circumstances, it is quite impossible for the officials connected with these Departments to devote all the care and attention which they ought to do to the general business of the Departments, and, at the same time, to give as much time and attention as they would desire to the inquiry which it is sought to renew before the Committee. Either they would have to devote less time than at present to the duties of the Departments, or else they would have to give less time to this inquiry, which not only involves matters of great public importance, but also, to a certain extent, their own conduct. In addition to all this, there is another consideration which has been mentioned by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman—the consideration that at this moment some of the most essential witnesses whom the Committee would have to examine in order to conclude their inquiry and make their Report are not in the country. Lord Wolseley is the principal of these, and I think the House will agree that, he having been principally concerned in the operations into which the Committee have been inquiring, it would be impossible for them to finish their inquiry and agree to their Report without his evidence. Not only is that the case, but other officers are also absent at the present time, and many of those whom the Committee would wish to examine could not be examined at all. Well, Sir, if this inquiry had developed any very great defects of administration, or if it had brought to light any serious breakdown on the part of any of the Departments, the re-appointment of this Committee would not be opposed by the Government, even although the inquiry had been, as I have said, in some degree inconvenient under the circumstances. But I do not think that, in the opinion of the majority at all events of the Committee, that is the case. The evidence of the various witnesses who have already been examined has clearly established the fact that there was nothing in the campaign or in the arrangements made by the Supply or Transport Departments which led to anything in the nature of a breakdown. Sir John Adye, as Chief of the Staff, was examined, and he gave evidence to show that the officers and men of all ranks did their duty remarkably well, and that there was no breakdown of any kind. Commissary General Watt, who was one of the witnesses on whose evidence the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) chiefly relied, stated the same thing—that there was no breakdown and no great failure, except in one matter. The chief Medical Officer of the Expedition stated that the supplies were excellent and abundant, and that they never suffered from the want of anything except during the first week, when there was some defect; but that vanished very speedily. Lord Wolsley has not been examined; but his opinion also is that there was nothing in the Commissariat and Transport arrangements which amounted to a breakdown, and he thinks that such difficulties as arose were not attributable to defective organization, but arose from military exigencies of an exceptional character. A great deal of evidence has been given before the Committee as to what the present system really is. There has been great diversity of opinion, and it has been fully inquired into. The system and organization which have been in existence since 1880 have been more clearly defined; and I do not think there will be in future any falling off in their efficiency. In addition to these considerations I may mention that since the Committee closed their inquiry last Session three Expeditions have been sent out. There has been an Expedition to the Nile, an Expedition to Bechuanaland, and an Expedition to Suakin; and a great deal of attention has necessarily been directed to the working of the Supply and Transport Services, and I am able to say that the arrangements made by them have worked with perfect smoothness up to the present. The organization has been the same as that of 1882, and it seems to me that, considering that there has been no hitch and no complaint, anything wanting in the arrangements made in 1882 was due not to defective organization, but rather to those subsidiary matters which always will occur under exceptional circumstances, and which no system of organization could possibly alter or amend, and that we may be reasonably satisfied with the result. Before the Committee was appointed Lord Wolsley had himself tested some of the arrangements in the Supply and Transport Departments, and especially the regulations for the governance of the lines of communications. A Committee had already been appointed, under the Presidency of Lord Morley, consisting of several officers and War Department officials—officers of military knowledge and very great experience—who were directed to inquire into these matters. That inquiry was suspended; but I would humbly suggest that an inquiry by that Committee would be quite as efficient as an inquiry by this House. Looking at the inconvenience which would be sustained by the Public Service if the heads of these Departments were to be taken off from their present duties to attend upon an inquiry—a controversial inquiry—like that now proposed; looking also to the fact that no case of any deficiency or breakdown has been established by the evidence already laid before the Committee, and looking to the absence of many important witnesses, I am inclined to think that the House will agree with me that there could be no advantage, but rather a disadvantage, to the Public Service if this Committee were re-appointed. I trust that, under these circumstances, the House will not agree to the Motion.

Colonel Stanley

DR. CAMERON said, that every Member of the Committee must be greatly obliged to the noble Marquess for the Report with which he had supplemented their labours. The only drawback to that eulogistic and white-washing Report was, that the noble Marquess was not a Member of the Committee, and did not hear the evidence. He (Dr. Cameron) could quote any amount of evidence to prove that there was the very greatest breakdown; but, before he dealt with that point, he would advert to the remarks of the noble Marquess on the injury to the Public Service which would result if this Committee were re-appointed. They had been a long time discovering that injury. At the conclusion of the labours of the Committee last year, it was unanimously agreed that they should ask for re-appointment this Session; and it was an unprecedented thing that the Government should now come forward and oppose the re-appointment of a Committee which had gone through an immense amount of work, and which had unanimously recommended its re-appointment. It was understood that the re-appointment of the Committee would be moved for in the Autumn Session; but representations were made to him, asking him to postpone the matter while war preparations were proceeding, and he did so until the commencement of the present Session. He was then asked to wait a

There was another element in the matter. If the Committee were certain to report as the noble Marquess had reported, he Dr. Cameron did not believe there would have been any difficulty in obtaining their re-appointment; but he Dr. Cameron was by no means certain that the Committee would agree to a "Report" such as that of which the noble Marquess had submitted a draft to the House. He (Dr. Cameron) had reason to believe that the majority of the Committee were in favour of reform, and thought a case for it had been abundantly established. If the Committee adopted that view, they would have made recommendations of reform which would be unpalatable to some of the parties concerned. If the Government could stave off inquiry this Session, they would not only get rid of further disclosures—and such he could, if more were necessary to persuade them, bring before the Committee—but they could reconstitute a Committee in which they would have a chance of securing a Report more in accordance with their way of thinking. He could not help suspecting that was the object of the Government, not only from their conduct that night, but from their action all through—their excuses for postponing, postponing, and postponing, on pretence of inconvenience to the Departments, their action in suppressing evidence last year, on pretence that it would be more convenient at a later stage of the inquiry, and in giving the Committee Correspondence so edited as to leave out the most compromising parts. It would have rebounded more to the credit of a reforming Government, anxious to provide for the welfare of the State, if they had agreed to the re-appointment of the Committee, even had they done so with the foregone determination to disregard its recommendations, as the recommendations of similar Committees were so often disregarded in case of their proving unpalatable to the official who controlled the War Office.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME said, as he took a somewhat prominent part in the debate which preceded the appointment of the Committee he thought it right to say a few words, more especially as he had attended most of the meetings of the Committee over which his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) presided. All that the House knows was cognisant of was the the Committee reported they were in a position to present their evidence in the House, and to call to sit again. There could be, in his mind, one conclusion for re-appointing the Committee, and that was that there was nothing to enquire into. The scheme of the Committee divided their inquiry into two portions—one part being an inquiry into matters of fact as to what did or did happen in the Campaign of 1884, and the other part being an inquiry into the management of the Campaign. The Committee were not in a position to present their evidence upon matters of fact. The Marquess just now said that the evidence was not complete. The evidence was anxiously looked for, but never came. But the noble Secretary of State for War would like to have that evidence before the Committee. Well, it was not in the hands of (Colonel Milne-Home) or for any one else to say what would transpire in Egypt during the next few months; but he knew from the newspapers that the troops were going into summer quarters, and would remain inactive for some time; and surely it would be possible to find a General to relieve Lord Wolseley for a time; meanwhile the latter could come home and give the Committee the desired evidence. As to the second portion of the inquiry, whether there should be any alteration in the Commissariat Department, it was the almost unanimous opinion of witnesses before the Committee that, whether they were agreed there was a breakdown in the Egyptian Campaign or not, there were many alterations that should be made in the organisation of the Commissariat establishment. He knew himself of many officers in the Service who would be extremely glad to see some alterations carried out, and who would be happy at a future time to give evidence in that direction. There was, then, every reason for the re-appointment of the Committee, not only to finish the evidence on matters of fact, but also to go on with the second portion of the inquiry. He was sure he could speak for every Member of the Committee in saying that if it appeared and Transport Departments. He should certainly support the proposal that the Committee should sit again.

Mr. CARINGTON said, he would only intervene for the purpose of asking a question—whether the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would object to the re-appointment of the Committee after Easter, when, if we had no further complications with Russia, and if our troops in the Soudan went into summer quarters at Suakin and elsewhere, the War Office officials might with a very little pressure assist at the inquiry?

Dr. FARQUHARSON said, he would also ask the question if the Department would be satisfied if the inquiry were resumed after Easter, when the hurry of preparation would have passed, and the Department would have sufficient time for the evidence required? He did not see how the Department could be better worked than by supplying information to the public, clearing up the doubts and difficulties that had arisen in connection with the various expeditions undertaken. A good deal had been said about the evidence of Lord Wolseley; and, no doubt, it was important, though he should not have thought it of extreme importance, for the Committee had already had the evidence of Sir John Adye, the Chief of the Staff during the late campaign in Egypt, who would know a great deal more about the matters to be inquired into than Lord Wolseley—as, indeed, had been admitted by Lord Wolseley himself; and that witness certainly, so far as he could, laid the whitewash upon everything to please the Government. The labours of the Committee would be thwarted if they were not allowed to report. Without a Report the Blue Book would have no real authority. It must be remembered that the case of the Committee was very much prejudiced by the statement—probably inspired—which appeared in The Times some time ago. That might be regarded as the Government Report, and it was followed by a Supplementary Report from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron); but what the House wanted was the Report of the Committee holding the judicial balance between these—the summing up of the long inquiry. The contention had been put forward that the breakdown, if breakdown there was, was due to the exigencies of military operations, and he was not disposed to deny that much might be said upon that view; but they must also consider whether somewhat was not also due to faults in the system which had been indicated by military officers. As had been pointed out, there were two sections of inquiry—the facts in regard to the present system, and the question of organization. The second part of the inquiry did not depend on the success of the first; the second inquiry followed the first as a mere matter of sequence. It would be much better if the Committee were allowed to meet again to consider their Report on the first part of the inquiry, and then to discuss whether it was necessary to go on with the subject of organization or not. The Committee had been almost unanimous in their desire for re-appointment; and he hoped the Government, on consideration, would see fit to grant the request.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 68: Majority 19.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

Dr. CAMERON gave Notice that, in consequence of the Vote just taken, he would call attention to the matter again on the Motion to go into Committee on the Army Estimates.

TOWN PARKS IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON, in rising to move—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the tenure of holdings known as Town Parks in and near towns in Ireland, how they are affected by the Land Acts of 1870 and 1881, and to report if any changes in the existing laws could be beneficially made.”

He said, his object in moving for the Select Committee was to obtain an inquiry into the law which now regulated Town Parks in Ireland. At present conflicting decisions were given in the Law Courts, and, as a consequence, great uncertainty existed. He did not intend to take up the time of the House at that late hour (1.30) by going into details; but he might observe that the question of Town Parks had been an open question ever since the passing of the Land Act in 1881. When the Land Act was being passed, the Prime Minister said that the whole question connected with Town Parks in Ireland was one deserv-

Minister was most careful not to limit himself to matters of organic structure in the Bill, but distinctly covered the whole ground. Even more recently than that the late Chief Secretary Mr. Trevelyan pronounced himself on this subject. Last year that right hon. Gentleman said that Her Majesty's Government, after a full and final consideration of the subjects at issue, had come to the conclusion that it would not be safe for the Government to re-open the question, and that there was only one essential particular in which the Government had not said its last word, and that was the question of the purchase of holdings. He (Mr. Brodrick) therefore concluded that this was an entirely new departure on the part of the Government—he would not say that it amounted to a breach of faith on the part of the Government, but it amounted to a distinct change in their former determination. He believed that the pledge, of which this Motion was the outcome, was given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), whom he did not now see in his place, at an advanced hour of the morning, when it was not known even that the Motion on which he was speaking was about to come on. It would have been but courteous to the House for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to have been present on this occasion, to explain this extraordinary change of policy on the part of the Government. If the Government were prepared to allow the Select Committee, he (Mr. Brodrick) and his hon. Friends would have a perfect right to move for Select Committees to inquire into half-a-dozen subjects on which they felt they had been grossly ill-treated, and in which their interests had been equally neglected. He did not wish now to enter into these subjects; but if they were to be re-opened at all, he and his hon. Friends would get their heads in at the door as well as other people, and they would introduce questions on going into Committee of Supply—and, indeed, on every occasion when they could occupy space and time belonging to the Government. If the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone succeeded in passing his Motion, he (Mr. Brodrick) would certainly move for a Select Committee to consider the position, status, and occupation of the Sub-Commissioners appointed under the Land Act; and he believed in such a Motion he would receive support from the Irish Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway. Again, he saw no reason why they should not open up the question of the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act, and ask Parliament to consider why those clauses had been wholly inoperative. He did not see why the Emigration Clauses, on which so much stress was laid by the first of the numerous Chief Secretaries (Mr. Forster who had officiated under this Government, had not been put into operation; and why the absurdly inadequate sum advanced by Parliament to promote emigration had not been used and needed. Parliament would require to be assured that every effort had been made to carry out what they were told were the most important and necessary clauses of the Bill. Now, these were a few of the questions which he and his hon. Friends certainly would raise if the Government showed any signs of giving way in this particular. This Motion was only in a very minor degree directed to the needs of the tenant-farming class in Ireland. It was chiefly directed to the needs of the well-to-do butchers, who drove their cattle to the market towns, and who occupied the town parks, sometimes by the year, and sometimes for a shorter period. He submitted, therefore, that this was not a question which, even from the point of view of those whom the Land Act was chiefly intended to benefit, should be re-opened and re-settled. If the deficiencies in this immortal piece of legislation—the Land Act—which they were told was to gratify the pockets of the tenant farmers, and amuse their minds with litigation, were responsible for the present disaffection of the Irish people, most unquestionably the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone was wholly inadequate, and absurdly inefficient to supply the need. To re-open the question in a manner which could not possibly tend to any good end it would be most unwise for Parliament at this moment to do. So far as this immediate Motion went, he should give it his most sincere opposition. He had referred to the speech in which the Prime Minister expressed his view of the question. The pleaded only their inattention to the proceedings of the House, and a conspicuous manifestation of dulness. As a reason for the adjournment of the debate, and for not proceeding with the consideration of this question at the present moment, it had been said that the Beesborough Commission had, some time ago, considered the question, and that it was desirable that the effect of their inquiry should be ascertained. Well, he Mr. Sexton would ask the House to bear in mind that this subject had been dealt with already during the present Sittings; that the Government were present when it was considered, and had declared their views fully upon the subject; and that hon. Members who did not care to attend the proceedings of the House, and who were not present on that occasion, were not entitled to plead their own ignorance.

Mr. PLUNKET said, he hoped the Government would now consent to the adjournment of the House. He ventured to say that there was no hon. Member present who remembered a proposal so important as that which had been made by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. A. Dickson) being assented to in a thin House, and under circumstances such as the present. No explanation whatever had been given upon the subject; and he Mr. Plunket contended that, under the circumstances, it was most unusual, and would be an evil precedent, to grant a Committee on a subject of this kind at such an hour. The Motion now before the House was not for the rejection of the proposal for the appointment of the Committee, but that an adjournment of the House should be taken, and that the debate upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Tyrone should be postponed until such time as a fair opportunity could be afforded for the discussion of the questions which arose upon the Resolution.

Mr. FINDLATER said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down Mr. Plunket had evidently forgotten the observations of the hon. Member for Sligo Mr. Sexton. He Mr. Findlater had been present during the last occasion this question was before the House, and he distinctly recollected every circumstance which had taken place, and which he could vouch had been most correctly detailed by the hon. Gentleman. It could not be fairly contended that the House was now taken by surprise, as the matter had been fully discussed on the last occasion.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that everyone knew perfectly well what the right hon. and learned Gentleman Mr. Plunket meant by asking the House to postpone the consideration of this subject. Next time this question came on, they would find themselves confronted by a blocking Motion put against the proposal by one of the many Conservatives whose sole occupation in the House seemed to be the putting down of Motions of that kind. "Oh, oh!" He did not refer to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks), who seemed to occupy his time that evening in making inarticulate utterances. He Mr. T. P. O'Connor must express his surprise at the language of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Dublin University, who had given a lecture in taste to the hon. Member for Sligo. The right hon. and learned Member had declared that the hon. Member had not conducted himself in a mannerly fashion —

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman seem to me to have nothing to do with the Question before the House.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was simply replying to the remarks the right hon. and learned Gentleman had thought fit to make upon the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the county of Sligo; but as Mr. Speaker had ruled that he Mr. T. P. O'Connor had no right to reply to those observations he would drop that part of the subject. He hoped the Government would strenuously resist the attempt of Conservative Members to defeat the appointment of this Committee. The Government had pledged themselves to support such a Motion as that now brought forward by the hon. Member for Tyrone. As the hon. Member for Sligo had pointed out, the Government had practically stated, when a kindred Motion to that of the hon. Member for Tyrone was before the House, that if such a Motion as the present were brought forward it would receive their support. Well, the Government had now an opportunity of carrying out their pledge, and he should be very much surprised if they allowed themselves to be intimidated from the course they had Business think that this Motion can well be agreed to, and the question disposed of, if desired, at once. At the same time, I would advise the hon. Member for Tyrone, seeing that the Government agree to the appointment of the Committee, to consent to a postponement, on the understanding that hon. Members opposite will abstain from obstructing the Motion on future occasions. I would not press my hon. Friend to take that course until such a disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite is more clearly manifested than it is at present.

Mr. BRODRICK said, that if there were a disposition on the part of himself and his hon. Friends clearly manifested, it was the disposition for them to oppose the Motion for the appointment of this Committee, at that hour and under existing circumstances, as strenuously as lay in their power. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had simply a bare quorum of the House at his back—a bare quorum which at any moment might be reduced below a quorum. He put it to the hon. Member if it was not a most unusual course to take, when those whose opinions had been quoted on both sides of the House as being opposed to the Motion were not able to be present—was it not a most unusual course, under such circumstances, for the hon. Member to press the matter forward? Hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House were bound to offer to the course the hon. Member seemed determined to pursue all the opposition they could, and they would continue to offer that opposition until they could show the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that their's was a substantial and a genuine objection. If the noble Marquess would take the side of reason in this matter, he would see that the ends of reason would best be served by adjourning the discussion until it was possible for those who were in authority to consider the matter. An expression of opinion had not been yet received from that quarter. He could not say that he thought that a single argument had yet been brought forward against the adjournment of the discussion except that of the hon. Member (Mr. Lea), who said that the Motion might be blocked on a future occasion. Well, if that were so, the very object of blocking a Motion was to prevent its coming on at a time when justice could not be done to it. For his own part, he would continue to resist the Motion, if necessary, till 5 o'clock in the morning, in order to secure its coming on at a time when it was possible to have a full and fair discussion upon it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 43: Majority 25.—Div. List, No. 65.

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. HICKS said, he begged to move that the debate be now adjourned. It would be in the recollection of those Members who were present on Friday night that at a much earlier hour than this—in fact, at only a little after half-past 12 o'clock—the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice had said that it was too late to answer Questions. Now, if it were too late to answer Questions at half-past 12 o'clock, surely it was much too late, at nearly half-past 2 o'clock, to go into a question of such importance as that involved in the Motion of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson). The House could not forget that this was a part of a great question which had occupied the attention of the House for a whole Session—a question compared with which all other Business was insignificant; and it appeared to him that it was much too late, particularly in the absence of the principal Ministers of the Crown, to go on with the discussion. Further than that, when they bore in mind the late hour at which the House was kept up this morning, and when they remembered that they had to meet again at 12 o'clock at noon to-morrow, consideration for the officers of the House ought to induce them at once to agree to the adjournment of the debate, which he now begged to move.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, he begged to second the Motion. The lateness of the hour was such that they ought not to go on with a discussion of this kind. They all knew that one result of carrying on debates at this hour in the morning was that there were no proper reports of them in the newspapers, and that the public outside consequently had no means of knowing what their Representatives were doing. Those hon. Members who belonged to England did not know as well as some other hon. Gentle-

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 18th March, 1885.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Cape of Good Hope (Railway Loan).

Ordered—First Reading—County Justices' (Clerks * [99]; Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) * [99].

First Reading—Peasant Proprietary and Acquisition of Land by Occupiers (No. 2) * [97].

Second Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders * [91].

Committee—Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) (re-comm.) [49]—a.r. [Sixth Night].

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who had the following Question on the Paper:—

"To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can now state the provisions of the International Agreement with regard to the Finances of Egypt," said: Since I put this Question on the Paper, I have received a communication from the Prime Minister stating that the Agreement will not have been actually signed at the moment of the meeting of the House, and that, therefore, its provisions could not be publicly stated. But perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer can tell us exactly how we stand in the matter; when he will be able to make a communication with respect to the Agreement; and if he can say when he expects to bring the matter under the judgment of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The position of matters with respect to this Agreement is this. The Agreement consists of a Declaration and a Convention. The Declaration was signed yesterday; the Convention will not be signed until this afternoon. I hope at half-past 5 o'clock, with the permission of the House, to make a statement explaining in general terms both the Declaration and the Convention. My noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has come down to state to the House when the Papers will probably be distributed; and perhaps, with reference to the second question of the right hon. Baronet, I had better make that statement.

The Declaration and the Convention will be distributed either to-morrow morning, to-morrow afternoon, or on Friday early. We shall do our very utmost to have them distributed at the first possible moment. The Papers explanatory of the whole business will, we hope, be distributed on Monday; and to-morrow week I hope in Committee to move the Resolution upon which will be founded the Bill which will be necessary to carry the Convention into effect.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—
THE COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.

Mr. RYLANDS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he could make a statement as to what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to the proposed Committees of Inquiry into public expenditure? He observed that the right hon. Gentleman had dropped his Notice with respect to the Committee on the expenditure of the Army and Navy Departments; but the Notice with regard to the Civil Service Department was on the Paper last night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that though he should have preferred Notice of the Question in order to make a careful statement, nevertheless, for the convenience of the House, he would now say, in a few words, what the Government proposed to do. They were fulfilling a very precise pledge which they gave to the House, especially to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, in proposing, on the very first day of the Session, to appoint Committees on the Army and Navy and the Civil Service and Revenue Departments Expenditure, which should sit during the present Session. He need not now quote seriatim the pledges which they gave, as he should have done in moving for the first Committee. But, in the first place, the Motions in respect to these Committees had been blocked, and the effect of the blocking had been to prevent their being taken after half-past 12 o'clock. These blocks had been persisted in; and hence it had been absolutely out of his power either to move for the Committees or to give any explanation. However, in answer to the Question, he might now say that in addition to these blocks the Government had learned from many quarters of the House that

FIRST SCHEDULE.

PART I.

BOROUGHs TO CEASE AS SUCH.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD rose to move, in page 13, column 1, line 11, to leave out "Beaumaris District) Anglesey." The hon. and learned Member said, that, in moving this Amendment he was afraid he would be met with that non possumus which had already been the answer to so many proposed Amendments. He considered it his duty, however, to move the Amendment, and to ask for the adoption of it by the Government. The borough of Beaumaris consisted of four contributory boroughs, of which Holyhead contained more than one-half of the entire population. It so happened that Beaumaris was the largest district of boroughs included in this Schedule. The population, according to the Census of 1881, was within 164 of the limit of 15,000; and if the Census could have been taken in such a way as to include the real population of the borough it would have considerably exceeded 15,000. The reason why there was a large difference between the number of the population according to the Census and the real number of the population was that a very large number of the inhabitants of Holyhead were persons who were engaged on board the steamers plying between that town and the Irish Coast, and whenever the Census was taken there would be necessarily hundreds of persons who were actually voters of Holyhead on the other side of the Channel. The consequence was that whenever the Census was taken the Return for Holyhead fell considerably short of the real number of the population. He thought that was one element which would justify the Government in making an exception in this case, although, in point of fact, it would not be an exception at all, because he understood that the Schedule was based on the actual population of 1881. If they were to be bound by the number included in the Census Returns, they would be equally bound, in the event of some extraordinary mistake having taken place in counting up the numbers, which would be manifestly unfair. As he had stated, the population of these boroughs was within 164 of the 15,000 limit; but the real number of the population in 1881, at the time of the Census, if the Parliamentary limits had been properly defined, would have been 18,038. Holyhead, within the limits of the Parliamentary borough, contained, according to the Census, 8,680; but the population of the parish, which was really and substantially the town of Holyhead, amounted to 9,689 according to the Census; so that if the proper boundary had been assigned to Holyhead itself the population of the borough, according to the Census, would have been 15,865 instead of 14,856. In the case of another of the boroughs, Amlwch, the Parliamentary limits included little more than half the population of the parish. There were two towns in the parish, and for some peculiar reason, in 1832, the population of one was taken, while that of the other was left out. The population of the two urban districts in that parish would give 4,817 instead of 2,664; so that without any difficulty the boundaries of two of the boroughs at present included in the district of Beaumaris might be so altered—and altered, too, with advantage, and without interfering with any principle of the Bill—as to give a population of more than 18,000 according to the Census of 1881. He thought these facts afforded strong reasons for striking out this district of boroughs from the 1st Schedule of the Bill. It must be taken into account also that Holyhead itself was a growing town, and that in the future it must necessarily become more and more important. Even since the limits of the borough were fixed it had, he believed, more than doubled its population, and since the Census of 1881 the population had increased rapidly. In all human probability the increase in the future would be very much greater than in the past, because, owing to its position, it would, no doubt, in the course of time, become a port for Transatlantic steamers just as it now was a port for the departure of steamers for the Irish Coast. When once that took place, the population, which was now more than 10,000, would in a few years be doubled, so that, in all human probability, there would in the near future be in that town alone a population of more than 20,000. A Petition, very numerously signed, had been presented from Holyhead praying that some alteration should be made in the way he had pointed out. There had also been a that small population there would still be one Representative.

[Next Night]

MR. RYLANDS said, there was one thing to which he should like to draw the attention of his hon. and learned Friend. He (Mr. Rylands) happened to represent an important constituency—Burnley—the population of which was between 60,000 and 70,000. While in the Bill a line had been drawn which was extremely painful, no doubt, to some of the small constituencies, and it might appear hard to take away a Member from a borough which was only 500 or 600 below the limit, still it was provided that constituencies which were above the limit of 50,000 should retain two Members, and one Representative was retained in the case of boroughs which were above the 15,000 limit. His own opinion was that the scale of population, so far as those boroughs were concerned, had been fixed in a very liberal manner. He should have preferred that all boroughs under 20,000 should have been thrown into the Schedule, and that all boroughs under 60,000 should lose one Member; but although he entertained that conviction, he accepted the Bill of the Government as a very fair and reasonable proposal; and, seeing that the arrangement had received the sanction of the Leaders of the two sides of the House, he was quite ready to give up any feeling of his own in order to carry out the arrangement made by the Government and the front Bench opposite. Some of his hon. Friends on the other side of the House appeared to be somewhat restive because they had not obtained all the terms they wished to have; but hon. Members on that—the Liberal—side of the House had made considerable sacrifices, and given up many of their cherished convictions, with a view of supporting the Government and retaining the assistance of the front Opposition Bench, without which it would be utterly impossible to pass any satisfactory measure. Under these circumstances, although there was no one in that House who had a greater regard for his hon. and learned Friend than he had, he hoped that the Committee would not listen for a moment to appeals made to it by Members of different constituencies, but that, having accepted a broad line, they would be prepared to adhere to it, although it might appear to Members somewhat hard upon certain boroughs.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME said, he had placed an Amendment on the Paper in reference to the 2nd Schedule, which applied to Berwick-on-Tweed; but he had found that he would be out of Order unless he moved to omit the name of Berwick-on-Tweed in line 12 of the present Schedule. Berwick-on-Tweed had returned two Members to the House of Commons for the last 356 years; and he almost thought there was no other constituency in the country which had the same right to complain of the provisions of the present Bill as that which he had now the honour to represent. It would be well understood how, when the present Bill was published, and the borough of Berwick-on-Tweed found itself in the Schedule, it was extremely astonished at the treatment it met with at the hands of a Liberal Administration, whom they, as a rule, had done their best to serve. The Town Council drew up a Memorial and presented it to the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister, in acknowledging it, said that he had referred it to the Boundary Commissioners, and that the terms of it should have the best consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The Town Council had appeared before the Boundary Commissioners; but the Boundary Commissioners informed them that they had no powers whatever except to settle the boundaries of the new county districts. Under these circumstances, the borough had no other course but to call upon its Representatives in that House to say what they could on behalf of its claim for continued representation in the Councils of the nation. He was quite aware that the main basis upon which the provisions of the Bill proceeded was that of population, and that the borough he had the honour to represent did not come up to the requirements of the measure; but he contended, in the first place, that it had been already laid down that population was not to be the sole basis. Already they had had exceptions in the seats given to the Universities and the City of London, thereby showing that historical associations and other sentimental considerations were held to be of some account besides that of mere numbers. He regretted that his hon. Friend unite Berwick to Scotland for Parliamentary purposes, for he was convinced that all true Scotchmen would evince sympathy for the town of Berwick, and prefer to see this Amendment carried. He had no doubt that he should be answered, as the hon. and learned Gentleman who preceded him in regard to the case of Beaumaris had been answered, by the question—where is the extra Member to come from? He did not think it fair for the Government to ask hon. Members where the extra Member was to come from, for they had not taken him away; and it was for those who had taken him away to say where the extra Member was to come from. He would suggest that there were plenty of disloyal and some corrupt boroughs from which a Member might be taken; and he left Her Majesty's Government to select the constituency. Had this borough been in the same position as Sandwich and others, they might have allowed it to be disfranchised as a fair arrangement; but he would remind the Committee that in the case of Berwick there had been an investigation into the practices at an election some two or three years ago. The scrutiny took place at the instance of the then Lord Advocate; and it was discovered that, at all events on one side of the House, there was perfect purity; and but for that the right hon. Gentleman in question would have had a seat in the House. It was proved to demonstration that the sitting Member did not get his seat by bribery, and he hoped this fact would not be forgotten by the Committee. If he received any support at all, he should certainly go to a division in favour of retaining a Member for the ancient town of Berwick-on-Tweed.

[Sixth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in Schedule 1, page 13, column 1, line 12, to leave out the words "Berwick-on-Tweed."—(Colonel Milne-Home.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. and gallant Member had made a capital defence for the ancient borough of Berwick-on-Tweed; but he had proved almost too much. He had told the Committee that the borough enjoyed the special patronage of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and in that case it might be well able to get on without special representation. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would, however, point out to the Committee how serious a gap would be made in the Bill by the acceptance of any suggestion of that kind. The hon. and gallant Member did not ask for one Member only, but, in reality, he asked for four, by drawing an artificial line in favour of a borough with a population of little more than 14,000. The hon. and gallant Member, in trying to defend his own borough, had mentioned the cases of Newark, Weymouth, and other boroughs, with a still larger population, but which, nevertheless, found themselves in a similar position, and which would certainly be able to make out quite as strong a case as the hon. and gallant Member had made out for Berwick. Newark was a very ancient borough; it had always returned two Members, and it was increasing far more rapidly than Berwick. It, therefore, had a much stronger case in its favour. The hon. and gallant Member stated that his Amendment would not interfere with the principles of the Bill. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was astonished at that assertion, because only last night, when a question of population was raised, he had felt himself compelled to state that the limit of 15,000 was a vital principle of the Bill. He was afraid he could only make that ~~non~~ answer which the hon. and gallant Member appeared to anticipate.

Amendment negatived.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, he would move formally to omit Tamworth from Schedule 1. He should like to say one word, although he did not know that it would be necessary, in the shape of an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, and to the Government, on behalf of Tamworth. It was a borough, perhaps, more ancient than that of Berwick-on-Tweed—at all events for several hundred years it had returned two Members to Parliament. He had himself had the honour of sitting for it for 30 years, and for three generations a Member of his family had represented it for nearly 90 years. He had hoped that the original plan of the Government would have been accepted by the House, and in that plan they had inof the division, and he hoped the Government would bear in mind the public feeling that might exist in the division. He would be very glad, however, to see the name of Tamworth attached to one of the divisions of Staffordshire.

[Sixth Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved the inclusion of the Ayr group of burghs among those that should cease to return Members. He said the object of the Amendment was to dissolve the group now composing the Ayr district of burghs with the view of re-constituting them in a somewhat different way. There was a similar Amendment on the Paper by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander), and though he differed from the hon. and gallant Member in regard to the way in which the difficulty was to be solved, yet they were agreed that the only way of effecting certain re-arrangements in the groups of Scottish burghs, which he believed was almost universally admitted to be desirable, was by first dissolving the groups under Schedule 1, and then reconstituting them under Schedule 4 in such a way as might be thought right. The object of the Amendment standing in his name was to omit from the so-called Ayr group two of the burghs of which it consisted. At present, the group comprised the burghs of Ayr and Irvine, both in the county of Ayr, and three other burghs—Campbeltown, Inverary, and Oban—in the county of Argyll. He believed there was a unanimous opinion among the Scotch Members that this was a somewhat unwieldy group, altogether wanting in that element of identity and solidarity of interests which it was desirable to maintain, and the two burghs he proposed to omit and merge in the county were Oban and Inverary. As regarded Inverary he would say nothing. He believed there was a universal feeling among the Scotch Members that small places under 1,000 population, especially if decreasing, were scarcely worthy to continue as members of groups of burghs. [Mr. RAMSAY: No.] Well, that was very generally the opinion. In regard to Inverary, the state of the matter was this—its population in 1871 was 902, and in 1881 it was 864, so that it was a decreasing place; and it was eminently what might be called a county town. It was the town of the county, and therefore it seemed very appropriate that it should form part of the county of which it was the county town, and it was without interests or pursuits separate from those of the county. With regard to Oban, although the population was larger, he believed there was a widespread feeling to the same effect, and he understood that the people of Oban itself would desire to form part of the county. Its population was increasing, no doubt. In 1871 it was 2,413, and it was now 3,991. It was a very prosperous place; but it was, as was generally known, identified with the prosperity of the Northern part of the county of which it formed a portion. That was the object for which it was proposed to dissolve the group. Of course, it would be for the Committee to consider, when they came to Schedule 4, whether this was a proper object; but he supposed that, before dissolving the group, the Committee would require to form, at all events, some sort of provisional opinion as to whether this object was a right and proper one. The hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander) proposed to dissolve the group for a totally different object; and when the time came it would be his the Lord Advocate's duty to dissent from the hon. and gallant Member's proposal, which was to include the burghs of Ayr, Irvine, Campbeltown, Galston, and Old Cumnock. The question would be an open one, and he would at present only submit to the Committee that it was reasonable that this group should be dissolved, with a view to its reconstruction when the Committee came to deal with Schedule 4.

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, line 46, after the word "Scotland," to insert the words,—

"Ayr District of Burghs) | Ayr and Argyll."
— The Lord Advocate.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, it would perhaps be convenient to the Committee that he should explain, as he had an Amendment on the Paper in terms identical with that which had been moved by the Lord Advocate, why he proposed that the existing group of county he would mention that at the General Election of 1868 he was himself beaten by a majority of only 25, but succeeded in carrying the two next Elections. He had no doubt that if the constituency was to be left in its present position the Liberal Party would greatly preponderate, owing to the large number of small towns which were scattered here and there throughout the division. He would repeat that his only object in the proposal he would have to make later on was not to jerry-mander the constituency, but to secure a fair distribution of political power between the urban and the rural interests; and he hoped that upon this occasion the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board would yield to the fair request he made.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he was opposed to the scheme of the Lord Advocate as a whole; but he did not propose to submit his general objections in connection with this Amendment, because this proposal was almost the only one in regard to which it might be fairly said there was a general agreement. The present proposal was to throw out of the Ayr group and into the county of Argyll two small burghs—Inverary and Oban—and he believed there was a general feeling in favour of taking those burghs out of the Ayr group. But what he wanted to say was that the Lord Advocate had taken a very dangerous course in the peculiar form in which he had placed the Motion on the Paper. It was proposed to destroy and resolve into their original elements the existing groups of burghs, and then to reconstitute them in a different way. There were few who did not think that there ought to be some change, but very few indeed were agreed as to what that change should be; and the consequence of this might be that the Lord Advocate would unite in support of his proposal many hon. Gentlemen who took diametrically opposite views in regard to it. That had already been shown by the remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander) in answer to the observations of the Lord Advocate in introducing the Motion. It appeared to him (Sir George Campbell) that if the Government pressed the plan, a great deal of trouble would result. He thought the general question of the Government proposals might be fairly raised upon this Amendment, because it would be seen at once that it would be impossible to deal with one group of burghs without dealing with others. Of course, as there was a general agreement as to the two burghs of Inverary and Oban, he would not oppose the Amendment, but would simply sound a note of warning in reference to the larger question which would still have to be raised.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he desired to make a few general remarks in regard to the Lord Advocate's scheme which had been laid before the Committee by Her Majesty's Government. The proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not thoroughly remedy any of the main defects that existed in the present distribution of representation in Scotland. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) intended to oppose, on the part of the Government, any addition to the existing groups in Scotland. That was satisfactory. On the other hand, the Lord Advocate only proposed that burghs under 1,000 inhabitants should be merged in the counties. He did not think they ought to allow a proposal of that sort to pass without a protest, on the ground that it could not be considered adequate or consistent with sound principles that only burghs under 1,000 should be so dealt with. The figure should be placed much higher. He had always contended that the same population standard should be applied in Scotland as in England, and that it should be applied not to the population of the groups, but to that of the separate contributory burghs. Again, he found that under the Bill the average county constituency would be 52,000 odd, the average burgh constituency 63,000 odd, and the grouped burghs only 10,000 odd, so that they had a disparity between the district burgh constituency and the large burgh constituency of over 20,000, and practically the representation of the large burghs to the small was as two to three. He regretted that the Lord Advocate in his scheme had done nothing to remedy this disparity in the representation of Scotland. On the contrary, it would be aggravated; for, under his scheme, the average constituency in the grouped burghs would be reduced below them, by their treatment of the subject. When, as they went on, they came to particulars, he should have to give an illustration of that aggravation of anomalies. The hon. Member for Edinburgh complained of the disparity in the numbers of population in counties, and he said that it was very undesirable there should be such great disparity of population between the counties which were each to return one Member. Yet he had not one word to say in regard to the disparity of population as between burgh and burgh. The hon. Member was perfectly content to have the Inverness burghs with a population of 25,000, the Wick burghs with a population of—well, he did not know how few—and other groups with an enormously large population; nor had he a word to say as to the disparity of population between the burghs and the counties. In one case, which had already been mentioned, it was proposed that a group of burghs should remain with a population of 29,000, while the county of itself would be left with a population of 83,000 or 84,000. He certainly did not understand the inconsistencies of the hon. Gentleman in the matter, for at the same time that he pointed out these anomalies he congratulated the Government on their successful effort to deal with the anomalies of Scottish representation. He did not intend, at the present moment, to enter into all the particulars of the case; but he thought this method of procedure, first to destroy and then to revive, was peculiar, to say the least of it. So long as he understood the principles on which the Government proceeded, he did not propose to object to their mode of action; but he was anxious to guard himself against expressing anything in the shape of approval. One word with regard to a remark which had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander). He objected entirely to what was called the "ewe lamb" argument, and he was not at all willing to rest the case on the ground of an appeal to pity. He was not conscious of requiring pity, and he did not plead the cause of the Conservative Party in reference to the Bill upon any such ground. When the proper time came he should be perfectly content to rest his case on what he regarded as the justice of it.

He was perfectly content even that the counties, in time to come, should have a larger population than the burghs; and his only desire was that in some small measure they should adjust the inequalities that at present existed, and that would be increased by this measure, between the populations of the counties and of the burghs.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir Arthur Otway, as this debate has touched upon some of the most important points in the representation of Scotland, I propose to say one or two words early in the discussion which I think ought to be said, especially after some of the speeches that have been made. The hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander) made the only remark about it in the course of this debate to which I shall take objection. He seemed to have on his mind the impression that we made a charge of jerrymandering, as he called it, against his Party. All I can say is, that we consider that his Party have, throughout this Bill, so far from behaving in a spirit that could be characterized by that disagreeable slang word, behaved in the most equitable, public-spirited, and patriotic way. On the other hand, while I think he is quite right to repudiate that charge, I do not think he has any ground for bringing such a charge against the Government, least of all with regard to Scotland.

GENERAL ALEXANDER: It was the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Bolton) who brought the charge against the Conservative Party last Wednesday.

MR. TREVELYAN: My business is with the Government, and I am glad to have an opportunity of repudiating at once any such idea as existing in our own minds—if it could be suspected for a moment that such an idea did exist. In regard to ourselves, we certainly have no reason to try to jerrymander Scotland. We are anxious to leave the election of Members to the broad public opinion of Scotland, quite satisfied that in whatever shape Scotland is cut up, it would never tolerate, in the long run, a bad Government, whether that Government be Liberal or Conservative. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander) said that my right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who was not in his place at the moment—although it was almost the only moment he was not to be found in his place during these discussions—had dealt in an objectionable manner with the question of taking towns that hitherto had formed parts of the counties out of the counties and putting them into the groups of burghs. My hon. Friend the Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) spoke with more particularity as to the position of my right hon. Friend. He said that my right hon. Friend had stated that this question of taking towns which have hitherto formed parts of counties out of the counties and putting them into groups of burghs was an open question. But what my right hon. Friend meant by that was quite clear to those who heard him, and especially to those who sit on the Treasury Bench. What he meant was that it was not a question which entered into the agreement between the two Parties. My right hon. Friend reminds me that the words he used were that the matter was "open to the Committee." That is an exact statement of the case, stated with perfect precision. The question did not enter into the agreement that has been so often referred to between the Leaders of the two Parties, and therefore the Committee was in a position to deal with it as it would. But that does not mean that the Government consider it, so far as the Government is concerned, an open question. They are perfectly firm on this point, that a vital principle of the Bill—not as forming part of the agreement, but as forming part of the Government view of what a redistribution scheme should be—is that small towns in Scotland which have formed parts of the counties hitherto shall remain parts of the counties, and shall not be taken out of the counties and placed in the burghs. I do not want to emphasize this by adding words at this moment; but it is quite impossible that any form of words which I can use should exaggerate the strength of the opinion which the Government entertain on this subject. Why, Sir, the hon. and gallant Member seems to think that the counties in Scotland have been ill-used. Ill-usage, under this Bill, means that each Member represents an extra large population. Well, what is the case? In Scotland every burgh Member represents 53,800 people; every county Member represents 52,900 people; so that the slight difference which exists—because it is a very slight difference—tells against the burghs, and not against the counties. "Oh, but then" it is said—my hon. Friend the Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) says so—"that is all very well; but there are such very great anomalies in the way the seats are distributed." He speaks of these small groups of burghs of 17,000 inhabitants. But you must have anomalies in any Redistribution Bill, and these anomalies tell quite as much in the case of the counties as in the case of the burghs. What constituency does my hon. Friend sit for? He sits for the constituency of Bute, and the population of Bute is, I believe, about 17,000—that is as near as possible the population of the smallest group of burghs which has been retained in this Bill.

Sixth Night;

MR. DALRYMPLE: May I be allowed to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman? I did not complain of the system; but what I commented upon was the inconsistency of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), who had so much to say about the inequality between the counties, while he had nothing to say about it in the case of the burghs.

MR. TREVELYAN: I quite understand the manner in which that allusion was brought in by my hon. Friend opposite; but I am bound to say that I think he has brought a charge against my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) which cannot be maintained, because the next point I was coming to was the complaint of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) that there were some very great anomalies in our distribution scheme as regards the burghs. The hon. Member for Edinburgh says that the single-burgh seats are very ill-used as against the groups of burghs. He stated that the disparity between the district seats and the single burghs in regard to population is as between 40,000 and 60,000—a matter of two to three. Well, in this world you cannot have perfection; but it is a very great thing if a Redistribution Bill takes a step, and a very great step, in the right direction, and I quite agree with my hon. Friend as to what the right direction is. Now, what step has this Bill taken? While my hon. Friend was speaking I made a very rapid mathematical calculation, which I think, on the whole, will hold good. At the present moment the single-seated burghs are in this position—there are 11 seats for 1,120,000. I daresay the calculation is not precisely accurate, but the figure is something like that—that is to say, that at the present moment in the single-seated burghs there are 100,000 people to every Member. This Bill has reduced the number from 100,000 to 60,000 for every Member, and I must own that that is a very great step in the right direction. At the same time the Bill, by the extension of two small groups of burghs, has somewhat raised the amount of population allowed to every Member in the groups of burghs.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. BUCHANAN: The figures I gave were the figures for Scotland under the Bill.

MR. TREVELYAN: I quite comprehend my hon. Friend's meaning. The hon. Member pointed out what is undoubtedly a great inequality and anomaly, and I was only showing that the Bill goes far to correct what was a very much greater anomaly and inequality in the same direction. The hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) quoted the words and endorsed the complaint of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) that the Government proceed upon no principle in this Bill. I myself did not think the hon. Member went quite so far as the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) thinks he did; but I am bound to say that when that remark was made by my hon. Friend opposite I did not hear one single cheer from these Benches, except from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I rise to explain that what I understood my hon. Friend to say, and what I cheered, was not that the Bill was bad and unequal, but that the new scheme of distribution brought in by the Lord Advocate increased the existing inequalities and did not decrease them.

MR. TREVELYAN: Then the remark which the hon. Member cheered was practically that the scheme of the Lord Advocate proceeded on no principle. [SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Hear, hear!] At any rate, he cheers that now. I was very much alarmed at what was contained in that cheer, for I stand before the hon. Member in the position of a victim. The hon. Member has scheduled my own constituency with that of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Noel), and I am waiting with great terror to ascertain what the nature of the charges are which he will bring against us to justify our immolation. But I cannot acquiesce either in the justice of the remark of the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Dalrymple) or in the cheer of the hon. Gentlemen (Sir George Campbell). I maintain that the Government have gone upon principle in this Bill. The main principle in this Bill is that they shall take the greatest step which can be made in the direction of giving representation in proportion to numbers, which is the only principle on which any good Redistribution Bill can possibly go, and, more than that, that it shall no longer be said of Scotland that the most wealthy and intelligent districts—if in Scotland one district can be more wealthy and intelligent than another—shall be under-represented to a degree that absolutely constitutes a national scandal. Well Sir, the Bill has gone upon that principle, and I think it has very fairly carried it out. As to the details by which these changes are to be made, it is quite necessary—in fact, it is the only process by which it could be accomplished—that the burghs that are to be dealt with should first be put in this Schedule of disfranchisement and then in the Schedule of enfranchisement. It is the course which was adopted in the case of a Welsh borough. It is a course which, at the very least, avoids a monstrously cumbrous heap of Amendments; and it is extremely probable, in the opinion of those who have inquired into the matter, that however cumbrous the Amendments may be even yet, the object could not be carried out by any means except that which has been adopted by my right hon. Friend.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not rise to challenge the observation of the right hon. Gentleman as to this being the most convenient manner of dealing with the question. I daresay it may be—perhaps it may be the only method in which the matter can be dealt with. But there are some inconveniences in the way that the question presents itself. But I do see one great advantage in the manner in which the Government are proceeding, and that is, that it has enabled us, at the very com-

[Sixth Night.]

of 42,000. What he proposes is that two police burghs should be taken out, thereby reducing the number of the county population by 8,000, and that that population should be added to the burgh population, raising it to 50,000. That would give—for the county 82,000, and for the burghs 50,000. That seems, on the face of it, to be such an extremely reasonable proposal—though I do not say it may be necessary to admit it, and there may be an answer to it—that we want some better answer to it than to be told, as we were by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), that the Government had laid down the principle not to introduce burghs into groups when they were not in groups already. It seems to me that it is an utterly unreasonable position for the Government to take up, that it is contrary to the real meaning and intention of the measure as a whole, and so contrary to the spirit of the agreement that was made in regard to other proportions of the Bill, that I do hope, as we proceed in the discussion of this question, we shall find that the Government have not tied their own hands unnecessarily by laying down principles for which, as far as I am aware, they have given no reason whatever, and that they will not be shut out, by their own act, from giving fair, reasonable, and candid consideration to questions which may be raised on this subject.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) in his remarks spoke of the proportions in Scotland of county and burgh populations. He spoke generally of the agreement as to certain rates of proportion regulating the representation of counties and burghs. He also asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) by what argument he could justify the views he had expressed to the Committee. It seemed to him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) that one of the strongest arguments which existed was that which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) glanced at that day—namely, the question of the various county and burgh populations. The scheme of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Dalrymple) was to take burghs and towns out of the counties and add them to groups of burghs in Scotland. In England and Wales they gave by the Bill one Member to every 53,100 people in counties, and one Member to every 52,900 people in boroughs—the average for the counties and boroughs together being one Member to every 53,000 exactly. In Scotland, by the Bill, they gave one Member to every 52,900 in counties, and one Member to every 53,800 in burghs, the proportion for counties and burghs together being one Member to every 53,300. At the present moment in Scotland there were 32 county and 26 burgh Members. By the Bill they slightly, but very slightly, decreased the county population, and very slightly increased the burgh population, giving 39 Members to counties and 31 to burghs, being an increase of seven county Members and an increase of five burgh Members. The result was that the proportion came out in the way he had stated it. It was a proportion more favourable to the counties than it was to the burghs. The Scottish counties were more favourably represented than the English counties, and Scottish burghs were less favourably represented than English boroughs, and he thought these considerations ought to be present to the minds of the Committee in any proposal to reduce county population and to increase burgh population in Scotland.

GENERAL ALEXANDER observed that his constituency had a population of 90,000.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that no doubt in particular cases there were hardships, but these were caused by such cases as the constituency of the hon. Member opposite Mr. Dalrymple), which numbered 17,000.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he was delighted at the prominence that had been given in the discussion to Bute-shire. But how did the averages which the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had quoted bear on the question which he Mr. Dalrymple brought before the Committee of the disproportion of the urban and rural element in particular counties?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would explain how they bore on the question. Last night the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) spoke of a case where two different principles came into conflict. Taking the hon. Member's (Mr. Dalrymple's) view, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) should say two principles came into conflict—namely, his principle

Leaders of the Opposition. He was one of those who had all along objected to a compact being arranged between the two Front Benches, and therefore it was a pleasure to him to know that the Government were free upon this matter, and that they could come forward and say on their own responsibility that they made such and such a matter a vital portion of the Bill. The Government had declared that they themselves were strongly opposed to the system of grouping burghs. Allow him to say that the system of grouping was entirely due to causes which long ago had passed away; grouping was not part of the old Scottish system. Grouping necessarily arose from the provision which had to be made when 72 Royal burghs had to get representation in the Parliament, of the United Kingdom. The system did not exist in the old Scottish Parliament, because in that Parliament Royal burghs were separately represented; but when the Union was agreed upon, 72 burgh Members could not be given to Scotland, and therefore it was almost necessary to treat several burghs as one burgh. Parliament ought now, however, to be guided mainly by matters of convenience and general interest in the way in which they were to treat the groups. Where they were inconvenient, where they were widely scattered, by all means let them be merged in the counties; but where they were situated near each other, like the Hawick group of burghs, nobody proposed to disturb them. The more old-fashioned groups of burghs were found extremely inconvenient, and the Lord Advocate was doing something to mitigate the inconvenience that had been experienced. He regretted to hear his hon. and gallant Friend (General Alexander) talk of the jerrymandering desires of Members on the Ministerial side of the House. He should be very sorry indeed if Scottish Conservatism did not find proper representation in the House of Commons. He entirely differed from them on political matters; but he hoped his Conservative Friends would find themselves in the House in something like fair proportion to the number of Conservatives in Scotland. He had no desire they should not be represented. He now came to consider the particulars before the Committee. They had at present to deal with the Ayr burghs, and they were all agreed that those burghs required re arrangement. It was quite true that the county of Ayr itself required additional representation, and perhaps the county of Mid Lothian also required additional representation. But that was a matter for future consideration. It was not fair to say that they were not doing something in the right direction because they were not doing as much as might be done. He knew that English Members were hardly aware of the extraordinary character of some of the groups of burghs in Scotland. The Wick district of burghs, for instance, consisted of six burghs, scattered at great distances from each other; they were Cromarty, Dingwall and Tain in Ross, Dornoch in Sutherlandshire, Kirkwall in Orkney, and Wick in Caithnessshire. Wick itself had a population of 8,000; indeed, it was the only place in the group which deserved to be called a burgh. The St. Andrews group consisted of seven burghs, including Anstruther, Crail Cupar, Kilrenny, and Pittenweem, some of which had only a few hundred inhabitants each. Now, what was the meaning of collecting together several small burghs of that description? Why not throw them into the county and make the division the St. Andrews division of the county of Fife, which would be a very reasonable thing to do? For all practical purposes, Fifeshire would be adequately represented if it had two Members for the county and one Member for the important collection of Fife burghs. Why should a county of the area of Fife have two sets of burghs within it? Surely it would be better represented as he suggested. The question of the representation of Mid Lothian was one which some time or other must crop up. There had been an agitation in favour of breaking the connection between Leith and Portobello and Musselburgh. If, however, the two latter burghs were thrown into the county of Mid Lothian, it would be reasonable that the county should have two Members. In their consultation upstairs with the Lord Advocate, they came to no definite conclusion as to how any additional Members were to be provided. Their scheme involved an addition of 14 Members to the Scottish representation, instead of an addition of 12 Members. Everyone now knew per-were entitled, they would, instead of nine Members, have had 21. The hon. and learned Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot) said he would not like to see the number of Conservatives diminished in the House; but, on the part of the Government, there did not seem to be any desire that the Conservative representation should be strengthened, because, instead of dealing generously in the matter, they had brought forward a proposal which in his (Mr. Orr-Ewing's) opinion was very unjust. If the Government persisted in their present ideas, they would not be carrying out the instructions which the Government had given to their own Commissioners.

[Sixth Night.]

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he quite agreed with the hon. Members who had preceded him that it was quite right for them to discuss this question on the present stage of the Bill. As one of those who took a leading part in pressing the Government to revise the system of grouping in Scotland, he wished to tender his thanks to them for the manner in which they had done it. He thought the Government were not open to the charge that had been made against them of creating more anomalies than they had removed. If they were to make groups of burghs correspond as nearly as possible with the adjoining counties, they would get into great difficulties, and it would very likely end in their having to reconsider the question of the counties. They should have to make a greater approach to electoral divisions, although he should not regret that as an abstract proposition. He had had a long connection with Lanarkshire, and he was not unfavourable to a mixed constituency. He had hoped that the Lord Advocate would have been able to proceed with his scheme, and he was sorry that it had been dropped; but he would support the proposal as it now stood, and do his best to carry it out.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, the hon. and learned Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot) had animadverted, evidently without due reflection, on the grouping system in Scotland. There were only four towns in Scotland with 100,000 inhabitants, while there were a very large number of comparatively small towns. The county of Fifeshire, with which he had to do, had 60 or 70 small towns, some of them grouped in the Kirkcaldy and some in the St. Andrews districts. He thought that not only ought some respect to be paid to prescriptive and ancient right, but that the grouping system in Scotland served an admirable purpose, and worked to the entire satisfaction of the country. He hoped they would adhere to their treatment of the groups of burghs as proposed in the Bill—that was, that groups of burghs with more than 15,000, just as single burghs in England or Scotland with more than 15,000, should remain. The hon. and learned Member for Roxburghshire and the hon. Member for the City of Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) voted against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold) to extend the limit of disfranchisement to 20,000. If the extended limit had been made applicable to England, he had no doubt it would have been made applicable to Scotland too. His hon. Friends had spoken of anomalies; but the anomalies they had sanctioned in England by their votes upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Salford were greater anomalies than any they had in Scotland. For instance, Hereford, with its 19,821 inhabitants, retained one Member; Whitehaven, with its 19,295 inhabitants, retained one Member; Grantham, with its 17,345 inhabitants, one Member; and many other places with similar populations were to have one Member each, while Birkenhead, with 84,006 inhabitants, Dudley, with 87,407 inhabitants, and Middlesbrough, with 64,965 inhabitants, only had one Member each. The anomalies, therefore, to which his hon. Friends had given their sanction, were greater in England than they would be in Scotland. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) wanted to get an additional Member for Mid Lothian; but Mid Lothian, even if Portobello and Musselburgh were taken from Leith and merged in the county, would not come up to the limit of 100,000. The county had now 78,000 inhabitants, and if Portobello and Musselburgh were merged in it it would only have 93,000. In connection with this idea of finding means to give Mid Lothian an additional Member it was proposed to throw the St. Andrews Burghs into the Eastern division of the county—

[Sixth Night.]

to speak — Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Galloway—ought to be considered in that sense. The population of those counties was 156,852, and it had hitherto been represented by five Members — three county and two burgh Members. The proposal in this Bill was to reduce that representation by one. But hitherto the proportion had been that 43,926 of the population had been represented by the two burgh Members. The proposal in the Bill, however, was to reduce the burgh population in those three counties to a total of 27,584 — namely, Dumfries, Annan, Lochmaben, Sanquhar, and Kirkcudbright—leaving to the three counties a population of 130,000. Now, as it was well known that there were many towns very much larger in those three counties than Annan, Lochmaben, Sanquhar, and Kirkcudbright, it did seem very hard that under this Bill those towns should be merged in the counties, instead of being added to the district group of burghs to which they had a natural affinity. If the Dumfries district of burghs were treated as he proposed, they would have an opportunity of adding to it the town of Stranraer, which was the largest of the burghs about to be disfranchised except Dumfries. Stranraer was a most important and growing town, it was the nearest port to Ireland, and through it the postal communication which was about to be established with Ireland would flow. That town, naturally urban in its character, was to be merged in the county, while such towns as Lochmaben and Sanquhar, and even Kirkcudbright, which, as a matter of fact, had under 2,000 of a population, were to be left in the Dumfries district. The population of Stranraer was close on 7,000, and he believed there was only one other town in Scotland with anything like that population which was about to be merged in a county; indeed, Stranraer was the only town of its importance which was about to be taken out of a burgh and thrown into a county. It had lines of railway, and had many associations with Dumfries, and it seemed an extraordinary contention that to the large county population there was to be thrown in the largest town except Dumfries in the three counties. It had hitherto been the process in Scotland to associate towns which were of an urban character in a district of burghs. He was not going to travel over the arguments which had been so well debated by the Committee already; but with regard to this matter, he would like to suggest that, in case the Government should agree to the proposal, the Dumfries district of burghs should for the purpose be opened up in Committee on Schedule 2, so as to insert other towns. The burgh of Kirkcudbright, which was the most Westerly portion of the group, had a population of 2,571, yet half-way between it and Dumfries was the town of Dalbeattie, with a population of 3,855, and the town of Castle-Douglas, with a population of 2,565. These towns, which were of much more importance than Kirkcudbright, were ignored by the Bill, Kirkcudbright being retained in the group of burghs. Similarly, on the other side, they had the fact that Moffat and Lockerbie, with 2,000 inhabitants each, were much nearer to Annan and Sanquhar, which were portions of the Dumfries group. Inasmuch as the considerable population in the three counties was about to lose one of its Representatives, he thought the Committee would agree with him that it was but right that the urban population of those counties should be united with the Dumfries District Burghs, to which they had natural affinity, and that the burgh of Stranraer, with a population of 7,000, a much larger population than any other of the burghs in the Dumfries district, should be added to it for the purpose of preserving what was desired—namely, urban representation. He had the honour of attending a large meeting in the burgh of Stranraer not very long ago, in which the question was fairly put. The meeting, in which every shade of politics was represented, desired that they should retain their urban character. What he suggested would be a very fair and proper adjustment of the representation of Dumfries and Galloway, and therefore he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed.

In Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, line 46, after the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words, —

“Dumfries District of Dumfries and Kirkcudbright Burghs.”

—(Admiral Sir John Hay)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

[Birth Night.]

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that this was an Amendment to which he could not assent. It had already been explained that the sole object of putting any burgh or group of burghs into this particular part of the Bill was to dissolve them. His right hon. and gallant Friend proposed this Amendment with the view of adding to the Dumfries group four towns, or rather five, for in his speech he had added Stranraer. He noticed on the Paper an identical Amendment in the name of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell); but as that hon. Gentleman only moved an Amendment on this clause, which would have the effect of dissolving the group, and had given Notice of no Amendment as to re-grouping, he (the Lord Advocate) inferred that his proposal was simply to dissolve the group.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL explained that he intended to move another Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that, according to the Amendment on the Paper, the hon. Member would destroy the group, and revive it in no way. What the Committee had to consider was whether they were prepared to assent to either of these proposals? As regarded the first proposal, all that it involved was that to the existing group of burghs there should be added Lockerbie, with a population of 2,029; Moffat, 2,161; Castle-Douglas, 3,865; Dalbeattie with 3,865; and, according to the gallant Admiral's speech, Stranraer, with a population of over 6,000. As regarded the places referred to on the Paper, none of them were burghs, and none had hitherto been a member of a group of burghs. They were all small towns, only one, Dalbeattie, having a population of 3,000, and it was not a place with any distinctive burghal character. It had been already stated from the Government Bench that the proposal to add to the existing groups of burghs, especially by places of such small population, was one to which they could not assent. As regarded Stranraer, the case was somewhat different. Stranraer was already one of a group of burghs which had not in the aggregate 15,000 of a population, and accordingly underwent the penalty of disappearing under the Bill. Did it make any difference for the purpose of this case that they had to deal with a place which was one of a group of burghs which was to disappear? He submitted that it did not. No doubt, Stranraer was a county town, and as such would have its just influence in the county; but why that county town should be taken out of Wigton and added to Dumfries had not been shown by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay). Unless it was said that any place of 6,000 inhabitants ought to be added to something which was nearest, even though the distance might be great, he could not see any reason why Stranraer should be added to the existing Dumfries group. His right hon. and gallant Friend had, in aid of his argument, given certain statistics. He said that in the three Southern counties of Scotland—Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Galloway—there was a population of 156,852, and that this population was represented by three county and two burgh Members. Well, all he could say about that was that if they were all represented in these five Members, it would give 31,000 to each Member, which was very much below the average minimum; and by the reduction of 14,000 they would be still leaving the constituencies under 40,000 per Member, so that they would be still below the minimum. It came to this, therefore, that as far as population was concerned his right hon. and gallant Friend's statistics did not aid his argument, but went rather the other way—against it.

SIR JOHN HAY: My argument is not in favour of an additional number of Members.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): No; but inasmuch as an appeal was made to statistics, that would seem to show that there was good reason for taking away a Member from that county.

SIR JOHN HAY: My argument was rather to show the difference between the urban and rural population, and to show that in the new scheme the burgh population will be reduced to 27,000 from 43,900.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he had not quite presented the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's argument, which was that there would be a disproportion between the counties and the boroughs, if they reduced the representation of 156,852 persons to four Members. The arrangement the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself proposed would give the counties a population of somewhere about 43,000, which was considerably below the average, so that the counties would be well represented by three Members. So that, unless it were proposed to say that it has to be a sequence to the abolition of any group of burghs that they should pick up the bigger fragments and attach them to what was nearest, he should submit that there was no reason for adding Stranraer to the Dumfries Burghs; and as regarded four small towns or villages referred to in the Amendment, there was still less reason for accepting the proposal. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), if what the hon. Member meant was to destroy the Dumfries group of burghs, then he should resist that. It was quite true that the Dumfries group of burghs was a very large one. Not only was the aggregate population very nearly double the 15,000 limit; but they had in the town of Dumfries alone, according to the Census of 1881, a population of 17,092, so that they had thus got one burgh—the burgh from which the group took its name—which would stand alone under the 15,000 limit. He did not think it necessary to say more than that, inasmuch as the only result of dissolving the group would be the adoption of a new arrangement which would not be acceptable. It was quite different in the last case, where the result would be such that everyone could accept. Everyone would dissent from the result of the present proposal.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it was only right that he should explain the Amendment to which reference had been made. He had not known whether the Government were going on with their plan, and had, therefore, thought it better to wait for the burghs to be dissolved before he put on the Paper a proposal for re-grouping them. His Amendment was the same as that of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay), although, no doubt, when they came to go into the details, it would be found that the proposals were of a somewhat different character. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) was quite right in quoting him as having said that there was absolutely no principle in the Amendment which the Lord Advocate had put upon the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) had assured them that there were certain principles, so far as the Bill was concerned; but he (Sir George Campbell) did not think the right hon. Gentleman had attempted to show that there was any principle in the Lord Advocate's plan. He also thought the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) was perfectly correct in saying that the plan of the Lord Advocate, taken as a whole, did not cure, or go in the direction of diminishing, the inequalities in the representation of Scotland. As a matter of fact, it increased them. He refrained from going into the question of the first Amendment, because it was wholly undisputed; but the present being a contested Amendment, he thought he had a right to say a few words in explaining his general view of the Lord Advocate's scheme. It seemed to him that not only was the scheme devoid of merit, but that the only recommendation it had was that it pleased nobody. Sometimes a middle course was desirable, although it did not please everybody; but it was perfectly clear that the proposed scheme pleased nobody—except, perhaps, the hon. Member for the Kilmarnock Burghs (Mr. Dick-Peddie), whose constituents would benefit by the scheme. As he had said, he objected to the Lord Advocate's Amendments, because they had no principle in them. Well, the object of his (Sir George Campbell's) Amendment was to put a little principle in them if possible. He would have been much better pleased if the Lord Advocate had not proceeded with his Amendments at all. It would be much better that they should be withdrawn. He (Sir George Campbell) would proceed to show why he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendments were, he would not say unprincipled, but to be viewed in the sense of being without principle, and how he proposed to treat them by putting a little principle in them. He did not bring forward his Amendment because he wanted to carry further the system of grouping burghs, but, if possible, to infuse into the Lord Advocate's scheme something like equal justice—an equal measure to all, so that there could be no picking and choosing. He did not accuse the Lord Advocate of jerrymandering in an offensive sense; but he certainly thought that there was a very innocent form of political jerrymandering observable in his scheme. He objected to the scheme for various reasons. He objected to it, in the first place, because it amounted to a breach of faith in a technical sense, for he did not wish to be taken as using the word by any means offensively. The scheme was a breach of the understanding that the Committee had come to, and what it seemed to him the Prime Minister had put forward. He understood that the Bill was founded upon certain general principles—if not principles, at all events certain uniform rules. He thought the Government had rightly and wisely founded their Bill upon these rules, because, when rules were laid down and carefully followed, it was impossible that the charge of jerrymandering, or anything of that kind, could be bandied about from one side or the other. He had understood it to be a principle of the Bill that certain general rules should be followed; and he had understood from the Prime Minister, or from the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill (Sir Charles W. Dilke), that if any exception was made, or any change effected, it should only be in regard to matters to which there was very general agreement in Scotland. That was what they had been told would be the ground upon which changes would be warranted, and of course they had understood by that that it would be ascertained what the feeling of the constituencies as well as of Members was, that the feeling of the constituencies should be gauged, and that general assent having been obtained changes could be effected. Well, he altogether denied that in regard to the body of the changes the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate proposed there was any agreement whatever. So far as the constituencies were concerned, they had been kept entirely in the dark, no step having been taken to ascertain their feelings. He understood that even after this proposal had been sprung upon them, the Lord Advocate had refused to receive a deputation from the burghs—he might be wrong, but he had understood that to be the case. Then, not only had the general feeling of the constituencies been ignored, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had also ignored the general feeling of the Members from Scotland. He understood that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not required general agreement or anything like unanimity among Scotch Members; but with all the power and influence of the Government at his back he had obtained the opinion of the majority, and had been satisfied with that information to carry out the particular changes he desired to make. He did not think the opinion the Lord Advocate had gathered from the Scotch Members could be at all viewed in the light of a general agreement. When he (Sir George Campbell) came to the plan proposed, he would explain how he thought it was contrary to the agreement and understanding which had been arrived at. He had already declared it to be his opinion that the plan increased existing anomalies instead of diminishing them. The feeling in Scotland had been that this proposal had died and was not to be revived. When Parliament met, there was a general meeting of the Scotch Members called together—a meeting not of a section or of some few Scotch Members, but of the whole body. Well, what happened on that occasion? Why, when they first met, it was proposed that general approval should be given to the Lord Advocate's proposal.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE: No, no!

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Yes; to the Lord Advocate's proposal there was a chorus of disagreement. Almost everyone disagreed with it, and the hon. Member for the Kilmarnock Burghs, who now expressed disagreement, was most strongly opposed to it.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE: The hon. Member is quite incorrect in his reference to me.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the hon. Member would have the right of reply if he would be patient.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE: I approved of most of the Lord Advocate's Amendments.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that, including his hon. Friend (Mr. Dick-Peddie), almost all the Scotch Members had been opposed, or had refused to give general approval to the scheme; but the Lord Advocate appeared to have squared his hon. Friend Mr. Dick-Peddie) by modifying the proposal with reference to the Kilmarnock Burghs. His hon. Friend, he thought, would admit that when the Scotch Members met he (Mr. Dick-Peddie) was one of the Lord Advocate's strongest opponents. This was a very important point, and the Committee should not lose sight of it. When the question touched the interests of the Scotch Members individually there was a general chorus of disapproval. Upon this the Lord Advocate changed his plan, making alterations in detail; and when he came to do this the objections of some individual Members were done away with, and it turned out that the majority of the Scotch Members found it convenient to continue loyal to the Government. Scotch Members were always loyal to their Leaders if their toes were not trodden upon. A great many of the Scotch Members at the meeting abstained from voting; but taking the Members who were loyal on account of their interests not being affected, and those who were content with what was proposed because it affected other constituencies and not their own, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had a majority of 20 or 21 to 7 or 8 in each case. There had been, however, so little "general agreement" amongst the Scotch Members that for a long time they heard no more about the proposals. He believed that amongst the Members of the Government, even amongst Members of the Cabinet, and certainly amongst Members generally, the idea prevailed that the proposal had been dropped. However, the Lord Advocate had quite recently put it upon the Paper, and it now turned out that it had been very materially altered. The hon. Members for the Ayr and Kilmarnock Burghs had evidently been squared. Originally they had not been satisfied; but now that they had been relieved of the disadvantage of inconvenient and outlying burghs they were perfectly satisfied with the scheme. Then, what remained of the Lord Advocate's scheme? Why, two things, one being the throwing of a certain number of small boroughs into the counties. He Sir George Campbell) should have no objection to that if hon. Members generally agreed to it; but the other part of the scheme was the re-grouping of certain boroughs, and it was in regard to those that he complained of, there being no principle in the proposal. What the right hon. and learned Gentleman had done had been, he would not say to bribe hon. Members who were opposed to him, but "to satisfy" those hon. Members who had been previously violently opposed to him. Considerable advantage had been given to what he Sir George Campbell) might call one and a half of the three groups, the whole burden and loss being thrown on the other one and a half, which were to have only one Member. He would not enter upon the details of this scheme. They were very important to his constituency, but he would not go into the question now, as it did not come before the Committee in the present Amendment. He, however, would express a hope that the Government would not go on with that scheme. He now came to the proposal which he himself wished to submit to the Government, and to the reasons why he supported the proposal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the Wigtown Burghs Sir John Hay — although he would modify the effect of the adoption of the Amendment later on if it were in his power. He Sir George Campbell) wished to make a proposal which, he thought, would put the Committee on a better footing. He maintained that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander, and they ought to treat one set of burghs exactly as they treated another which was similarly situated. He would propose to abolish the Hawick and Dumfries Burghs, and to re-group them, because he believed them to be almost on identically the same footing as the Kirkcaldy and Dunfermline group, and if they re-grouped the one they ought to re-group the other.

Sir George Campbell

MR. LYULPH STANLEY: Sir Arthur (Ctway, I rise to Order. I understood that you permitted a great deal of latitude in reference to Ayr, but I ask whether it is in Order for the hon. Member to talk about every burgh in Scotland which it is proposed to group or not to group.

THE CHAIRMAN: I really think the time has come when I must call upon the hon. Member to limit his remarks. The Question before the Committee does not relate to the plan of the hon. Member; but is to insert at the end of the foregoing Amendment "Dumfries."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL admitted that all he had said hitherto had been somewhat wide of the Amendment. He, however, thought the right hon. Baronet in charge of the Bill would admit that it was distinctly understood that the whole of this question should be discussed at this time, so as to save time in disposing of Amendments which would come on subsequently. He had refrained from expressing his opinions generally on the first Amendment, because it was one upon which they were all agreed—that was to say, because it was not a fighting question. He now came to the particular question of his Amendment. He had special interest in these two burghs—namely, the Hawick and Kirkcaldy district. Both of them were model burghs, if he might so express it. Between the Stirling group of burghs and—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the hon. Member's arguments are not appropriate to this Amendment at all.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had only one word more to say to show what his object was. The three burghs which were the direct subject of this Amendment contained the town of Dumfries, which contained a trifle over 17,000 inhabitants, so that he thought he was correct in saying that it was about identical with the burgh of Dunfermline. To both these burghs the remark of the Lord Advocate applied. They were both so large that if they stood alone and were situated in England they would not be deprived of separate representation. ["No, no!"] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had certainly said that Dumfries was so large that if it stood alone in England it would not be deprived of separate representation. Therefore he was justified, he thought, in saying that Dunfermline, which was similarly situated, if it stood alone in England would not be deprived of a separate representation. If the proposal he made in his Amendment should be carried, he should be glad to propose that Dumfries should be united to the Hawick Burghs. As excellent as they were at present, he thought they would constitute a still more model constituency, coming near to an equal electoral district. He had no wish to deprive the Hawick Burghs of the services of his hon. Friend, or Dumfries of the services of its Member; but he said that they might quite consistently with the other proposals of the Lord Advocate, in the case of the very small counties of Peebles and Selkirk — ["Question, question!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Again I must rise to Order.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I did not catch your last observation, Sir.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's speech has been unusually discursive. I did not interrupt him once or twice when I ought to have done so; but I really now must say that he must confine himself to the Question.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would not further allude to the Hawick Burghs, but would refer for a moment to the Dumfries Burghs. [Several hon. MEMBERS: No, no!] The Amendment on the Paper referred to them. He would confine himself to this observation—that what he proposed was that the smaller burghs constituting the Dumfries group of burghs, following the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate as to the other burghs, should be added to the county in which they were situated, and that Dumfries itself should be added to the Hawick Burghs.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he had no intention of continuing the discussion on the general question; but, as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had referred to him, and had said that most of the Scotch Members disagreed with the Lord Advocate, he thought it right to state that at the meeting of Scotch Members he approved almost all the Lord Advocate's proposals. He had opposed an arrangement which was proposed with regard to his own burghs, and in that matter the scheme had been modified, and he now approved of the whole of the proposal; but he thought the hon. Member hardly used Parliamentary language when he spoke of his being "squared" by the Lord Advocate.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he thought that the speech of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had nothing to do with the arrangement of the Dumfries Burghs. The hon. Member had merely taken the opportunity of expressing dissatisfaction with the scheme of the Lord Advocate—or rather with one part of it. It was a pity the hon. Member had not waited until the scheme relating to his own burgh was under discussion. The proposal of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay)—if it were to be taken seriously—certainly seemed to him a remarkably cool proposal. The speech of the Lord Advocate sufficiently explained how the Government could not accept the Amendment of his right hon. and gallant Friend. He proposed to make an alteration in the grouping of the burghs which he (Mr. Noel) represented, and in doing that he would take 5,000 of the population out of the county of Kirkcudbright—which had a population of 35,000—and add them to the burghs. Thus, according to his right hon. and gallant Friend's proposal, the county would be left with 30,000, while the burgh constituency he would form would be 43,000. Therefore, to get rid of one anomaly—that was to say, a burgh representation of 27,000—he would reduce the county to 30,000, and make the burgh representation 43,000. That could hardly be looked upon seriously after the speech of the Lord Advocate. He would just say one word with regard to the inclusion of the burgh of Stranraer in the Dumfries group. This burgh was in another county. It was more than three hours by rail from Dumfries; it had no real affinity to Dumfries, and really there was nothing in common between these towns. The newspapers did not circulate between the two towns. ["Yea, yea!"] Well, very few of them. The circulation of the Dumfries papers in Stranraer was very small. He had been intimately connected with the Dumfries Burghs for 17 years, and had been 11 years their Member. Yet during all that time he had never been called upon in any way to take part in any matters connected with Stranraer. Therefore, he could say confidently that there really was no affinity between this burgh, lying at the extreme end of another county, and at a very long distance from the nearest of the Dumfries group.

SIR JOHN HAY: I wish to remind my hon. Friend that we have the same

Sheriff, the same Presbytery, and the same lunatic asylum.

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, there might be some things of that sort in common between the two towns; but if grouped in the way proposed for that reason, it would be found that very large districts could be brought together in the same way. But he did not feel that he could seriously discuss the question because of the speech of the Lord Advocate. If that speech had not been made, declaring the intentions of the Government, he (Mr. Ernest Noel) should have gone into the matter in detail to show how many grave objections there were to the course the right hon. and gallant Gentleman Sir John Hay proposed.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 162: Majority 64.—(Div. List, No. 67.)

Amendment proposed, in Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, line 16, after "Scotland," insert "Elgin District of Burghs."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. ASHER) said, as the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend affected the district of burghs which he Mr. Asher had the honour to represent, he wished to say a few words in regard to it. His right hon. and learned Friend proposed to insert the Elgin District in this Schedule, for the purpose of re-arranging it under the 4th Schedule by omitting the burgh of Kintore. He (Mr. Asher) had received a very strong representation from that burgh, signed, he believed, by almost every householder in it, protesting against being separated from the Elgin District, and being merged in the county of Aberdeen; but he was obliged to keep in view that one of the principles on which the Government scheme was based was that all existing burghs having a population of less than 1,000 should be merged in the counties. He was also aware that that principle had received very general assent throughout the whole of Scotland. ["No, no!"] That certainly was according to the information which he at present had. In those circumstances, though he regretted very much that the burgh of Kintore should be severed from the Elgin District against the wishes of its inhabitants, he did not feel justified in opposing this Amendment, at least upon the assumption of the principle that every existing burgh having less than 1,000 inhabitants was to be merged into the counties. Of course, if there should be any modification of that principle by any decision of the Committee, and if any exception should be made to it, probably there was no case in which stronger grounds could be stated for making an exception than the case of the burgh of Kintore. Therefore, he reserved to himself, in the event of any exception being made to that principle, the right of raising the question again when it came up on Schedule 4; but, in the meantime, he did not feel justified in objecting to the Amendment.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to the same effect as that of the Lord Advocate; but his object was different. He would not detain the Committee at present with particulars as to the claims of Fraserburgh. He did not object to the small burgh of Kintore being dropped; but he intended to propose that in its place Fraserburgh should be added to the Elgin group for the purpose of making good workmanship, which he was sure they would all wish this Bill to have as one of its characteristics. Fraserburgh was a fishing town with a population of 6,580, and had identical interests with, at least, three of the burghs of the Elgin District. Therefore, he thought that in order to make the group a reasonable one, it was desirable that a fishing town of this kind should be added to the other burghs of the same character. He made this statement in order to show why it was that he agreed with the proposal that this group of burghs should be placed in the 1st Schedule.

DR. CAMERON thought it was rather a pity that the Solicitor General for Scotland had not got the courage of his convictions. His hon. and learned Friend spoke, no doubt, in highly deserved terms of the burgh of Kintore, yet he was willing to sacrifice it to his right hon. and learned Colleague. As to the assertion of a principle involved, he (Dr. Cameron) did not see that there was any principle at stake. It was a matter of compromise all round; and he thought it right, where such burghs as Oban wished to be merged in the counties, even if they were much above the 1,000 population limit, that they should be merged. He also thought that deference should be paid to the wishes of such burghs as came up very close to the 1,000 of population, and that did not wish to be sacrificed, especially when their neighbouring burghs did not wish to get rid of them. He had spoken because his hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs might take heart of grace when he knew that he would meet with some support, should he push any objection to this proposal to a division, in his (Dr. Cameron's) vote.

The Solicitor General for Scotland

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, line 46, after "Scotland," insert "Falkirk (District of Burghs)."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had every desire to save the time of the Committee. He thought he had already exhausted the general argument, and though the Chairman might have misapprehended him at the time, yet he really wished to save the time of the Committee. He only wished to say, with regard to this proposal, that it seemed to him to be one for which the Lord Advocate had given no reason, and for which he could give no reason. He (Sir George Campbell) could not imagine, if there were to be groups of burghs at all, that there could be a better group than the present Falkirk District. It contained a population of 53,000, which was the average district population, and it was what they in Scotland called a "homologous" district of burghs of the same character geographically near, and connected by railway. Putting aside the county argument, which had been abandoned by the Lord Advocate in respect of other groups, there could not be a better group than the present Falkirk District of Burghs, more like one another, or having more easy communication, and he had heard no reason why it should be dissolved.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he should not have thought it necessary to say anything had it not been for what his hon. Friend had just urged, because he had thought this was a point upon which there was an absolute unanimity. He believed there was still unanimity, minus his hon. Friend. He could not describe this group, as his hon. Friend did, as "homologous;" he was not sure what was the meaning of the word. The group consisted of Airdrie, Falkirk, Hamilton, Lanark, and Linlithgow, being five burghs in three counties, and they were neither locally situated to each other, nor had they any identity of interest. The hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), who was not now in his place, communicated, at an early stage of the proceedings on this Bill, the absolute unanimity of his constituents in regard to this change. In what the Government proposed to do with regard to Linlithgow they gave effect to the wishes of the burgh to be merged in the county. It wanted to go in, and no one, as far as he knew, had anything to say against that. With regard to the remainder of the group, which were partly in the county of Stirling and partly in the county of Lanark, they proposed to make a Lanark group, which should consist, to some extent, of burghs of the present Falkirk group, and, to some extent, of other burghs; and that proposal, he believed, had received unanimous assent. With regard to Falkirk itself, they proposed to join it with the burgh of Stirling, both being in the same county; and that arrangement, he believed, had the unanimous assent of the population.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to schedule the Hawick District of Burghs; but he had already anticipated the whole of the argument he wished to use as to these burghs. His proposal was to the same effect as that regarding the Dumfries Burghs; but the latter fell to the ground, and he presumed this would follow. Still, it seemed to him that what was sauce for the goose in his own case was sauce for the gander in the other.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he did not propose to economise the time of the Committee as his hon. Friend had done. He wished to move an Amendment to schedule the Hawick Burghs, with a view to a re-arrangement under Schedule 4. Something had been said as to the proposal not being made in seriousness. He could assure the Committee, however, that so serious was he in the course he was taking that he was prepared to support his Amendment by very good reasons, and, if necessary, divide the Committee upon it, notwithstanding that it had been said that the Scotch Members agreed about everything in general, but differed about everything in particular. He was anxious to do what was called "liberate" the Hawick Burghs, but for a different object to that which the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had in view. The position of the Hawick Burghs was peculiar. There could be no more appropriate arrangement than the existing group; but it was not a large one, and its population was about 34,000. Jedburgh, which was at present one of the Haddington Burghs—which group was to be abolished—was in the very near neighbourhood of the Border Burghs. It was proposed by the Bill that Jedburgh should be flung into the county of Roxburgh, and should no longer be a Parliamentary burgh; and he proposed that this town, which was at present a Parliamentary burgh, should so continue—that it should be linked, not as hitherto with other towns far away from it, but with towns close to it, and of a similar description. Even in the course of a Scottish debate he was somewhat surprised at the use of the word "homologous," because, like the Lord Advocate, he did not understand what it meant; but instead of saying that Jedburgh was "homologous" with the other Border Burghs, he would say that it was, to a great extent, homogeneous. It had a population of 3,400, and was a manufacturing place; and, as regarded occupation, character, and other respects, it was very similar to the present Border Burghs, besides lying very close to them. He had heard it said that the proposal he made was unpopular, and it was quite possible that it might be; but he had yet to learn that a proposal was necessarily mischievous because it was unpopular. He would endeavour to mention the extreme suitability of the arrangement he advocated. If Jedburgh were added to the Border Burghs, to which, for obvious reasons, it should be connected, it would make the population of the group only about 38,000, or a little more, and he considered that a very fair number; and, as compared with other groups, it was a very moderate population for a group of burghs. He would have been glad to raise this question, if it were only for the purpose of eliciting an argument from the other side of the House. He was anxious to hear the argument of the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot), but much more so to hear the argument of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). Nobody was entitled to speak upon this subject with greater authority than the right hon. Gentleman was; and he wanted to hear what was the objection to the arrangement he proposed of grouping Jedburgh with these other towns, and thus making a group which would not have an excessive population. Do not let it be said that they were proposing to pick out the towns, and have only a rural population. They were attempting to do nothing of the sort. With the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), he preferred a mixed population in a county, and was no advocate for purely rural or purely urban constituencies. They were not proposing to abolish the urban element in Roxburghshire at all; they were only proposing that Jedburgh should be grouped with other burghs in close proximity to it, and which had similar industries and occupations. He would not detain the Committee further; but he should certainly ask the judgment of the Committee upon his proposal.

[Sixth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, after line 49, to insert the words—

“Hawick (District of | Selkirk and Roxburgh.” Burghs)

—(Mr. Dalrymple.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. TREVELYAN said, the burghs which he had the honour to represent had been introduced into the Paper of Amendments by two hon. Members. One of them was his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), and he (Mr. Trevelyan), would deal with him first, because his arguments were extremely short, and of a pithy nature. His hon. Friend said he proposed to deal with the gander as the goose had been dealt with. Now, he (Mr. Trevelyan) objected to be called a gander; but while the hon. Gentleman was speaking he could not help thinking of some of the most pointed lines in all English satire, which referred to the Marquess of Grahame of that day. The Marquess of Grahame compared himself to a goose in the House of Commons, as his hon. Friend (Sir George Campbell) had compared himself, on the ground that by his cackling he woke the Ministers to a sense of their danger. The lines he was reminded of were—

“If right the bard, whose numbers sweetly flow,
That all our knowledge is ourselves to know,
What Sage like Grahame can the world produce,
Who in full conclave called himself a goose?
The admiring Senate, from the high-born youth,
With wonder heard the undisputed truth.”

But in this case it was not an undisputed truth. He (Mr. Trevelyan) disputed it. His hon. Friend had done himself great injustice. The hon. Member was not what he called himself—he was a great and eminent administrator—and as a great and eminent administrator he must be aware that such a proposal as that of joining Dumfries to the Border Burghs did not come within the range of practical politics. He turned then to the arguments of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Dalrymple). The hon. Member said he was extremely anxious to know what possible reasons could be given against his proposal. In the first place, he (Mr. Trevelyan) gave a general reason, which was that in their opinion the burghs of Scotland had got their full population as compared with the counties; and he repeated once more that, whereas the burgh population was to every Member 53,800, the county population was 52,900. Now, his hon. Friend said that these were not a very populous group. They might not be very populous according to some standard existing in the mind of his hon. Friend; but, on the other hand, they were a very fairly populous group as among Scottish burgh constituencies. There were no less than seven other groups of burghs in Scotland that were less populous than the Border Burghs. They must consider not only what the population of the place was, but whether the population was growing or otherwise. Now, at the present moment the population of the Border Burghs was 37,640; whereas at the time when the late Earl of Beaconsfield picked them out from the surrounding counties, and gave them the romantic name they were now known by, they had only a population of 25,000 according to the Census of 1871. Now, when a burgh increased in 10 years from 25,000 to 37,000, it might fairly be called a flourishing borough. He doubted whether they could find, with the exception of Barrow-in-Furness, any such relative increase in the whole of the United Kingdom. His hon. Friend proposed to add to these burghs by taking a town from the county of Roxburgh—taking from the less in order to give to the greater. The county of Roxburgh had a population of 34,000, and he thought it would require a strong argument to prove that it would be right to rob the county, with a smaller population, to increase the burghs with a larger population. These arguments, he maintained, his hon. Friend did not bring forward. Jedburgh was only in some respects similar to the Border Burghs. These burghs constituted the most homogeneous constituency that could be imagined. It was a constituency of towns that were once small pleasant towns, but which had become large towns without ceasing to be pleasant, and which had increased with great rapidity by the prosperity of the tweed trade, the tweed trade also existing in Jedburgh, but not to the same extent as in Selkirk, Galashiels, and Hawick. Jedburgh was essentially a county town, and there was not one of the three towns in the Hawick group that was not very nearly twice as large as Jedburgh, and two of them were five times as large. Much as he respected the people of Jedburgh, he did not want to have them for his constituents, unless they were anxious for it themselves; but he objected to the proposal of his hon. Friend because of what it would take from the county. Jedburgh being a very important county town, on these grounds, and on the ground likewise that they were treating Scotland very differently from England by granting these district boroughs, he said that by creating and re-creating burghs of 3,000 in Scotland, when in England they made no new burgh under a figure of 50,000, they were treating Scotland, not with generosity, but with an unfairness which he thought would have a very bad effect on the constituencies.

Mr. Dalrymple

SIR JOHN HAY said, the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the borough which he had the honour to represent (Wigtown), and said it was impossible to ask them to do in Scotland what they did not do in England; but the right hon. Gentleman should not talk of consistency when the Government were proposing to do exactly the same thing in Wales as they were asking for in Scotland. They proposed to break up the borough of Haverfordwest by adding it to the Pembroke Boroughs, which was exactly on all fours with the case of the Hawick Burghs. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not urge consistency as being part of the Government Bill.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR said, the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) had described Jedburgh as a relic of the Haddington Burghs. As he, Mr. Craig-Sellar had the melancholy satisfaction of representing that relic, he wished to say a word on the proposal now before the Committee. His hon. Friend must remember that although Jedburgh was a relic of the Haddington Burghs, and was a small town, it was, at the same time, the capital of the county of Roxburghshire, and on that account it was not unreasonable that the inhabitants should wish to vote in the county. With regard to the question of the popularity of the proposal, he would remind the Committee that as soon as the Bill was presented an important meeting was held at Jedburgh, and they unanimously came to the conclusion that Jedburgh should be merged in the county, and not, as his hon. Friend proposed, merged in the Border Burghs. That, he thought, was a sufficient answer to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir John Hay), who had made remarks with regard to Haverfordwest, where there was no desire to be merged in the county. Therefore, so long as the question of popularity had any weight, and it was popular in the borough that they should be joined to the county, he hoped the Committee would have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the Amendment should be rejected.

SIR JOHN HAY asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill would explain what was the difference between the case of Stranraer and Haverfordwest?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not like interfering in a Scotch discussion; but with regard to Haverfordwest, he should be glad to defend it, although it was a proposal which the Government did not regard as a vital one.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE reminded the Committee that in voting upon this question the Government had laid down a most unnecessary rule for themselves, which had precluded them from allowing any towns which were not now boroughs from being formed into groups. When they were considering the question whether they were to turn what was now a new burgh into a part of a county, they must bear in mind that the Government had deliberately excluded themselves from coming to a satisfactory settlement of the matter, and creating a fair balance between urban and rural districts by the rule they had laid down.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, in regard to what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, he must repeat the argument which he had already used—namely, that, as a matter of fact, they favoured counties in Scotland by the proposal of the Bill as compared with burghs. The Scottish counties were more favourably represented than the English counties, and the Scottish burghs were less favourably represented than the English boroughs.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the answer to that seemed to him to be this—that the Government were dealing with large averages, and not considering individual circumstances.

Question put.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, on being named one of the Tellers for the Amendment, speaking seated, with his hat on, said, he wished to vote the other way. His Amendment was entirely different in its object from that of the hon. Member, although the same in its terms.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 172: Majority 73.—(Div. List, No. 68.)

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule 1, page 13, column 2, after line 49, to insert the words—

"Inverness (District of Burghs) Kilmarnock (District of Burghs) Kirkcaldy (District of Burghs)	Inverness, Nairn, and Ross and Cromarty Ayr, Renfrew, and Dumbarton Fife."
--	--

—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH expressed his great regret that the Lord Advocate intended to do away with the Inverness District of Burghs. He desired to point out, however, that the object was not wholly obtained, because the burghs were contained in four counties, and the Lord Advocate had only scheduled three.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) asked leave to amend his Amendment by adding thereto the word "Elgin."

Amendment amended, by inserting after the word "Nairn" the word "Elgin."

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, the Amendment had now been put in proper form. He had been surprised that afternoon to hear the Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. Asher) state that to exclude boroughs of 1,000 population was part of the original principle of the Bill. That he utterly denied, because it was not part of the original Bill; and he was happy to say that it was not one of the matters that came under the compact between the two Front Benches, nor was it a matter that interfered with the principle of the Bill. The Lord Advocate, at a meeting of the Scottish Members after the Bill was read a second time, proposed to insert in the Bill that all burghs with a population under 1,000 should be thrown into the counties. But the reason why he fixed 1,000 he had not chosen to explain. There was no magic in 1,000, and he might just as well have made it 900, or 600, or 500. Now, the Amendment would deprive the ancient burgh of Fortrose from any longer having a voice in the burghal representation of Scotland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had also mis-stated the figures in regard to the population of Fortrose; for in 1881 the population was 986—within 14 of the Lord Advocate's own limit—and since that time the population had risen to over 1,000. The burgh of Fortrose distinctly objected to be withdrawn from the district of burghs; the county of Ross, to which it was proposed to join Fortrose, did not wish it to be joined; and the burghs of Inverness, of Nairn, and of Forres, desired it to remain connected with them. Under those circumstances, he could not believe that the Lord Advocate would adhere to the hard-and-fast line which he had laid down. Fortrose was one of the oldest of the Scottish burghs; it had a long Parliamentary history, and was so rich in common property that it had absolutely no borough taxes. It was closely associated with Inverness; and although it lay within the county of Ross, it was more intimately connected with the burgh of Inverness.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it had been already stated—and he believed it to be a very general opinion, and also a sound principle—that places below 1,000 should not remain as units or groups of burghs. Places which were so small that they had not 1,000 population would hardly come up to the dignity of burghs. Whether the principle was sound in this case it was for the Committee to judge; but they had already accepted it in other cases. He had taken the population of Fortrose from a Parliamentary Return, which showed that it was not only a small population, but that it was a decreasing population. According to the Census of 1871 it was 911, and to the Census of 1881 it was only 869. The hon. Member had said the population was going up; but he could see nothing to make it go up, considering it had been steadily decreasing for some time. It was one of the Inverness group certainly; but it was not in the county of Inverness, nor was it locally contiguous to Inverness, being separated from it by an arm of the sea. Fortrose was a small town or village in the county of Ross; and he submitted that it was more proper that it should be made a part of the county of Ross than one of a group of burghs with which it was not connected at all. He was not prepared to say that there should be a preservation of such small burghs as this; and he knew nothing to justify an exception being made in this case from the rule which had been laid down.

Dr. CAMERON said, the Lord Advocate had assumed that the principle of disfranchising all those small burghs which were below 1,000 population had been affirmed; but he Dr. Cameron did not think it had. This was really the first case they were called upon to decide on the subject. His hon. Friend on that side of the House assured him that his figures were correct in regard to the population, and there must, therefore, be some mistake. Would it not be well for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate to suspend his execution for a while—give a reprieve to Fortrose for a time? If not, he would vote with his hon. Friend.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not understand the action of the Government in this matter. If they were going to disfranchise all places under 1,000 on the ground of high principle, which the Lord Advocate had put before the Committee, why did they not also apply that principle to the Welsh boroughs? It seemed to him that they had adopted a principle which they departed from whenever they thought fit. He hoped the Committee would insist upon an explanation in this matter.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, the borough of Fortrose had been shown to be decreasing in population, rather than otherwise, and there was no reason for departing from the rule in respect to it. The fact that it had no taxes made it all the more remarkable that the population was decreasing. There had been no case whatever made out to justify the making of an exception in favour of Fortrose.

MR. GORST said, he did not like to interfere in Scotch debates; but he had been sitting there all day long endeavouring, like a drowning man, to grasp at anything like a principle he could discover. He had noticed that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had carefully refrained from saying a single word on this matter. He had left it to the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland, who had shown themselves utterly at variance with one another, while both were at variance with the principle of the Bill. He did not know what had been done in Wales; but in Scotland it appeared to him that the Government were attempting to do a little bit of jerryandering.

They seemed always endeavouring to manipulate the arrangement of burghs so as to promote a Party advantage. The case put forward by the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment was a very simple one. Fortrose appeared not to want to leave Inverness; Ross had no desire that it should come to them; and Inverness wished to keep it. Then, why on earth did they want to meddle with these people at all? Unless some explanation was given by the Government, he should consider himself bound to vote for the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite had made a contrast between the cases of Wales and Scotland. He had already considered the case of the places in Wales which would remain with a less population than 1,000; and if anyone raised the question, he personally would not offer the slightest opposition to these places being merged into their counties, so that if all that was needed to make the Scottish principle uniform was that it should apply to Wales, he did not think that that would weigh much.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood what he had said. He did not expect that the same principle that was to work in Scotland should be extended to Wales; but what he did say was that unless Her Majesty's Government endeavoured to make this representation a real urban representation, instead of a mixed one, they had better leave things as they were.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE understood the argument of the right hon. Baronet; but he would point out that the question in Scotland had been already arranged by the system of grouping. In regard to what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), he would point out that the Lord Advocate had consulted on several occasions with the Scotch Members; and this proposal of 1,000 limit which had been suggested to him met with a very general, if not almost unanimous, acceptance.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON said, the Lord Advocate's proposals received very general approval in Scotland at first; but since he had discussed them with Scotch Representatives they had been so cut down that it would have been better if they had been allowed to remain as they were originally in the Bill. The proposal to throw Fortrose into the county had excited great discontent amongst the people. The population was not far off the limit, and the Town Council thought it might soon be raised to 1,000. He was utterly opposed to the present system of grouping of burghs in Scotland; but he thought that this 1,000 limit was such a very trifling reform that they might well wait until they got more.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he could not help agreeing with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that there was a most extraordinary difference in the principles of the Government in accordance with whether the case under discussion applied to Scotland, Ireland, England, or Wales.

Question put, "That the words,

'Inverness (District of Burghs)

Inverness, Nairn,
Elgin, and Ross and Cromarty

be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 166; Noes 120: Majority 46.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENT.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I rise, Sir, to ask the permission of the House to carry out what was arranged at the beginning of the Sitting—namely, that I should make a statement now explaining what has been done with respect to the agreement as to Egyptian finance. If the House will allow me to proceed with such a statement, I will do so as shortly as I can. The agreement which has been arrived at consists, in the first place, of a Declaration by the Great Powers and Turkey; secondly, of a Convention, also by the same Powers; and, in the third place, of a project or Decree to be issued by the Khedive of Egypt. The Declaration was signed yesterday by all the Powers except Turkey, whose full powers, I am authorized to say, are on the way. The Convention has been signed this afternoon, and the Khedive has undertaken to sign the Decree.

Mr. Gorst

These three instruments will be accompanied in the Parliamentary Papers by the Diplomatic Correspondence. The instruments themselves will, I hope, be circulated to-morrow, or at latest on Friday morning. We will endeavour to have them out to-morrow, and the Correspondence will, I hope, be circulated on Monday. The statement which I am now about to make is not one in the technical order of the Declaration, Convention, and Decree; but I will give their general effect and result in a manner which will, I think, be convenient to the House. I may premise it by observing that in 1882, after the events at Alexandria, it was evident that, in order to restore the finances of Egypt, that country must pass beyond the powers and limits imposed by the Law of Liquidation, and that it would be necessary to raise a large loan. The Controllers General in 1882, Sir Auckland Colvin and M. Brédif, estimated that the amount required would be £8,000,000; and they proposed, in order to obtain the necessary interest, that the Sinking Fund should be suspended. The Papers on this subject will be found in the Blue Book of 1883. In 1883 and 1884 the condition of Egyptian finance reached a very critical stage, and was the subject of careful inquiry by those who represented this country in Egypt, and by us at home; and in the early part of 1884, as this House will remember, we proposed that a Conference of the Great Powers should take place on the subject. The Conference met in the summer of 1884, and it was then agreed on all sides that an £8,000,000 loan was necessary to restore the finances of Egypt. There was also general agreement as to the amount of expenditure requisite for normal administrative purposes in Egypt; but there was a difference among the Powers as to the proper amount of Egyptian revenue, we thinking that the present scale of land tax was excessive, and that, consequently, some of the interest on the existing loans required abatement, while the French thought that the present scale was satisfactory, and that no abatement was necessary. All the Powers agreed as to the necessity of suspending the Sinking Fund. The Conference, as the House will remember, was adjourned non des, and last autumn Lord Northbrook went out to Egypt to make further inquiries on this most difficult subject, and he devoted extreme care to an investigation on the spot of the questions in controversy. The results of his inquiry were most valuable, and on his return we reopened negotiations with the Powers on the subject; and after very patient discussion, lasting not over weeks, but months, of the several proposals, the course of which will be seen in the Correspondence to be circulated, I hope, on Monday, the Powers arrived yesterday at a settlement which I will describe in a few words. All the Powers again agreed as to the normal administrative Expenditure in Egypt, fixing the figure, subject to certain adjustments, at £5,237,000 a year; and that figure, I may say, contains one item of expenditure which will be of special interest to us—namely, £200,000 for the maximum cost of the Army of Occupation. They agree that the sum to be raised on the facts now before them should be £9,000,000 instead of £4,000,000. The Powers also admit, what we strongly urged, that the system of taxation in Egypt should be extended to foreigners; and machinery for this purpose is provided in the instrument in which the Agreement is expressed. It was also arranged that two years should be given during which we in England are to make exhaustive inquiries as to the revenue of Egypt, not only as to the proper figure of the land tax, but also as to other branches of revenue; and during those two years our proposals as to abatement of interest on the bonds have been met to this extent—namely, by a 5 per cent deduction from all coupons and a reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent from the interest on our Suez Canal investment, subject in each case to repayment at the end of two years, if the result of our inquiry shows that the revenue can bear it. If at the end of two years we find that a continued deduction from the coupons is necessary, the Khedive is to summon an International Commission like that of 1880, which settled the Egyptian finance at that time, and that Commission is to renew the general inquiry as to the Egyptian finance. I will advert for a moment to the loan. The Powers proposed to us that the loan should be the subject of an international guarantee. We did not ask for any such guarantee; we were willing to undertake it our-absolutely determined and arranged so as to finally decide upon the matter, or is the Conference dependent on other considerations?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The words of the Convention are—I am translating them from the French—

“It is agreed between the Governments that a Commission, consisting of delegates named by the said Governments, shall meet at Paris on a day in March, to prepare and draw up an Act with respect to the free navigation of the Suez Canal, and the project drawn up by the Commission will be submitted to the said Governments, who will also obtain the accession of the smaller Powers.”

MR. NORWOOD asked, whether the Suez Canal arrangement would be submitted to the House for its sanction?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): It will have to be sanctioned by the different Powers.

MR. NORWOOD asked, whether it would have to be sanctioned by that House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): No, Sir; it is not a financial arrangement.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE (RAILWAY LOAN. Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to issue, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, during the twelve months ending on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, the sum of Four Hundred Thousand Pounds sterling, by way of loan, to the Government of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, with a view to the speedy completion of a Railway from Hope Town on the Orange River to Kimberley in that Colony.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to raise the sums required for the said loan by means of Exchequer Bonds, Exchequer Bills, or Treasury Bills, in the manner provided by the various Acts relating to the raising of Money by such Bonds or Bills.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow

MOTIONS.

COUNTY JUSTICES' CLERKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Bill to amend the law with regard to County Justices' Clerks in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, Dr. CONNELL, and Mr. MOLLOY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. (Bill 98.)

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (RETURNING OFFICERS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Bill to amend “The Parliamentary Elections Returning Officers Act, 1875,” ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, and Mr. CHARLES DILLON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. (Bill 99.)

House adjourned at one minute before six o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 19th March, 1893

MINUTES:—SELECT COMMITTEE—Third Report—Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments and Office of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod (No. 42).

PUBLIC BILLS:—First Reading—Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) 30.

Second Reading—Parsons 13.

POISONS BILL. No. 83.

The Lord President.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD Lord President of the Council, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the subject was one of no little difficulty. It was much easier to realize the dangers that arose from the sale of poisons than to devise means for the protection of the public. The present Bill did not profess to provide any complete protection; nor could he say that any amendment of the law, whatever good it might do, would accomplish that object. There had been however, for a long time past a widespread feeling in many quarters that fresh legislation was needed. Many demands had been made on the Government for such legislation, and the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons had addressed them on the subject. Coroners and juries had called the attention of the Home Office to the question. The Home Office had called upon the Privy Council to provide a remedy; hence his appearance in charge of the present Bill. Many of the provisions of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, of the Arsenic Act, and of one or two other Acts, and also of several Acts relating to Ireland, had been incorporated in the Bill. The Bill took the whole subject of poisons out of the Pharmacy Act, leaving that Act to deal solely with pharmacy properly so-called. It also transferred to the Privy Council certain powers and duties which that Act imposed on the Pharmaceutical Society in England. The Pharmaceutical Society was by that Act empowered to make regulations for the dispensing and sale of poisons by chemists and druggists. But the Society had not seen its way since 1868 to exercise that power. The Bill also imposed on the Privy Council the duty of adding, when necessary, to the list of poisons contained in the Schedules to the Bill, which formed the most important part of it. The power now exercisable by the Pharmaceutical Society, with the consent of the Privy Council, was by the Bill vested in the Privy Council itself. Some of the existing precautions were retained in the Bill, and others were enlarged. The Bill proposed five classes of precautions with respect to the sale of poisons. First, all poisons of every class were to be labelled "Poison," and with the name and address of the seller. Secondly, every seller of poisons of a certain class must be a qualified person—a chemist or druggist, or a qualified medical practitioner. This applied whenever the poison was sold, and whether it had a Government stamp on it or not. Thirdly, as to the purchaser of poisons, a new provision was introduced that poisons of a certain class would not be saleable to young persons under 17 years of age, or to persons unknown to the seller, unless introduced by some person known to him. Fourthly, as to the mode of selling poisons, a record would have to be kept of the sale of poisons of a certain class, and the name and address of the purchaser, and other particulars. And, fifthly, those who dispensed and sold poisons would be subject to regulations made by the Privy Council. All these five precautions would apply to the more virulent, and some only would apply to the less virulent poisons. There was also a special provision with respect to arsenic, which now came under the Arsenic Act. Then there was a clause dealing with substances which were not exactly poisons, but were of a more or less dangerous character. Such substances were to be labelled not necessarily with the word "Poison," but with words of caution, such as "To be used with caution." That was a useful provision, because the common and indiscriminate use of the word "Poison" might lead to danger. He then came to the Schedules, which were of the essence of the Bill. That which contained the list of poisons had been prepared with great care by the Medical Adviser of the Privy Council Office, who was Medical Officer to the Local Government Board, and who had had the assistance of a distinguished specialist in this subject. This Schedule was divided into three parts, with which the Bill proposed to deal in three different ways. One part contained the less virulent substances; and this part of the Bill was new, as they had never been dealt with by law at all. It related to certain substances of a dangerous character which were in common use in the arts and for domestic purposes—such, for instance, as carbolic acid, which were included under the scientific names in the Schedule. These the provisions of the Bill required to be labelled "Poison," and to have the name and address of the seller printed on the packet. Another class of poisons, of which laudanum might be taken as the type, was only to be saleable by a qualified chemist or druggist, or by a properly qualified medical practitioner; and in any case it was not to be saleable to any young person, or to some others. The sale of another class of poisons, of which prussic acid might be taken as the type, would, in addition to the conditions imposed on other classes of poisons, be subject to the restrictions that the buyer must be known to the seller, or be introduced by someone known to the seller, and that the whole transaction of the sale must be recorded in the manner prescribed in the Schedule. It was not proposed by the Bill to alter the law with regard to the sale of poisons by wholesale otherwise than to require the packets containing them to be labelled with the word "Poison." As to the so-called "patent medicines," which would be more properly termed "proprietary medicines," the restrictions would apply to them, whether sold under the Government stamp or not. The Government stamp conveyed to the mind of the public a meaning which was not accurate—that was to say, something in the nature of a guarantee for the articles sold, but it implied nothing of the kind, and merely meant that a seller had been paid for the thing sold, and that though it was unfortunate that a medicine a-year was derived from such a source, he must take the facts as he found them, and deal with them as best he could. The Bill did not mention patent medicines, but put them on the same footing as all other medicines. It was supposed that some of these medicines contained a serious amount of poison, such as opium or lead, and the question would be whether the medicine used was beneficial, harmless, or dangerous? The Bill left those who sold these medicines to take the risk of their being poisonous. In the event of such medicines proving poisonous, the seller would be subject to the penalties imposed by the Bill. It was clear that a vast majority of the compounds sold under the name of patent medicines could not be poison, otherwise the population of the country must have considerably diminished. No definition of the word "poisonous" had been laid down in the Bill. It was difficult to define the exact meaning of the word. Dr. Johnson had defined poison as "that which destroys or injures life by a small quantity, and by means not obvious to the senses." That was certainly rather a narrow definition of the word, and could scarcely be introduced into an Act of Parliament. Should any patent medicines prove to be of a poisonous character they would be thereafter excluded from the Schedule of the Bill. They threw the responsibility in the interest of the public on the manufacturer and the seller of these compounds, to take care that they should be so composed as to be safe, and within the meaning of "poisonous" in the Bill. He believed that the new Bill could provide complete protection of the public against all such compounds, and stamped on the heads of those who thought that the Bill would obstruct a necessary improvement in the law, and would give increased protection. He begged leave to the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Carlingford

Moved—That the Bill be read a second time.—The Lord President.

VISCOUNT BATHURST pointed out the necessity of being satisfied with regard to the whole of the circulation of wall paper, strongly and regretted that about 100,000,000 of wall paper had recently been introduced into the country.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper. He said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper. He said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

MR. BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

VISCOUNT BATHURST said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper. He said that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper, but to regulate the sale of medicines, and that the Bill was not intended to regulate the sale of wall paper.

point as to which the Board felt extremely anxious. There was no hospital ward where fever cases, or inflammation of lungs, or such serious diseases could be properly attended to. The medical officers strongly impressed the importance of such provision being made for the sick cadets. As to Woolwich, perhaps, the Report was not so satisfactory. The conduct, discipline, and morale were all excellent, but the Board were struck with the jaded and languid appearance of the cadets. It was felt that Woolwich was not, perhaps, so healthy a residence as Sandhurst, and that might account for the cadets not looking so well, though the official Medical Report was on the whole not unfavourable.

VISCOUNT BURY urged that the dietary should be improved, and that the present system of the parents of the cadets supplementing the dietary arrangements of the College should be rendered unnecessary by the provision of a generous diet, such as the growing lads were accustomed to at their homes. Where the body and mind were hard at work, and the young men were growing, it was essential that the dietary should be good.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was sure it would be satisfactory to the House to hear his noble Friend (Viscount Enfield) give so extremely favourable a report of Sandhurst, and also, with a small exception, as to Woolwich. He believed that what his noble Friend had told the House as to both these Establishments was perfectly true. With regard to the recommendations which were made in the Report of the Board of Visitors at Sandhurst, he might say that all the suggestions had either been attended to or were now being carried out. As to the one matter which required the greatest consideration—namely, the hospital wards, authority had been given to fit out such a ward as was referred to. He hoped that would be done after the Easter Vacation. The suggestions of the Board of Visitors with regard to Sandhurst were being carried out, and especially those with respect to hospital wards. The other recommendations respecting smaller matters would also receive attention. As regarded Woolwich, some complaints had been made by the Board of Visitors with respect to the dietary; a change had been made, and different hours for meals had also been adopted. No complaints had come to his notice with regard to the meals at Sandhurst. He trusted that the changes that had been made would be satisfactory.

VISCOUNT BURY asked whether his noble Friend would take his suggestions into consideration?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, on the part of the Board of Visitors, promised that the noble Viscount's remarks should receive their attention. He might say that at Sandhurst they heard no complaints with respect to the diet; but at Woolwich there were complaints, more especially with regard to the hours, and in a certain degree as to the quality of the provisions. The medical officer thought it his duty to bring these complaints under the notice of the Board.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that complaint was made as to the quantity, not the quality, of the provisions—a more generous diet was required.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES.

NOTICE.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, who had a Notice on the Paper to call attention to the want of organization of the Auxiliary Forces, said, that he did not propose to bring the subject forward on that occasion; but, considering the matter of so much importance, he intended to put in a different form—that of a definite Resolution. He proposed after Easter to move—

“That the present state of the Auxiliary Forces, deficient as they are in the organization and equipment necessary to enable them to take and keep the field, demands the immediate and urgent attention of those who are responsible for their efficiency and the security of the country.”

He would read a telegram which he had just received from a Member of their Lordships' House, than whom no one had done more for the Volunteer Force. The Duke of Westminster telegraphed—

“From equipment and organization of Volunteers. Efforts of 26 years should be made of effect, otherwise absolutely useless, and give air of security terribly false, inviting, possibly, heavy disaster.”

He was sure that everyone who was acquainted with the Volunteer Service would endorse the words of the noble Duke.

VISCOUNT BURY wished to express his pleasure at the fact that the noble Earl intended to bring this subject forward in the form of a substantive Motion. His noble Friend would not stand alone in the matter, but would be backed up by the whole Volunteer Force and the whole Military Force of this country.

Viscount Enfield

LAW AND POLICE—STREET NEWS-VENDORS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DE ROS, in rising to ask, Whether any powers exist for the prevention of persons calling out in the public streets sensational matter which may or may not exist in the newspapers which they offer for sale? said, he had no wish to prevent the free and legitimate circulation of news, especially in these very anxious times, but he thought the way in which news was sometimes communicated ought to be put a stop to. At the present time men and boys were constantly going about the streets shouting out, "Another battle!" "Frightful slaughter!" and such like cries. Sometimes the news was true and sometimes it was not; but he thought some steps should be taken to check the nuisance occasioned. Many of the cries were utterly opposed to all the common dictates of humanity. Only a few weeks ago a report arrived of the death of a gallant General Officer who was killed in action. It was only through the considerate intervention of a private friend that this was not communicated to the unfortunate wife of the General through the shouts of the newsvendors in the streets. Without entering into the matter, he might mention the case of a certain Member of their Lordships' House who, on finding that a newsvendor was calling out something that did not appear in the papers, proceeded against the man in the Police Court and had him punished by the magistrate.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he believed there was no Act of Parliament restricting or prohibiting street cries, for the purpose of selling newspapers, and the Home Secretary did not consider that any fresh legislation on the subject was advisable. If newspapers were sold purporting to contain news which they did not contain, that would constitute an indictable offence, and the person selling the papers could be prosecuted for obtaining money by false pretences. He was not, however, aware of the existence of any general provision for preventing news, whether true or false, from being cried in the streets.

VISCOUNT BURY asked if the noble Earl was quite sure that no Acts of Parliament existed dealing with street cries?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that his reply referred only to the announcement of news, whether true or false.

ARMY (RESERVE).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF DUFF, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return of the number of First Class Army Reserve men in each regimental district who have been registered as desirous of civil employment in accordance with General Order 79, of June 1884.

He said, that some organization was required for bringing these men into contact with employers of labour. It would be a proper supplement to the county regimental system. By means of such a Return as that for which he now moved they would be able to see whether the proportion of men who had placed themselves on the register bore any reasonable proportion to the number of Reserve men belonging to that depot or centre. If the proportion was not a reasonable one, then they might assume that there was some definite reason for the failure of the scheme. In conclusion, he begged to move for the Return of which he had given Notice.

Address for—

"Return of the number of First Class Army Reserve men in each regimental district who have been registered as desirous of civil employment in accordance with General Order 79, of June 1884"—The Earl of Duff.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that he had not the slightest objection to giving the Return asked for, and he was glad to take this opportunity of calling attention to facts of considerable importance to the Army and to the country at large. He could not at the present time give the number of men whose names had been entered on the register for civil employment. He was afraid, however, that the number at the end of last year had not been large; in fact, it had been considerably smaller than he had hoped would be the case in comparison with the number of men who had left the Colours. This scheme, however, was entirely a new departure, the order laid down for establishing this register of employment having only been issued last June, and, as in all other professions, it was some time before a measure of this kind became known. He had no reason to suppose that there was any suspicion as to the register; but if it were so, experience would remove this. He proposed to give this Return as accurately as he could up to the end of the present month. He would point out how important it was with regard to an organization such as this that the officers commanding the dépôt centres should be brought into contact with the employers of labour, great or small. It was impossible to do so without civil co-operation. It would be of enormous use to the Army, and would remove prejudices still lingering in the minds of some with regard to joining the Colours, if there were a tolerable certainty that a man with good character would, on return from the Colours, be nearly sure of obtaining civil employment.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he quite agreed with the noble Earl as to the advantage of some such organization. It was, however, a curious thing that the men themselves had failed to take advantage of the existing arrangement. One of the officers connected with headquarters had told him that in the central register there were extremely few names put down last year on the register as wanting employment. There seemed to be considerable exaggeration as to the number of Reserve men without employment, and he believed that it was the fact that a good Reserve man could always command employment. Of course, all Reserve men were not of equally good character, and the mere fact of being a Reserve man would not obtain a man employment. He thought that it was inadvisable that any exaggeration should be allowed to go abroad as to a number of Reserve men wandering about the country without employment.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM observed, that in his county there had been only two or three Reserve men last year wishing for employment who had not obtained it.

THE EARL OF DUCIE said, he wished to express his satisfaction with regard to the tone of the discussion which had taken place.

Motion agreed to.

The Earl of Morley

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENT.

RESOLUTION.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, who had the following Notice on the Paper:—

“To resolve That considering the loss of life and treasure that has been incurred by this country in Egypt, any arrangements with the Powers, either political or financial, which may tend to impair or diminish the influence of England in the administration of that country, such as the acceptance of any form of loan to the Egyptian Treasury under a joint guarantee of the Powers, would be unacceptable to this House,” said, that although they were expecting Papers on the subject, upon which there would be a full discussion in their Lordships' House, it still appeared to him that there were certain features connected with the financial arrangements in regard to Egypt upon which a few preliminary remarks might with advantage be made. The discussion had been too long deferred, and it seemed to him that all they had now to expect was not only a foregone conclusion but an arrangement of a disastrous nature. At the time when the Dual Control had been established, the peculiar circumstances which had arisen in Egypt had rendered it necessary to make some arrangement for the financial condition of Egypt. He thought he might say that, although the Dual Control had been fortuitous in its origin, in the opinion of many persons who understood the subject, it had been extremely successful in many of its objects. Egypt was not a country isolated like Turkey from European affairs, but one possessing every species of interest and trade of every description. By the abolition of that Dual Control they had alienated France and given a stimulus to Prince Bismarck to adopt a European policy which was likely to bring about considerable difficulties. The late M. Gambetta was a firm believer in an alliance between England and France on Egyptian affairs, and it was at his desire that the Joint Note was addressed to Egypt by those two Powers. That Note meant that England and France were trustees for the arrangement between the European Powers and the Khedive, and that M. Gambetta would put his foot down and maintain that arrangement. But M. Gambetta went out of Office and was succeeded by M. de Freycinet, who reversed the policy of his Predecessor. Things were then allowed to drift until the mutiny of the Egyptian Colonels broke out. Then a Conference was held; and, during the middle of its deliberations, to the astonishment of Europe as well as of the Liberal Party in England, Mr. Gladstone's Government decided to bombard Alexandria. He did not say that that bombardment was not forced upon them; but France refused to join with them in the enterprize which resulted in the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. The abolition of the Dual Control dated from the time when the Khedive, at the instigation of Her Majesty's Government, issued a Decree annulling that Control; and from that moment they alienated the sympathies of the French people, which had hitherto been with them in their operations in Egypt. The French people became fully alive to the mistake made by M. de Freycinet, which they felt practically threw Egypt into the hands of England. They might have been prepared for the abolition of the Dual Control, but they were not prepared to accept the way in which it was effected, still less to accept the doctrine of repudiation which was afterwards proclaimed. He would not dwell on the series of disasters which ended in the betrayal and death of our hero and Envoy. Her Majesty's Government had wasted their treasure and sacrificed the lives of their fellow-countrymen, and they were going to impose enormous burdens on the British taxpayers; and in return they had gained nothing but discredit abroad and the disapproval of the English people. The financial arrangements now contemplated would, he believed, be looked upon as the culmination of that history of disgrace. From the day that they made themselves the patron of the Khedive, both in the eyes of the Mussulman and the European world, they became responsible for the whole administration of Egypt. But it had been the object of Her Majesty's Ministers to hold out to the European Powers that the Khedive was acting on his own initiative, and was not necessarily inspired by the British Government. The policy which allowed matters in the Soudan to drift from the date of the disaster to Hicks Pasha's Army down to the death of General Gordon was the same as that which had allowed affairs in Egypt Proper to drift from the disregard of the claims of the sufferers in Alexandria down to the hopeless surrender of all the positions that they originally took up. If the Government had really understood and recognized the responsibility they were undertaking when they sent Lord Dufferin on his mission to Egypt, they would have instructed him to advise the Khedive to issue some formal Decree or assurance that the foreign bondholders' claims would be met. Their Lordships would remember that during the last two years the Radical Press and Radical orators had expatiated on the rapacity of the bondholders and the unfortunate condition of the fellahs. But the folly of the Government had been shown in lending a ready ear to the cry of that Party. They were ready to assent to the abolition of the Law of Liquidation. So long as the Dual Control lasted they had the sympathy of the French people, who were prepared to work with them so long as they considered them their co-trustees. Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to go to the logical result which the abolition of the Dual Control involved—they were not prepared to annex Egypt, nor to propose any scheme for remodelling the National Debt of Egypt under the guarantee of the British Government at a reduced rate of interest, thereby relieving the Revenue from the difficulty in which it was placed. Her Majesty's Government said they would not undertake the responsibility of managing the finances of Egypt, but they would try by diplomatic means to induce the Powers to consent to some modified scheme of liquidation. With that view they proposed a Conference; and their Lordships knew what took place during that Conference. Their Lordships were debarred from discussing the question, on the ground that it would be extremely inopportune and inconvenient for them to do so pending its deliberations, and, owing to the late period of the Session, no opportunity afterwards presented itself for raising such a discussion. The Conference came to an untimely end, and nothing could be more instructive than to read the paragraphs of the Protocol indicating what passed between the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary and M. Waddington. If the Government had accepted the method suggested by the First Lord of the Admiralty, they would have been in a better position than that which they now occupied. The character of Lord Northbrook's Report was well known. The Government had stated that Egypt was not able to pay its debts. The Powers thought she could. But it was said that Lord Northbrook advised no reduction of the claims of the bondholders. That view was displeasing to the Government.

EARL GRANVILLE: May I ask the noble Duke whence he has derived all this intimate knowledge of these affairs?

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that if the noble Earl had read the public papers, especially The Times, he would see that what he had said was substantially accurate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had yesterday stated that it was proposed that the loan should be subject to an International Guarantee. The right hon. Gentleman said that we had not asked for such a Guarantee, and that no right of interference with our administration was granted thereby to the Powers. He could not understand what the Guarantee meant, unless it meant that we had, immediately after Tel-el-Kebir, taken up a strong position and undertaken to deal with not only the military, but also the political and financial position. But ever since that period we had practically done nothing at all. We had abandoned one position after another. What was the sacrifice asked in the new proposals from the bondholders? It was only 5 per cent reduction for two years, and that was to be paid back if there was a surplus. But that concession only amounted to £200,000 a-year. Was it worth while to make an alteration in the Law of Liquidation for so small an advantage? Then there was to be a suspension of the Sinking Fund. But by good administration, by taxing the notables, and other means, sufficient might be raised to make up that advantage. Notwithstanding all the sacrifices we had made, we should get nothing out of them, and had in the meantime covered ourselves with indelible disgrace. What would be the feeling of our Administrators in Egypt when they saw themselves placed in a subsidiary position to other Powers; what would be the feeling of the English people when they saw their Army of Occupation doing the work of bum-bailiffs

—when we were obliged to use the kourbash on people whom the Prime Minister had stated to be overtaxed; what would be the feeling of our soldiers who would have to fight a campaign next autumn, of the British taxpayer, of those who had lost their relatives in that unhappy war, when England woke up and realized that the Government had abandoned every advantage, receded from every position, and landed the country in disgrace, as regarded not only the past but the future also?

Moved to resolve "That considering the loss of life and treasure that has been incurred by this country in Egypt, any arrangements with the Powers, either political or financial, which may tend to impair or diminish the influence of England in the administration of that country, such as the acceptance of any form of loan to the Egyptian Treasury under a joint guarantee of the Powers, would be unacceptable to this House."—(The Duke of Marlborough.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I own that when I came down to this House I did not expect the noble Duke to go on with his Motion. The Motion implies a Vote of Censure, to a certain degree of a hypothetical character. I hope the noble Duke will not think it want of courtesy, or want of appreciation of the ability with which he has stated his own views, that I do not think it desirable that I should give an answer to the noble Duke. At our last meeting the noble Marquess asked how far we had arrived at an agreement with the other Powers on this question. I stated that a preliminary Declaration had been signed on that day, and that we expected to sign the Articles of Convention yesterday. The noble Marquess very properly requested an early distribution of Papers. I met that with the assurance that they should be distributed as soon as possible. I laid some Papers on the Table to-day. I believe other Papers will be presented almost immediately. The Declaration and Convention will be distributed to your Lordships to-morrow, and other Papers at the end of this week or certainly at the beginning of the next. In these circumstances, I think it is most unusual to proceed with a Vote of Censure on the Government. I do not say it is unfair to myself and my Colleagues, who would have rather an advantage, as we should argue having a knowledge of these Papers, of which your Lordships are perfectly ignorant. I think it unfair to the noble Duke himself, who has made a Motion entirely directed against an International Guarantee of the loan, the proposition contained in which I think I shall be able entirely to controvert. The noble Duke's speech has ranged all over the Egyptian history — what Mr. Gladstone said about the Dual Control, the bombardment of Alexandria, and all the subjects which have been so often discussed. He has said hardly one sentence in regard to the Vote of Censure which he has presented. I rather think, on his own authority. Therefore, I must beg to be excused from discussing his Motion at this moment; but I wish your Lordships to understand that we are most ready to meet the discussion which the noble Marquess has promised shall come on at an early day.

The Duke of Marlborough

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs having announced that the Papers with reference to Egypt will be distributed at an early date, it is undoubtedly more in accordance with our practice and obviously more convenient that we should not now go fully into the circumstances to which those Papers refer. I, however, understood the noble Duke in the course of his speech to say he did not consider that this was to be a conclusive discussion of the matter, but that he rather wished to dispose of the preliminary chapter of this long and complicated history, with the view of dealing with the precise matter of his Motion on a future occasion. I do not know the views of the noble Duke, but I should not recommend him to press his Motion on the present occasion. It is obviously almost impossible for us to deal with the character of the engagements entered into by the noble Earl till the precise words of them are before us. I do not agree with the noble Earl that the noble Duke has repeated all the charges made against Her Majesty's Government, because in many respects I thought the noble Duke showed greater knowledge of the subject than has been shown before by others, and that he opened up in some respects new fields of discussion, especially in regard to the question how far the attitude of this country towards France has been affected by the policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued since the Egyptian Question arose. This is a very interesting question, and I believe that although there are very obvious grounds for reticence it has never been dealt with so thoroughly as other parts of the Egyptian Question. But I quite agree with the noble Earl that this and all other matters had better be deferred to a period when we shall have the Papers in our hands and are able to express an opinion upon them. I heard with some dismay — if I may make use of so irregular an observation — that this matter is to be discussed in the other House of Parliament almost immediately. I could have hoped that we should have some time to consider the matter before dealing with it; and I think there is an additional ground for claiming such indulgence on the part of the Government, as it has not been owing to any lack of ours that a discussion did not take place at an earlier period, but rather it was owing to one of the most remarkable scenes in Parliamentary history; and I would invoke the presiding genius of Mr. Gough to act again on the feelings of Her Majesty's Government and to urge them not to press forward this important and difficult question for discussion at too early a period, as this is one of the most momentous questions which has occupied the attention of Parliament for many years.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, having asked the noble Earl whether he would place on the Table full details of the Report made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, intimated his willingness to withdraw the Motion.

Motion by leave of the House) withdrawn.

SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL. II L.]

A Bill to amend the Acts for abating the nuisance arising from the smoke of furnaces and fireplaces within the Metropolis — Was presented by The Lord STRATHMORE and CAMPBELL, read 1^o. (No 30.)

House adjourned at a quarter past six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 19th March, 1885.

MINUTES.] — SELECT COMMITTEE — Miscellaneous and other Services, appointed.

SUPPLY — considered in Committee — ARMY ESTIMATES (NUMBERS).

Resolutions [March 16] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—£2,130,084 5s. 7d., Consolidated Fund; £10,804,750, Consolidated Fund.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—East India (Loan).

Resolutions [March 18] reported—Ordered—First Reading—Cape of Good Hope (Advance)* [101].

Ordered—First Reading—Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Order* [100]; Church Boards* [102].

QUESTIONS.

—o—

PARLIAMENT—QUESTIONS — ORDER—THE NEWSPAPER PRESS—OFFENSIVE CARTOONS.

MR. BERESFORD: I beg to give Notice that on to-morrow I shall ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the attention of the Government has been called to a most scandalous cartoon representing the death of Earl Spencer issued with the last edition of United Ireland; whether he does not consider cartoons such as that a direct incentive to outrage; and, also, whether the proprietors of that journal are not Members of the House of Commons; and, if steps will not be taken to prevent outrageous and cowardly attacks of this kind upon Her Majesty's Representatives in Ireland?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I beg to give Notice, that when the hon. Member puts his Question, I will ask whether the cartoon does not represent the political death of Earl Spencer?

MR. SEXTON: On a point of Order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you whether the Notice given by the hon. Member for Armagh can appear upon the Notice Paper in that form; and, whether it does not doubly violate the Rules by applying the terms "outrageous and cowardly" to Members of this House; and, also, whether it is not out of Order in expressing an opinion?

MR. SPEAKER: The Notice given by the hon. Member will be revised and put into a proper shape before it appears on the Paper.

MR. BERESFORD: Shall I be in Order, Sir, in submitting the cartoon at the same time as my Question, especially for your consideration?

MINES, &c.—THE DOROTHEA SLATE QUARRY (NANTLLE).

MR. JONES-PARRY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Inspector of Mines for North Wales has reported as to the causes producing, or to which may be referable, the recent floodings and loss of life at the Dorothea slate quarry, Nantlle, and the Llanengan mine, and as to the condition of those quarries and workings, and whether he will supply a Copy of that Report; and, whether he will appoint for North Wales an inspector of mines, or a sub-inspector to the inspector of mines, eminently competent to inspect and direct the working of quarries as distinct from mines, and with special regard to the safety and protection of the workmen?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to say that the matter referred to in the Question had been often considered, and it was not thought expedient to place the mines under Home Office inspection.

MR. JONES-PARRY gave Notice that he would bring the matter before the attention of the House.

INDIA—THE BENGAL SETTLEMENT, 1793.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will cause to be presented to the House as brief a memorandum as the subject will allow, showing the main heads of the arrangements connected with the permanent settlement of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, entered into in 1793, so as to bring out the nature and extent of the promises made by Government to protect the rights of cultivators, and how far these promises have since 1793 been fulfilled or left unfulfilled; also the money settlements between the Zemindars and the Government, as to the ratio of the sums collected from the cultivators to be paid to the Government, and the amount and the ratio to be retained by the Zemindar, with estimates of the then total revenue likely to be realised, and contrasting these estimates with those of modern times so as to show the differences; further, information to be supplied, regarding all public works obligatory to be executed by the Zemindars, and how far these obligations have been fulfilled and works of a character beneficial to the cultivator have been carried out or neglected; the land rates levied from cultivators at the time of the settlement, as far as these can be ascertained, to be contrasted with the existing rates and with the land rates levied in other parts of India; and, generally, any other information which will make the permanent settlement as clear as it can be made, such as the areas of land cultivated formerly and at present, and uncultivated; the areas of Madras and North West Provinces with their land revenues to be shown in contrast with the area and land revenue under the permanent settlement?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: After considering very fully the possibility of presenting to the House such a Memorandum as that indicated by my hon. and gallant Friend, it seems that, however interesting and instructive such a document might be, it would necessarily be of so controversial a nature as to be valueless, except as being the expression of the opinion of the person who had compiled it. In connection with the Bengal Tenancy Act, the India Office has received about 5,000 pages of printed matter, a selection from which will be presented. These Papers will, I hope, place hon. Members in possession of much of the information asked for by the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardine.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)—SURPLUS FROM HERRING BRANDING.

Sir ALEXANDER GORDON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any prospect of the Government placing at the disposal of the Scotch Fishery Board this year the £31,000 surplus brand fees, which the Treasury have received from Scotch herring curers since 1860, in excess of the actual expense incurred by Government for imposing the brand?

Mr. HIBBERT: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I can only say that I have no power to place at the disposal of the Scotch Fishery Board any moneys other than those appropriated for the service of that Board by Parliament. I have altogether failed to verify the figure of £31,000 which he has given; but, whether the real amount of the surplus in 25 years be more or less, this will not affect my answer.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART — THE NATIONAL GALLERY — PURCHASE OF PICTURES.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is true that, consequent on the recent purchase of pictures from the Blenheim Collection, the customary annual grant to the National Gallery is to remain suspended for a term of years; and, if so, whether the Trustees of the National Gallery have addressed any representation on the subject to the Treasury; and, in the event of any such Correspondence having passed, whether there would be any objection to laying the same upon the Table of the House?

Mr. HIBBERT: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that, as in the case of the purchase of the Peel Collection, we have come to the conclusion that we should not be justified in including any sum for the purchase of pictures in the Estimate for the National Gallery for some time to come, in consequence of the magnitude of the grant recently sanctioned by this House for the purchase of pictures from the Blenheim Collection. But in making this decision known to the Trustees of the National Gallery, we added that, if any exceptionally advantageous opportunity should arise of acquiring works of a representative character, and of a school or period of which examples are wanted in the Gallery, we should be prepared to give immediate consideration to any proposal which they might submit to us. The Trustees have been in communication with my right hon. Friend on the subject, and he has told them that the time has not yet arrived for any reconsideration of this decision; but if they wish to discuss the question when the Estimate for next year is about to be settled, he will be happy to confer with them. At present, we see no reason for publishing this Correspondence. So far as finance is concerned, the Trustees are in the position of a department subordinate to the Treasury.

LORD JOHN MANNERS wished to know what was intended by the expression, "for some time to come?"

MR. HIBBERT said, he supposed that it meant until the amount was run off—the amount usually allowed to the National Gallery for the purchase of pictures.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked whether he was to understand that some eight years were to elapse before Parliament would be requested to vote another contribution to the National Gallery?

MR. HIBBERT said, the noble Lord would see by the answer he had given that the matter had been very much qualified.

EGYPT—HIRED TRANSPORTS—THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the fact that the Transport Department have lately chartered vessels for the conveyance of navvies and other passengers to be employed on the projected railway from Suakin to Berber, and that such vessels are not certificated as passenger ships by the Board of Trade; and, if so, why the Law with regard to ships carrying passengers has not been complied with in this case; and, whether he will place upon the Table of the House a copy of the rules which shipowners are supposed to comply with before their vessels can be placed upon the Admiralty list for the purposes of transport?

MR. CAINE: The Transport Department have lately chartered five transports, in which navvies and other passengers have been, or are about to be, conveyed. Two of them are passenger ships under the Passenger Act, 18 and 19 Vict. c. 119, the others are not passenger ships under the meaning of that Act, which exempts from its operations "ships in the service of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral." All these ships, whether passenger ships or not, have been duly surveyed and passed by the Surveying and Engineer officers employed by the Transport Department. There is no Admiralty list for the purposes of transport. The only Admiralty list is that prepared by the Controller of the Navy for other purposes.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE WIVES OF MARINES SERVING IN THE SOUDAN.

SIR JOHN HAY (for Lord HENRY LENNOX) asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the wives of those serving in the Naval Brigade, including Marine Artillery and Marines, now incorporated in General Graham's Army in the Soudan, are not entitled to the increase of 8*d.* per diem which has been sanctioned in the case of the wives of soldiers serving there; and, whether he will do his best to redress this grievance?

MR. CAINE: The allowance of 8*d.* a-day, known as separation allowance, which is granted to the wives of soldiers, is not payable to seamen's wives, the conditions of service being different; neither is this allowance payable to the wives of Marines when serving under Naval regulations, but both seamen and Marines receive field allowance of 6*d.* a-day, which is not granted in the Army. The Marines serving in Egypt might be placed under Army regulations; but, on the whole, the Naval regulations are the more favourable to them.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DISORDERLY LANGUAGE—CASE OF GEORGE BARKER, CLIFFONEY, CO. SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, With regard to the case against George Barker, to be heard to-morrow at Cliffoney (county Sligo) Petty Sessions, whether the Government are aware that Barker is gamekeeper to a local landlord, and that he is in the habit of shooting and fishing in company with the local stipendiary magistrate; and, whether, with a view to an impartial trial, a stipendiary magistrate from another district will be sent to hear the case, and the local landlords in the Commission of the Peace will be requested not to adjudicate upon it?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I understand that Mr. Maloney, the Resident Magistrate, occasionally shoots with the gentleman in whose employment Barker is; but he informs me that he has never shot or fished with Barker alone. Mr. Maloney's duties require his presence at another Petty Sessions to-morrow, and Mr. Turner, R.M., will take his place at Grange Petty Sessions.

The Government have no power to order the local magistrates not to attend.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—KILDARE AND CLARE COUNTIES.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Who were the gentlemen lately recommended by the Athy (Kildare) and Killadysert (Clare) Boards of Guardians for appointment to the Commission of the Peace; whether the Lieutenant of either county supported, in any case, the recommendation of the guardians; and, if not, whether either the Lieutenant of Kildare or the Lieutenant of Clare communicated to the Lord Chancellor or to the Board of Guardians any reason for the refusal; whether the Lord Chancellor appointed any of the gentlemen recommended by the Boards in question; and, whether the intimation in his secretary's letter of the 10th instant, to the Killadysert Board, that, "in the absence of any recommendation from the Lord Lieutenant of the county," he rejected the application of the guardians, is to be regarded as conveying that the repeated declarations by the Government of the determination to appoint suitable persons, in the absence of recommendations from Lieutenants of counties, has no effective force?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must decline to state the names of persons who have not been appointed to the Commission of the Peace. It is true that the Lord Chancellor, acting not only on the opinion of the Lieutenants of the two counties but on his own judgment, has not seen his way to appoint the gentlemen recommended by these two Boards, but he has no intention of departing from the declarations which have been made on this subject.

THE MAGISTRACY (SCOTLAND)—MR. WILLIAM IVORY, SHERIFF OF INVERNESS-SHIRE.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to a letter of the Rev. Donald McCullum, of Waternish, in The Oban Times of the 7th ult., charging Mr. W. Ivory, Sheriff of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn, with having, on the 28th of January last, at Glendale, in the presence of a crowd of people, used unbecoming language of a threatening and provocative character; and, whether the Government have made any inquiry to ascertain if Sheriff Ivory acted as described?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, he had answered a Question almost identical with this some time ago, and he explained at that time that the Government had had a Report from the Sheriff in regard to this matter.

Mr. SEXTON asked whether five men had not made statutory declarations before Mr. M'Leod, a Justice of the Peace, charging this Sheriff with having publicly used threatening and blasphemous language; and, if so, would that alter the right hon. and learned Gentleman's views on the matter?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) replied, that he was not aware that that was so. He had had no intimation.

Mr. SEXTON said, he had the declarations, and would show them to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, he asked the previous Question to which the Lord Advocate referred. Had any inquiry been made as to the truth of the allegations?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) replied, that they had the statement of the letter in the newspapers on the one hand, and on the other the statement in the Sheriff's Report.

PUBLIC HEALTH—THE CONDITION OF THE UPPER THAMES.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any action is contemplated, in view of the deputation from the Local Board of Twickenham, which recently waited upon him to call attention to the condition of the Thames between Richmond and Isleworth?

Mr. H. H. FOWLER, in reply, said, there was some conflict as to who was the responsible Authority in this matter; whether it was the Metropolitan Board of Works, which deposited the sewage, or the Thames Conservancy, who ought to have taken the mud resulting from the sewage away; and there was also some doubt as to what were the powers of the Secretary of State as to one or both of these Bodies. The matter was receiving the careful attention of the Home Office, which was doing all it could to remedy what he must call the very disgraceful state of the Thames at that point.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS— RETIREMENTS.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that numbers of collectors, supervisors, and officers of Inland Revenue, in various parts of the United Kingdom, have been called upon to retire on attaining forty years' service, or thereabouts; whether some of the chief officials at Somerset House who have to deal with such compulsory retirements are older men, with from forty-one to forty-seven years' service; and, whether steps will be taken to apply the same rule of compulsory retirement to all officials?

Mr. HIBBERT: The Board of Inland Revenue, having regard to the age and efficiency of the officers under their control, have, under certain conditions, called on some of those who have reached the age of 65 years with over 40 years' service to retire. None of the chief officials at Somerset House fall within similar conditions.

POST OFFICE—MONEY ORDER OFFICE —PROMOTION.

Mr. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the long-continued stagnation of promotion in the Money Order Office; whether that is mainly caused by the transfer of a good deal of the "Money Order" business to the "Postal Order" Department, dealt with by a newly-created staff; whether since April 1873, that is, for nearly twelve years, there have been only two promotions from second to first class clerkships; and, whether, if this is so, as the clerks claim to be servants of the General Post Office and Civil Service generally, and not of a department, he will see that steps are now taken to secure to the officers of the Money Order Office the maintenance of the prospects with which they entered the service by giving them, if necessary, an adequate share of promotion outside their own department?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: It is true that but few vacancies have occurred in the upper ranks of the Money Order Office in recent years, and, consequently, the promotion has not been rapid. The number of clerkships in the upper ranks has not been reduced since the introduction of the postal-order system, and, therefore, the stagnation of promotion is in no way due to that measure. I have endeavoured to meet the case to some extent by granting appointments to other branches of the Post Office Service; but I will not pledge myself to follow that course in future, although I may, perhaps, do so.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—SALA- RIES OF ATTENDANTS.

Mr. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Executive has taken into consideration the claims of the attendants in the Irish Lunatic Asylums to be placed in a better position with regard to salary and superannuation, so as to be nearer to an equality in these respects with the attendants in the English Asylums; whether the Boards of Governors of several of the Irish Asylums have recently passed resolutions strongly recommending the case of the attendants to the attention of the Executive; and, what course he is prepared to take.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member put a very similar Question to my right hon. Predecessor in May last year. I can only repeat that the attendants in the district lunatic asylums in Ireland are the servants of the respective Boards of Governors, and that any recommendations which any of the Boards make in favour of increase of salary to members of their staff have always received and will continue to receive the most careful consideration of the Government. As regards pensions, they are given by the Boards of Governors, with the concurrence of the Inspectors, on the principles of the Superannuation Act of 1859, which, I understand, receive a very liberal construction in their application to the cases of officers and servants in lunatic asylums?

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—NON-RESIDENT ELECTORS.

Mr. P. J. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, at elections of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland, directions by non-resident electors to have voting papers left for them in certain houses must be signed by the voters themselves, or how otherwise; and, whether voters resident in the division can direct voting papers for themselves to be left at houses other than those in which the voters reside, or than those for which they are rated?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The usual and most accurate way for a non-resident voter to signify his wishes is to do so in writing; but if the direction is conveyed to the Returning Officer in any other way, he might act on it if satisfied that the communication correctly described the voter's wishes and instructions. The papers for resident voters can only be left at their residences.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—LEGAL ADVICE.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, taking into consideration that in most cases the persons nominated for the office of Poor Law Guardian in Ireland and their nominators are utterly ignorant of matters of Law, he, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, will take care that they shall not, at the scrutiny of votes, be deprived of the presence and advice of their legal advisers, in order to support their rights; and, whether, as it is impossible to sufficiently inspect at the scrutiny the statements of claims lodged by owners, which are very long and contain complicated details, he will direct the returning officers to give, before the scrutiny, reasonable facilities to candidates and their legal advisers to ascertain the correctness of these statements of claim?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have nothing to add to the answers I have already given to similar Questions recently.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRAWLING—REPORT—LEGISLATION

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government intends to bring in a Bill, this Session, to give effect to the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Trawling?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): Yes, it is intended to introduce such a Bill.

REGISTRATION ACTS CONSOLIDATION LEGISLATION

MR. E. STANHOPE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he will consider the possibility of preparing a Registration Bill consolidating existing legislation on the subject, into which the provisions of the new Registration (Occupation Voters) Bill could be incorporated immediately after it has passed through Parliament, in order that, at the approaching registration, the very numerous officials who will, for the first time, have to put in force provisions of a complicated character, may have the law upon the subject before them in a compact and intelligible form?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that the Government had already considered the best means, with respect to this very difficult question, of dealing with registration, and they had come to the conclusion that it would be scarcely worth while or practically expedient to consolidate all the Acts under the circumstances mentioned in the Question.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would see that some abstracts of the Acts were made, such as had been done in a somewhat similar case by the President of the Local Government Board?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that the precepts they were bound to issue would very much assist the action of the overseers.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman would take counsel with the President of the Local Government Board, he would find what very useful directions might be issued.

ARMY—THE ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE, WOOLWICH—GENTLEMEN CADETS—MEAL TIMES

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has made further inquiry, and has satisfied himself that there is an interval of 6 hours and 20 minutes, from 7.55 a.m. to 2.15 p.m., between the breakfast and luncheon of the gentleman cadets at Woolwich; and, whether he will either cause that interval to be shortened, or direct that a small intermediate meal be furnished to the cadets, with time for partaking of it?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: As I stated the other day, I have been making inquiries, and when I receive the replies no time will be lost in coming to a decision.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that numerous regiments of Volunteers have applied for leave to increase their strength; and, if so, whether he will state the number of applications received, and the grounds upon which their proposals were declined?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Thirty-four Volunteer corps have applied for an increased establishment. Of these applications, 16 were granted and 18 refused, some on military and some on financial grounds. Each case was considered on its merits.

THE ASSAY OFFICE, EXETER.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is not the fact that the Assay Office at Exeter, for the purpose of marking manufactured plate, has not been long shut up, to the great inconvenience of silver and goldsmiths in the West of England; and, whether he will take steps to obviate the inconvenience and loss which ensues from the present state of things?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the Assay Office at Exeter was discontinued in July, 1883, in consequence of the small amount of plate which was sent there to be assayed and marked. Nearly the whole of the plate assayed at that office in 1882 and up to July, 1883, was sent in by a Bristol firm, and when they transferred their business to London the necessity for continuing the office at Exeter ceased to exist. The Company, therefore, passed a resolution to close the office, as they considered that the expenses of keeping it up would not be covered by the fees. I find it hard to believe that the business of goldsmiths and silversmiths in the West of England should have so considerably increased since the Exeter office was closed as to give cause for the complaint of loss and inconvenience to the trade.

Sir Henry Tyler

LICENSING ACT (1872)—THE MAGISTRATES.

MR. JACKSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a recent case before the Leeds Borough Justices, in which a licensed publican was fined; whether two justices had to retire from the Bench owing to their disqualification under the sixtieth section of the Licensing Act, 1872, leaving the case to be tried by two well-known temperance advocates; and, whether he is prepared to recommend an amendment of that section of the Licensing Act, so that a justice shall not be disqualified by reason of his being a shareholder in a Railway Company which may have a hotel or refreshment room within the district for which he sits as a magistrate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have seen the account of the case to which the hon. Member refers. It seems to me to be a case in which a man was proceeded against for allowing gaming in a public-house. Two of the Justices, who are described in the papers as connected with the wholesale liquor trade, retired from the Bench, and very properly so, during the hearing. The case, I understand, is under appeal, and I see no ground for interfering.

In reply to a further Question,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said: I know nothing of the case except from the papers which the hon. Member himself sent me, in which the case is described. The paper the hon. Member sent me says—

"Before the hearing of the case, Messrs. Ewing and Walker were requested to retire from the Bench, it being considered that because they are, or had been, in some remote way or other connected with the wholesale liquor trade, they were not in a position to exercise an impartial judgment."

That is all I know.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT—MR. POSNETT, OFFICIAL ARBITRATOR.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr.

Poanett, the arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board in Ireland to value plots of land taken under the Labourers (Ireland) Act, has received his fee and expenses from the Guardians of the Kilmallock Union over a month since, to arbitrate in that Union, and that he has not yet taken any steps in the matter; whether this same arbitrator held an inquiry in the Limerick Union over a month since, on which occasion he promised to furnish the Guardians with the report of his arbitration in ten days, but which report has not yet reached the Guardians; and, whether he will take any steps to insist on the arbitrators doing their part of the work at once, so that the labourers throughout the country may get the plots in time to sow a crop in the land this spring?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As Arbitrators under the Labourers Act are appointed by the Board of Works, this Question would have been more properly addressed to my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. I understand, however, that the 1st of May has been fixed by the Arbitrator and the Clerk of the Union for holding the Kilmallock inquiry. The Arbitrator has not received, and cannot receive, any fees until his final award is sent in. As regards Limerick, I am informed that the Arbitrator's award has been furnished, and that in every case where the Guardians wished it he has granted certificates to take up the sites. The Act of Parliament requires notice to be given of inquiries; but Mr. Poanett states that in no instance has there been any unnecessary delay on his part.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked, was the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Kilmallock Guardians had paid £50 expenses some time ago, but that the inquiry had not yet been held?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I regret the delay; but I am informed on Mr. Poanett's part that he has not yet received the money.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any means can be employed to expedite the passage of the Labourers Bill? He knows as well as I do that it is greatly desired by the people. He could suggest action on this question by which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) might stop Supply in order to allow the Bill to be passed for one or two nights.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think I could act on the suggestion for some weeks. Just now there is little or no chance of doing anything of that sort.

POLICE EXPENSES (IRELAND)—INCIDENCE OF COST.

Mr. SMALL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a large number of police was on Sunday the 1st March brought from various parts of the county of Down to Newcastle and Ballynahinch, under the command of several resident magistrates, and kept there under arms a considerable time; whether he can state what number of men, resident magistrates, &c. were engaged in this expedition, the purpose for which they were brought, and at whose instigation; whether the entire district was not very quiet on the Sunday in question; and, whether it is intended to levy the expenses of the expedition off a district in which there was no necessity for it, or in what other manner?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The police were assembled on the requisition of local magistrates in view of an apprehended disturbance. They were all of the county force, and any extra expense involved will therefore fall on the Constabulary Vote.

ARMY—THE STAFF COLLEGE

Colonel MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, What opportunities, if any, exist at the Staff College for officers to be instructed in modern Oriental languages, and if it is proposed to modify existing arrangements so as to increase facilities in that direction?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No opportunities exist at the Staff College for officers to be instructed in modern Oriental languages. The time of officers while at the Staff College should be devoted exclusively to military studies. It is not, therefore, proposed to modify existing arrangements in this respect. The general question whether some encouragement should be given to officers to study Oriental and other modern languages is under consideration.

LUNACY LEGISLATION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the promised Lunacy Bill will be introduced in the House of Lords?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there were a good many details to be settled in connection with the Lunacy Bill; but he hoped the measure would soon be introduced by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL—REPRESENTATION OF MINORITIES.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, If the Seats Bill contains adequate provision for the representation of the two million of the Irish minority in England; if not, whether he will consent to such modification of the boundaries in the centres containing a large Irish population as will give this adequate representation?

MR. BRODRICK: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question I will ask whether such a Bill would contain adequate provision for the representation of the 1,500,000 Protestants in Ireland, and, if not, whether the right hon. Gentleman would consent to such a rectification of boundaries as would secure such provision?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can hardly reply to the last Question except by saying that I cannot enter into argumentative matter. With regard to the Question which has been put upon the Paper, I have to say that the provisions for the indirect representation of minorities by means of the single-Member district system are the same in the three principal parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR afterwards asked whether, under the Bill, as it at present stood, there was any prospect of the Irish minority in England and Scotland being represented by 28 out of the 570 Members which would be the same proportion for them as the Loyal minority in Ireland?

MR. GIBSON: I would like to know whether there is any prospect of the Loyal minority in Ireland being represented by 33, which would be their proper number?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Twenty-three.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: These Questions raise matters of argument. It would be impossible for me to say how the Loyal minority in Ireland or the Irish minority in England and Scotland will be represented; but I believe that those best acquainted with the local circumstances of various towns in England say that some representation will be secured by the Irish minority, but I cannot say what.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—EXPEDITION TO BECHUANALAND—METHUEN'S HORSE.

MR. BRODRICK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Morning Post of March 17th, as to the treatment of Methuen's Horse; whether it is the fact that the trooper's pay only accrued from date of landing in South Africa and not from that of embarkation; what explanation he can give of the alleged shortness of rations; and, whether he will undertake that British troops on active service shall not be put in the position of having to buy food out of their own pockets to supplement insufficient Government supplies?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have seen the paragraph in question. As regards pay, I would draw attention to a reply I made on the 20th November to the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell), to the effect that the Irregular Force for service in Bechuanaland would be raised in South Africa, and that the journeys thither of young men desirous of there enlisting would be facilitated. Of course, pay would only commence from the date of enlistment. The ration authorized for Bechuanaland is a very ample one, and no complaint has been received of any failure in issuing it.

In reply to further Questions,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not aware that the men were drilled while on board ship. He would cause inquiries to be made as to the alleged deficiency of rations.

MUNICIPAL INCORPORATION OF TUNBRIDGE WELLS.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Commission with reference to the proposed incorporation of the Town of Tunbridge Wells?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have to state in reply to the right hon. Gentleman that the Report of the Commission is made for the information of the Lords of the Council, and is always treated as a confidential document.

LAW AND POLICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) - WANDERING LUNATICS.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report of a case at the Westminster Police Court in The Times of March 17th, according to which an alleged lunatic was refused admission to the Workhouse—

"A course which was adopted, it was stated, in consequence of a recent legal decision."

whether it is correct, according to the same report, that Mr. Partridge said—

"It would be very inconvenient to send lunacy cases to the House of Detention, even if it were legal to do so, which he very much doubted."

Whereupon Inspector Chisholm said—

"It was even more inconvenient and apparently less justifiable to detain lunatics in the cells at Police Stations."

And that Mr. Partridge remarked—

"That it was to be hoped there would be fresh legislation on the subject before long. There must be an altered state of things."

whether eventually Mr. Partridge said he had not alternative but to send the man to the House of Detention, and said—

"Magistrates at present did not know what course to pursue."

and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take immediate steps to prevent alleged lunatics being confined in prisons?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I entirely agree with the purport of the remarks of the hon. Member, and I think that Mr. Partridge came ultimately to a proper conclusion in sending a wandering lunatic to the infirmary of the workhouse, and not to a police cell. My view is unquestionably that the proper treatment for a wandering lunatic is to send him to the workhouse, and not to the prison. To send a lunatic to the police cell or the prison is very likely to increase his malady and to lead to his death. I may state that this has been the view for the last 40 years with reference to lunatics either before or after trial. According to this view, power has been given by statute, and the duty has been imposed on the Secretary of State, on a certificate that a prisoner is insane, to send him to a lunatic asylum. To my great surprise, when a few weeks ago this power was exercised in the case of Frederick Marshall there was a most extraordinary outcry in the Press, and even in quarters which ought to have been better informed, and it was said that it was an illegal power, or that if it was legal it was inexpedient. I would point out that nothing can be more undesirable than that a man who is a lunatic should be kept for two or three months awaiting his trial in prison, where there are no means whatever of taking proper care of him, and that ultimately a man who is a raving lunatic should be placed in the dock at the Sessions or the Assizes. The law provides that a man who is a lunatic should be sent to a lunatic asylum.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a Board of Guardians in the West of London had come to the conclusion that they could not keep their lunatics in the workhouse, and that the consequence was that the lunatics were sent to prison?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to reply that the Guardians referred to had acted in consequence of a supposed obscurity in the law. The statute to which the subject was referable was, however, sufficiently clear to make it obligatory upon them to admit lunatics. It was not that they could not admit them, but that they would not.

In answer to Mr. MCCOAN,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to reply that, under a statute which had existed for 40 years, when a lunatic was committed to prison he could rightly be sent to an asylum?

ARMY - ORDNANCE - THE EIGHTY-TON GUN OF H.M.S. "INFLEXIBLE"

MR. CARBUTT asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether it is true, as reported in The Times of 14th March, that one of the 80-ton guns of H.M.S. Inflexible is unserviceable owing to the scoring of the steel lining, if he will state whether this gun is a muzzle or breech loader; whether it is a steel gun; whether it has an enlarged powder chamber; where it was manufactured, and the cost; what date it was first fired after being mounted in position on board ship; if he can state approximately how many rounds of powder and shot have been fired by this gun; if it is proposed to replace it by an 80-ton gun taken from Shoeburyness; and, if so, is this gun of the same design; and, how many of these guns are in use?

MR. BRAND: One of the guns of Her Majesty's Ship Inflexible, as stated in The Times of the 18th of March, is unserviceable in its present condition, but it is repairable. It is a muzzle-loader. It has a steel tube with outer coils of wrought iron. It has an enlarged powder chamber. It was manufactured at the Royal Gun Factories. Its cost was £10,075. It was first fired after being mounted in position on board ship, I believe in 1880. It has fired 86 rounds up to date. It is proposed to replace this gun by the reserve—on loan to Shoeburyness for an experiment against armour plates. The reserve gun is of the same design. There are six of these guns in use; four in the Inflexible, two in Dover Turret, and beyond this there are two reserve guns.

In answer to a further Question,

MR. BRAND said that to re-line the damaged gun would not cost more than £400, as spare tubes were in hand.

SOUTH AFRICA—BECHUANALAND.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to a statement published in the Bechuanaland telegraphic correspondence of The Times on March 16th, to the effect that—“Montsioa's son showed a letter from Sechele to Mr. Upington, dated December 16th last, requesting permission to come under British rule;”

and, whether Mr. Upington has sent a copy of this letter to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, what answer has been made to the chief Sechele?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We have no knowledge of the letter referred to in the Question; but Sir Hercules Robinson was a short time ago informed by the Secretary of State that the Bechuanaland Protectorate extends up to Shoshong, and would, of course, therefore, embrace Sechele's country; and the High Commissioner was told to instruct Sir Charles Warren to communicate accordingly with both Sechele and Khama.

ARMY DISCIPLINE ACT, 1881 — THE COLONIAL CONTINGENTS IN THE SOUDAN.

COLONEL STANLEY asked the Judge Advocate General, Whether he will be prepared to state, on consideration of Army Estimates (Votes for Military Law), Under what Act for Discipline the Colonial contingents serving in the field will be placed, and if care will be taken to prevent any conflict between the provisions of “The Army Act, 1881,” and the Colonial Acts under which such officers and men are serving; and, whether clear instructions will be given to the officers in command of forces with reference to the point on which such Laws are dissimilar?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN): By Section 177 of the Army Act, 1881, it is provided that, when any Force of Volunteers, Militia, or other Force is raised in a Colony, any law of the Colony may extend to the officers and men of such Force, whether within or without the Colony, and where such Force is serving with Her Majesty's Regular Forces then, so far as the law of the Colony has not provided for the government and discipline of such Force, the Army Act then in force shall, subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the General Orders of the General Officer Commanding Her Majesty's Regular Forces with which such Force is serving, apply to the officers and men of such Force in like manner as it applies to the Regular Forces. As to any conflict between our military law and that of the Colonies, I do not apprehend that, as regards the New South Wales Contingent—whose services alone have been actually accepted for immediate operations—any such conflict can arise, because by the two Acts of that Colony under which this Force has been raised—those of the 9th of October, 1867, and the 10th of May, 1871—such Force, when called out on actual service, is made subject to our military law, with certain exceptions, the most important of which—namely, that which exempts a volunteer from the punishment of flogging—has now, since the abolition of that punishment in our Army, become inoperative. Besides, I have seen a communication from the Agent General of the Colony of New South Wales, which has throughout met the Imperial Government in the most ungrudging and patriotic spirit, stating that, for more abundant caution, the Colonial Authorities propose by local legislation without delay to make their Contingent subject to Imperial military law in cases where the local law has not provided for their government and discipline; and I have suggested that, to prevent any possible conflict, they should be made unconditionally subject to such law. With regard to the other Colonies, I could not, within the limits of an answer to a Question, give the information which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman desires, as it involves the consideration of some 10 or 12 Colonial Statutes; but the subject is now before me, and I hope at the proper time to do so. Meantime, care will certainly be taken to prevent any such conflict as is suggested—if such a conflict be possible—and no doubt instructions will, if necessary, be given to the officers in command with reference to the points in question.

Mr. Carbutt

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION) — PURCHASE OF CAMELS.

COLONEL DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to The Daily Chronicle of yesterday, in which the special correspondent at Suakin states:—

“To-day, out of a complete shipload of camels which came to hand not one was sound, and the majority were hopelessly mangy, all of them have therefore been sent back to Suez. Each of these wretched brutes cost, so I am credibly informed, £25, and people are asking who is responsible for paying such an absurd price when Berber desert camels, superb animals, can be bought for £30.”

and, whether it be true that the purchase of camels for the troops at Suakin has been intrusted to a Cairo contractor, who is sending down only camels from the Delta accustomed to green food and water every day, and totally useless for the Suakin-Berber desert?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the subject, and on the 17th and 18th instant I called for special Reports by telegraph. The whole of the camels purchased in and from Egypt are purchased by, and under the responsibility of, the General Commanding in Egypt. In reply to a telegram of the 23rd of February, the General made, on the 24th, the following Report:—

“Two thousand seven hundred camels have been procured from the Province of the Delta with the assistance of the Minister of the Interior. These animals are the ordinary camels of Lower Egypt, up to loads of about 600 lbs. weight. They have been obtained from the same districts as those used during the campaign in the Eastern Sudan last spring, but are, on the whole, of better quality, as they have been carefully selected by Commissariat officers deputed for that duty, and have not been sent in straight by the Mudira, as was the case last spring, when time did not admit of other arrangements being made. It is impossible to report as to their suitability for work in the desert until they are actually tried, but similar animals at Suakin last year performed very severe journeys continuously, and stood the climate well. No doubt these animals will require more water than camels who have been accustomed to a desert life. Three hundred camels are coming from Aden, but these, although probably well suited to desert work, will not carry a heavier load than from 250 lbs. to 300 lbs. One thousand are to be delivered at Suakin by Mr. J. L. Ross, under contract. They come from the Northern coast, and are to be delivered subject to approval by a board of officers at Suakin. They will, I am informed, be similar animals to those obtained from Aden.”

The detailed Reports as to contracts and prices have not yet been received; but the average cost of the Delta camels is stated to have been about £15.

DR. CAMERON asked, whether it was true that a shipload of camels had had to be sent back to Suez?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: That statement has also been referred to the General Officer for report, and he will report on the whole matter.

RAILWAY RATES AND FARES BILLS.

MR. PULESTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the arrangement he suggested has been now made with the Railway Companies, in reference to the Railway Rates Bills; and, whether it is now understood that these Bills are to be proceeded with, or withdrawn?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No Sir; I have not received any official reply from the Railway Companies.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government adhere to the statement of the Secretary of State for India, that the Zulfaga Pass, Ak-Rabat, and Pul-i-Khisti, recently occupied by the Russian Forces, are "within those portions which Her Majesty's Government have regarded as within the Afghan boundaries?"

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member asks me whether Her Majesty's Government agree to a statement made by Lord Kimberley, Secretary of State for India. I am bound to say that I do not think that such a Question ought to be put, and I must decline to answer it.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the supreme decision on points of Order does not rest with you, and not with the right hon. Gentleman? I should like also to point out that the right hon. Gentleman, in quoting the Question, used the word "agree," whereas I asked whether the Government "adhere" to the statement of the Secretary of State for India. Since that statement was made many remarkable things have happened.

MR. SPEAKER: It is entirely within the discretion of the First Lord of the Treasury to decide what answer he shall give.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Yes, Sir; but I think you have misunderstood me. I did not venture to dispute the right of the Prime Minister to refuse to answer a Question; but I asked for your ruling as to his right to decide whether a Question ought to be put or not.

MR. SPEAKER: If the Question was out of Order I should not have allowed it to be put.

MR. GLADSTONE: Permit me to say that I never suggested that the Question was out of Order. But there are many Questions which, in my opinion, ought not to be put, notwithstanding that they are not out of Order.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to give Notice—I do so with considerable regret—that, in consequence of the impossibility of obtaining any satisfactory answer from the Government to these important Questions, I shall feel it to be my duty to call attention to the discreditable surrender of the Government of all their demands, and of the rights of their ally, the Ameer of Afghanistan, in the only way at the present time open to private Members, on the first available opportunity.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any approximate date can now be fixed for the commencement of the proceedings for a joint delimitation of the Afghan frontier by Sir Peter Lumsden and the Russian Commissioner, or whether the arrival of the Russian Commissioner on the Afghan frontier is no longer expected.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not able to fix a date, and I think that it had better be understood that when we fix a date we shall communicate it to Parliament.

SUSPENSION OF EVICTIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce the promised Bill relating to the land question in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland before Easter; and, whether he will give facilities for the Second Reading of the Suspension of Evictions (Scotland) Bill since, under the present Law, tenants may be dispossessed of their holdings in May, whether they are in arrears with their rent or not?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he was afraid he could give no other answer than that which was given some time ago—namely, that in the present state of Public Business, he feared there was no chance of introducing this Bill before Easter, and that exactly the same reason would prevent the Government from giving facilities for proceeding with any other measure.

MR. MACFARLANE asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman would give the House a few minutes at the end of Supply, in order to take the opinion of the House on this important question.

[No reply.]

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I have given the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister private Notice that I would ask him to-day what the arrangement for the holidays will be, and also that I would appeal to the Government to put off the discussion on the important question on the Financial Agreement for Egypt until after the holidays, because we have not yet got, and shall not have got until the beginning of next week, the numerous, voluminous, and important Papers upon which that Agreement is founded. I think the right hon. Gentleman will see that it would be reasonable that that discussion should be put off until after the holidays.

MR. GLADSTONE: I will give the right hon. Gentleman the best answer in my power; and I think, perhaps, it would be well that I should not make a final answer to-day, but reserve my final answer until to-morrow, when I shall have had the opportunity of consulting my Colleagues, and when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have had an opportunity of looking into certain matters of procedure connected with the subject. First, Sir, with regard to the holidays. Considering that we did not meet until the 19th of February, and that Easter is not at a very late date, I have arrived at the conclusion that the most convenient arrangement, and the most acceptable to the House, would be to rather narrow our measure of Recess at Easter, and to take more liberal holidays at Whitsuntide. My intention was, presuming that there would be no Egyptian Question to consider, to ask the House to adjourn on the Tuesday in Passion Week, and to meet again on Thursday, April 9. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman asks whether we will agree to postpone the discussion on the Egyptian Question until after the Easter holidays, and he urges that there will be but limited time between Monday and the day alluded to yesterday by my right hon. Friend near me—namely, Thursday in next week—for the discussion of Egyptian affairs. I admit that I was disposed to hope, from the small stress the right hon. Gentleman laid upon the production of Papers at the commencement of the Session, when, I think, they were only produced on the day on which a Vote of Censure on the Government was moved—I was disposed to hope that this difficulty might not have arisen. However, I quite admit it is a serious question, and that the House is entitled to time to consider it. That is one side of the case; but there is another side of the case, which is this—that many postponements have taken place in the operations and proceedings in Egypt with reference to this subject; and any considerable further postponement at a time when practical relief could be granted to Egyptian finances would, I am afraid, be attended with very serious public inconvenience. I would point out this, Sir—that under the arrangement which is proposed by the Government for an international guarantee, as might be expected, the principal part, the leading part—although I do not mean that there is a difference in liability—the leading part, the operative part, falls to Her Majesty's Government, and consequently the proceedings of the House of Commons will be looked to, as I anticipate, by the Legislatures of other States; and I am afraid that a serious postponement by the House of Commons of the decision on this question would cause considerable further delay in consequence of the likelihood that other States will in some degree wait upon our proceedings. Of course there is another alternative, and that is that the discussion might be postponed until Monday in Passion Week. That, at the worst, would give a week for the consideration of Papers, and so far I am able to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman if he thinks it desirable to press those views upon us; but, if he asks anything more than that, out of respect for him and those for whom he acts, I will take until to-morrow to consider the question; but with the view, as at present advised, I entertain of the interests involved, I am bound to say I cannot give anything like a pledge to agree to the postponement of the definitive Vote until after Easter.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to substitute Monday for Thursday will not meet the case. It seems to me that this is a matter which really requires fair and full consideration. And, looking to all that has passed during two or three years now and the short interval suggested, I think what I have asked for ought to be granted.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE SUSPENSION OF MR. O'BRIEN.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that the Resolution as to the conduct of the Speaker with regard to the suspension of Mr. O'Brien was on the Paper for Tuesday, the 31st, on which day he proposed that the House should adjourn; and he asked the right hon. Gentleman if he would regulate his Motion so as to admit of the Resolution being brought on?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had already been obliged, with great reluctance, to state to several hon. Members that the Seats Bill did not admit of any delay to allow of other matters being proceeded with. The present intention of the Government was to move the adjournment of the House at 2 o'clock on Tuesday, 31st March.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—GENERAL GRAHAM'S ADVANCE.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he had received any information from General Graham with regard to the reported advance to-day of the Forces under his command?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; I have received no information at all to-day from General Graham.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY.

MR. M'COAN asked the Secretary of State for War, What proportion of the Railway plant taken over from Messrs. Lucas and Aird for the Suakin and Berber Railway and shipped respectively from Hull and London was new plant, and how much of it had already been used in the construction of the Hull and Barnsley Railway, or of the London and Tilbury Docks; and, whether, and by whom, it was valued for the War Office before shipment; if so valued, on what abatement on manufacturer's prices for new plant of the same description; and, if not valued, how was its "fair and reasonable price" ascertained?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: About two-thirds of the plant referred to is new. The remainder has been previously used. It is carefully inspected by military officers with technical knowledge before shipment, and on the report of such inspection the abatement to be made from the price of new plant is determined.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY—EXAMINATION IN DOGMATIC THEOLOGY.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that it is the practice of the University of Oxford to subject all candidates for a degree thereat to an examination in Dogmatic Theology, with the alternative of declaring that they have a conscientious objection to submitting to it; and, whether, if this does not constitute a violation of the letter of the 34 Vic. c. 26, s. 3, he will consider whether that Act should not be amended?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that though he had not had an opportunity of referring to the authorities, he was aware that the University of Oxford, compatibly with the law, had determined to continue the old examination in theology; but he was not aware that it was correctly described as dogmatic. As to the second part of the Question, it was a little difficult to have Questions of this nicety and importance propounded for the decision of the Cabinet with only 24 hours' Notice. On the part of the Cabinet he could give no answer to the Question; but his own opinion was that it was extremely improbable that the Cabinet would ask the House to legislate upon the question at the present time and under present circumstances.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. SEXTON asked, Whether it was intended to introduce to-night the three Irish Bills on the Paper (the Constabulary Redistribution Bill, the Registration Bill, and the County Courts Officers Bill); and what had become of the National Teachers Bill, or would it be introduced to-night as promised?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he intended to move two out of the three Bills on the Paper to-night, as they would not require any lengthened statement, and he had put the National Education Bill down for Tuesday.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

POST OFFICE—PARCEL POST HORSES.

Mr. ONSLOW gave Notice that on Monday he would ask the Postmaster General, Whether his attention had been called to the disgraceful condition of many of the horses used in the Parcel Post vans; and what was the system employed by the Post Office for a proper periodical inspection of these horses?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—ARTILLERY AND RIFLES—THE GARDNER GUN AT ABU KLEA.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, in rising to call attention to the jamming of the Gardner machine guns at the battles of Tamai and Abu Klea, and of the Martini-Henry rifles during the late campaign, said, that the information which had been received as to these matters showed that they were not satisfactory to the country or to the Army. Of course, it was possible that the failure of the Martini-Henry might be put down to the bad shooting of the soldiers; and there could be no doubt that the skill in firing of our men was not what it ought to be. That was probably due to the mistaken economy which was shown in the matter of rifle practice, for he knew he should be supported by the great majority of the skilled officers of the Army when he said that the number of rounds our soldiers were allowed to fire each year was not one-half what it ought to be. As had been stated by the Commander-in-Chief last year, shooting was greatly a question of expense. The number of rounds that soldiers were allowed to fire each year was not sufficient, and their lack of skill might therefore be traced to mistaken economy. That, however, was a general question well worthy the attention of the War Office; but they had definite statements with regard to the firing in recent battles.

More than one correspondent had mentioned the jamming of the cartridges; and he would especially ask the attention of the noble Marquess who represented the War Office to the statement of the Special Correspondent of The Daily Telegraph. He was not going to say that they should accept the ipse dixit of the correspondent of a newspaper as absolute proof in a case of this kind; but the correspondent of The Daily Telegraph—he would by no means say the same of all the correspondents—was a gentleman of remarkable experience, of great judgment and accuracy. The name of Mr. Burleigh was well known; he had been through several campaigns, and they might fairly assume that nothing which he deliberately stated was to be altogether disregarded. This correspondent had written that the wildness of aim which enabled the attack of the Arabs to be successful was caused by the fact that hundreds of cartridges jammed after the second or third shot. It was a very serious matter, when a small body of men were sent on a difficult and dangerous march through the desert in the face of thousands of savage foes, that their principal arm of defence should be practically useless after the second or third shot. The correspondent went on to say that officers had informed him that this year their mongrel cartridges stuck worse than ever, and that at Abu Klea he had seen scores of weapons rendered temporarily useless. This statement was worthy the attention of the War Office. If it had not been for the sticking of the cartridges and for the jamming of the Gardner guns it was more than probable that the British square would never have been reached by the Arabs, and some 150 gallant soldiers who were killed would still have been alive, to say nothing of the brave officers who rallied the square. He had himself received confirmation of the correspondent's statement from several officers. Referring to the action of the Gardner gun, under Lord Charles Herford, at the battle of Abu Klea, Mr. Burleigh stated that during the advance of the Arabs it had been fired occasionally and had performed good service. When, however, it was most wanted—when the Arab attack reached within 300 yards of our square—before three rounds had been fired the cartridges stuck, and the gun was rendered temporarily useless, an accident to which Lord Charles Beresford declared all machine guns were perpetually liable. The same thing occurred at the battle of Tamai last year. On that occasion one of our squares was broken, and the fate of the Army was imperilled; and he believed those who were on the spot attributed the misfortune mainly to the fact that the Gardner gun got jammed after the second or third firing. The fact that this jamming happened at two of the most critical periods deserved consideration. If these defects could not be remedied in the Gardner and Nordenfelt guns, it was time that the War Office adopted some other system of machine gun which would obviate these dangers. The jamming of these guns could not be due to inexperience or mismanagement, as possibly that of the Martini-Henry rifles might be, because they were under the charge of skilled men—the Naval Brigade and Lord Charles Beresford. The fault must have been either in the machinery of the gun or in the cartridges. This was a very serious matter, for it was above all things necessary that our soldiers should be provided with arms of the most approved and precise character to enable them to cope with their foe in the Soudan. He did not propose to proceed with the Motion for a Royal Commission of Inquiry into these facts which he had placed on the Paper, because he did not doubt that the War Office would be willing to look into the matter, and because he did not wish to stand in the way of the important Motion which stood next on the Paper.

MR. CARBUTT expressed his gratification that this subject had been brought forward by the hon. Member. There was no doubt that machine guns would play a most important part in the wars of the future, and it was most important that they should adopt the best that could be devised. Machine guns were worked by a handle, and so long as that was turned the theory was that the gun would go on firing. But if some of the cartridges were not very well made, or were a little moist, they would not go off with the same speed as other cartridges, and so remained in the chamber until the next cartridge entered, and either remained in the chamber and exploded, or hung fire sufficiently long to be thrown on to the ground and there explode. Every machine gun yet introduced was liable to this hanging fire; but the Maxim gun, recently invented, was far less liable to this very serious inconvenience. It was an automatic gun, which utilized the recoil, and could fire 600 bullets per minute, and only required the attention of one man. It was an arm of the Service as to the importance of which he believed the Government to be fully alive. With our small Army we were becoming more and more dependent upon mechanical inventions, and there was no arm the Government ought to give more attention to. He, therefore, hoped they would put pressure on the manufacturers and send out a few of these guns to Egypt for the Autumn Campaign.

MR. BRAND said, he had the pleasure of informing the House that the Maxim gun had already been brought to the notice of the Department, and one was being built for trial. He found some difficulty in dealing with the speech of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), so far as the guns were concerned, because he had not given the House any authority for his statement.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I quoted the statement of Mr. Burleigh, the correspondent of The Daily Telegraph.

MR. BRAND said, he was aware that the hon. Member had quoted a statement from the public Press; but he desired to have a stronger authority as to the facts. Since the Motion of the hon. Member had been placed on the Paper he had made inquiries as to this matter, and he found that neither at the Admiralty nor at the War Office had a Report been received to the effect that the Gardner gun had jammed. Indeed, the contrary was the case. A Report had been received by the Admiralty from their officer commanding at Tamasi, and his Report with regard to the action of the gun was highly satisfactory, no mention being made of the jamming of the gun in that action. He could not say anything with reference to what had taken place at Abu Klea, because no Reports had been received as to the Gardner guns in that action. If, however, the hon. Member would favour him with any other authority, besides the statement of The Daily Telegraph correspondent, he would be happy to make further inquiries on the point. As to the Martini-Henry rifle, the War Office had received a communication from the General Officer commanding at Korti that, in some cases, the cartridges for the Martini-Henry rifle got jammed at Abu Klea. He had only one remark to make with regard to the letter of The Daily Telegraph correspondent to which the hon. Member had referred. If he remembered rightly—quoting from memory—that correspondent stated that hundreds of cartridges got jammed; but in the next sentence he said that there was a “continuous roll of fire,” so that the case could not have been so serious as represented in the quotation by the hon. Member. There was no doubt that the jamming took place to a certain extent. The present Martini-Henry cartridge was introduced by a Special Committee, over which Lieutenant Colonel Fletcher presided, in 1871, and it had undergone only slight modifications since then. It had been used since that year in several small campaigns, in not one of which had any complaint been made with respect to the working of the roll cartridge in the Martini-Henry rifle. He thought, therefore, it was reasonable to suppose, until detailed and written Reports were received from the front, that some very special and exceptional conditions affected the Martini-Henry cartridge at Abu Klea. For his own part, he could quite imagine that the sand of the Desert might have had a considerable effect in bringing about the jamming referred to. He could only say that the War Office was fully alive to the importance of this subject. Lord Wolseley had suggested a certain course of action, and his recommendations were now under the consideration of the professional advisers of the Secretary of State on this question. If his recommendations were considered by them to be feasible and desirable, he could assure the House that no time would be lost and no necessary expense would be spared in giving effect to them.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—
ARMY IN EGYPT.—RESOLUTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, who had on the Paper the following Motion:—On Army Estimates, to call attention to the suffering and loss which must result from keeping British troops in the Soudan; and to move—

“That it is not proper that Her Majesty’s soldiers should be exposed to the deadly summer climate of the Soudan and Upper Egypt, and that Her Majesty’s subjects should be taxed to protect Egypt, not for Her Majesty, nor for the Egyptians, but for the bondholders foreign to Egypt, to whom the revenue is assigned.”

said, he desired to confine himself specially to the second portion of the Motion. He considered that under all the circumstances it was neither right nor proper that the blood of the people of this country should be shed, or that they should be heavily taxed, in order to protect Egypt for the bondholders. Proceeding to discuss the climate of the Soudan and Upper Egypt, he said the locality in which our soldiers were at present was one of the hottest places in the world, and as a consequence they would be much exposed and suffer very greatly indeed. There were several circumstances which were likely to make exposure of English soldiers in the Soudan more fatal than were the risks encountered in the hot climate of Moul-tan. The English troops now in the Soudan were very much exhausted, and they were unprepared to stand a terrible trial. The troops which went to Moul-tan were under the excitement of active service; but the troops in the Soudan would have to wait a very long time before being engaged in active service. It appeared that already they were suffering from fever, ophthalmia, and other diseases. We did not know what was really the extra cost of our troops in Egypt and the Soudan, because that extra cost was mixed up with the ordinary cost of the Army. The sum of £100,000 or £200,000 was a mere bagatelle, and it only professed to cover what were called the extraordinary expenses. The average cost of a British soldier, all charges included, he estimated at about £130 per man per annum. In India the cost was about £200 per man per annum. A startling statement had been made by the Under Secretary of State for India, which was that the extraordinary expense for each Native soldier employed by the Government in Egypt was at the rate of £66 per month per man. It certainly seemed extraordinary that a White soldier should cost 1-16th of what a Black soldier cost. There were expenses to be incurred in Egypt which had not to be incurred in India. What number of soldiers were we contributing to the protection of Egypt? He found in The Times a telegram from Cairo, which stated that, exclusive of the Expedition at Suakin, we had 6,800 men in Egypt Proper. At £200 per man the cost of this number of soldiers would be £1,360,000. If the total number of troops, exclusive of those at Suakin, were taken at 10,000 men, the Expenditure would exceed £2,000,000 per annum. The House had been already told that it had been necessary to increase the Army by 15,000 or 16,000 men. It was certain that we were incurring an expenditure of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 per annum, and it was our being placed in this position which led to our difficulties with Russia. He gathered that the Government had practically bound themselves to the protection of Egypt for the next two years.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member was not touching on any subject appropriate to the Motion to go into Committee on the Army Estimates.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was venturing to submit that the Army Estimates ought to be reduced, because a large part of them was due to the employment of our Forces in Egypt.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member would not be in Order in pursuing that line of argument.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he would confine himself as closely as he could to the argument embodied in the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper, and which he presumed was in Order, or it would not have been allowed to be printed there. It was apparent on the face of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday that Egypt had been surrendered by Her Majesty's Government to the bondholders, to be treated as a sequestered country, and that consequently neither the people of this country nor the people of Egypt had any direct interest in those finances which were to be protected by our troops. He admitted there were certain common European interests in Egypt apart from the interest of the bondholders, and apart from the interest of the people of Egypt; but what he said was that it was not a question peculiar to England. It was a question of common European interest, and why should we pay for all? Why should we pay for the interest of European nations, and not for ourselves alone? It seemed to him that was in reality a price we paid for the privilege of going to Egypt. We went to Egypt at the expense of the lives, of the blood, and money of the people of this country; and it seemed to him that the Government had practically told other nations that this country would protect their interests at the expense of British taxpayers if those nations would allow them to occupy Egypt. Not only were they not called upon to offer this protection, but no one was grateful to them for it. On the contrary, nearly every European nation was more or less hostile to this country for the course we had adopted in Egypt, and at least one European nation—Russia—had taken advantage of our entanglement. He could not hope to carry his Amendment, but he ventured to submit it by way of protest.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not proper that Her Majesty's soldiers should be exposed to the deadly Summer climate of Upper Egypt, and that Her Majesty's subjects should be taxed to protect Egypt, not for Her Majesty, nor for the Egyptians, but for the bondholders foreign to Egypt, to whom the revenue is assigned,"—(Sir George Campbell),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he hoped the House would excuse him if he did not follow the hon. Gentleman at any length in the speech he had just made. He must say that he had had very considerable difficulty in following the arguments of his hon. Friend, who seemed to have altogether mixed up in his mind the Estimates which they were about to discuss in Committee and the Supplementary Estimates which it was proposed subsequently to ask the House to agree to. The hon. Gentleman had not only mixed up the Estimates on the Table, which contained nothing whatever relating to the Soudan, but he had also mixed up the question of the Financial Arrangement which had been lately concluded by Her Majesty's Government. A good portion of the hon. Member's speech referred to the object for which Lord Wolseley's Force was now at Korti, and he expressed the opinion that it was not with the view of an ultimate advance to Khartoum, but for the protection of Egypt. He (the Marquess of Hartington) denied that; but even if it were so the House was not called upon that evening to express an opinion upon it, because the Estimates on the Table did not contain any item of expenditure relating to the occupation of the Province of Dongola or of the Upper Nile. All the operations there would be made the subject of debate on the Vote of Credit, and it could hardly be in Order to discuss them now. He understood the hon. Member to protest against any expenditure on the British garrisons in Egypt being charged to the British ratepayer; and he also understood him to contend that the whole cost in respect of that garrison would be very much larger than what was expected. As to the first point, it seemed to him to be one that could not be conveniently discussed on that occasion. There would shortly be an opportunity of discussing the whole question of Egyptian finance, when the arrangement of the International Agreement was brought before the House. The question then to be discussed was whether the Financial Arrangement was equitable to Egypt, to the bondholders, and to the ratepayers of this country; and whether the Revenue of Egypt were capable of defraying the whole of the expenditure on the British garrison. It would also be considered whether a larger sacrifice in respect of the charge to be made on the Egyptian Revenue on account of the British garrisons ought to be called for from the bondholders. The hon. Member, in his calculations with respect to the cost that would be involved by the British occupation of Egypt, seemed not to have taken into account the difference between men being engaged in active military operations where a very large amount of transport was involved, and the case where men were simply in garrison. The hon. Member spoke of the addition of 15,000 men; but they were not to-night discussing anything about 15,000 men. The addition of 15,000 men, if that was the number they proposed to add, would be for the distinct purpose of carrying on the military operations in the Soudan with the object announced to the House. The Army was not increased last year or the year before on account of the occupation of Egypt; it was not proposed to be increased this year on account of the occupation of Egypt. Therefore, it was absurd to argue that the whole cost of 6,000 men was the proper charge to be made against the Egyptian Revenue. The finances of Egypt could be discussed when they were regularly brought before the House; and he trusted the House would not be disposed to wander from the proper and very important subject they had to discuss in connection with the Estimates that evening. He perfectly understood that the hon. Member, and a few others who had from the first been opposed to the occupation of Egypt by British troops in any form, should take this opportunity, among others, of making their protest; but he did not think his hon. Friend himself desired that the House should now take up its time in reviewing the whole subject of Egyptian finance.

Sir George Campbell

MR. LABOUCHÈRE inferred from the remarks of the noble Marquess that there was nothing in the present Estimates connected either with the Soudan or with our occupation of Egypt.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member misunderstood him. He would explain, when they were allowed to go into Committee, the way in which the Estimates related to the occupation of Egypt; but he might say that they had no reference to the operations in the Soudan.

MR. LABOUCHÈRE said, he understood that his hon. Friend wished simply to protest against the expenditure of money in Egypt, and he had struck out of his Amendment any reference to the Soudan, so that he was not only in Order, but justified in objecting to this expenditure. It appeared that there was something in the Estimates which related to the garrison in Egypt, and the contention was that the cost of that garrison ought to be borne by Egypt, and not by this country. That was a fair contention, and it was only reasonable that his hon. Friend, and those who thought with him, should raise the question. Under the circumstances, however, he would suggest that his hon. Friend should ask the leave of the House to withdraw his Amendment; or, if the House declined to grant that leave, that he should not go to a division, but in Committee move a reduction of the Vote.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—THE SEAWARD DEFENCE OF THE MILITARY PORTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in rising to call attention to the inadequacy of the defences of our military ports, said: I do not desire to exaggerate the importance of this matter; but if I refer to the language held by the First Lord of the Admiralty, I think I shall show it is one which deserves and requires the very serious attention of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War and of this House. It will be in the recollection of the House that I asked the noble Lord, two or three days ago, whether it was his intention to make provision for the seaward defence of Portsmouth, Plymouth, Gibraltar, and Malta. I confine myself to these ports, because they were mentioned by Lord Northbrook. That noble Lord, in his speech in the House of Lords, December 2, 1884, said—

"The other important question is, whether it is not necessary, in consequence of the increased power of guns of late years and the changes in that respect, to make some alteration and improvement in the seaward defences of our great military ports at home and abroad—I mean such ports as Portsmouth, Plymouth, Malta, and Gibraltar. That subject has also been under the consideration of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, and it is probable that he will have proposals to bring before Her Majesty's Government."—(3 Hansard, [194]413.)

In the position which the noble Lord occupies in the Government, the language which he has used is a distinct recognition of the importance of the subject. I think the statement is strong, because of its moderation; and therefore I ask the noble Lord whether he is prepared to take steps to improve those defences? This is not the first time that I have drawn attention to the necessity of doing so; and if I have refrained from insisting on the weakness of particular places, or the insufficiency of the means used for defending them, it has been from a desire to avoid anything which would cause embarrassment to Her Majesty's Government in the discharge of their duties, and also from the desire which everyone of proper feeling would have not to give occasion for panic or alarm. There is no occasion for panic or alarm if we exercise the common prudence, judgment, and energy which I ask for from Her Majesty's Government. The interpretation which I put on the answer of the noble Lord to a Question which I put to him the other day on the subject is that there must be delay, that of two things this is of the less importance, and that the energies of Her Majesty's Government must be devoted to a great extent to strengthening the defences of the coaling stations, and, therefore, that they are unable to take the steps recognized as necessary for the seaward defences of our military ports. I do not think that is a sufficient answer. If the military ports are insufficiently defended, the admission that our coaling stations should be better protected appears to me to be an argument that the military ports should be adequately defended. I understand the statement to be that we are justified in leaving half our defences unprotected, because a certain expenditure is to be incurred for outlying stations. I shall be told that we have gone on for several years, and that there has been no danger. My answer is, Why have we forts or other means of defence unless there is danger? But again I fall back upon the statement of Lord Northbrook as to the necessity for improving the defences of our military ports. Perhaps I shall be told that I am doing injury to the public interests by what I am about to say. I do not sympathize with the view held by the Department, and probably by the Government, that injury would be done by stating plainly the circumstances of the case. I believe the very reverse. Just consider what we are. We are servants of the Crown and the country; and if it is contended that it is our duty to withhold from the Crown and the country the simple facts of the case in which the country is so deeply concerned, I do not agree with that view of the case. If there is sufficient defence the country ought to know it. If the defence is insufficient, the country ought to know it too, because it is absurd to suppose that those abroad who take an interest in the matter are unacquainted with the facts. Everyone who reads the newspapers, and every Member of the House, is well aware that there are naval and military officers, some attached to Embassies, others not so attached, whose duty it is to keep Foreign Governments informed as to the condition of our defences and of our military and naval power. Therefore, to say that we should be giving information which might be injurious to the country in the event of a war is to keep up a delusion injurious to the public interests. But I will so far respect the position maintained for a great many years as not to state precisely what I know of the weakness and strength of particular ports. I will call them A, B, and C. I have information as to the calibre of guns, the number of guns not mounted or not having carriages, where the amount of recoil is greater than the space behind the guns, and a vast amount besides, which any man or any newspaper may get that chooses to take the trouble, and that without any breach of confidence or betrayal of trust by those whose duty it is to take charge of such places. I will now speak of A. No further steps whatever have been taken to organize the submarine mine and torpedo defence. Very weak in sappers (one weak company), who would require weeks instead of days to lay out these mines. Torpedo boats are necessary; but in the absence of the Fleet—and it would be at sea in time of war—there are no trained men capable of working them. I hear that representations on the subject have been made to the authorities; but nothing has been done. B.—The stores are incomplete, and the trained men could not lay the mines in less than three weeks. The ground to be defended has not been determined upon. C.—No boats. No station fixed or plans decided upon. No Royal Engineer torpedo officer here at present. No torpedo depot yet established. In fact, if a war suddenly broke out with a Naval Power, this port would be quite unprepared with regard to the submarine defences. I mention these three ports out of six or seven of which I have information. If the noble Marquess wishes it, I will give him much more accurate details and complete information which will satisfy him that I am speaking with full knowledge of the facts; but I can say something more. As to mercantile ports, there has been a proposal for several years to make use of and train local Volunteer Engineers; but as yet no stores have been furnished for practice, nor any serious steps taken to train the men, although the artificers who constitute these corps are in some cases particularly well adapted for the work, and anxious to take it up. Proposals have for several years been in existence for creating submarine defences; but they have never gone beyond proposals. There are plenty of men, not necessarily Royal Engineers, who would be glad to submit to the necessary discipline, would be always found on the spot, and would be anxious to take up the work. There is no cause for alarm if we set to work at once; but it is to be regretted that schemes that have been on paper for years should never get beyond paper. We cannot afford to be less than ready with our materials for warfare. Is it to be supposed that a Foreign Power intending to make war upon this country would have the courtesy to postpone offensive operations until we could overcome every difficulty that might impede our action? The greatest security for peace is the fact that a nation is prepared for war; and I believe that we can only insure peace by making the best use of the materials and organization at our command. I trust that we shall receive some assurance from the Secretary of State for War that the work which ought to be undertaken in connection with our military and mercantile ports shall be taken in hand at once. A large expenditure is not required; but a very great responsibility will rest upon the Government if they fail to avail themselves of the means now at their disposal for the successful prosecution of this work.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have no complaint to make of the manner in which this subject has been brought before us. On the contrary, I think the House is indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the careful, moderate, and guarded statement which he has just made. I gather that the chief subject to which he desires to call attention is what he considers to be the condition of unpreparedness of our submarine mining defences. The House will not expect that I should follow closely the right hon. Gentleman's criticisms upon the subject, because by the very proper mode of description which he has adopted in his references to our forts he has put it out of my power to correct any mistakes into which he may have fallen. However, if the right hon. Gentleman will give me privately the information which he has received in regard to any deficiency in the submarine defences of any forts I shall be very happy to inquire into the matter, and to give the House such further information as may be in my power when we come to consider the special Votes. I may now make a few general observations which I think will be thought to a certain extent satisfactory. Three extra companies for the protection of submarine mines of the principal military stations are being formed. Although this has been effected at some sacrifice of the strength of some branches of the Corps of Royal Engineers, yet the importance of the branch is considered so great that no consideration can be allowed to interfere with the formation of these companies. Local aid is being developed in the formation of Militia companies for Submarine Mining Companies in Devonshire and Kent. The wants of coaling stations are being met by the formation of a special battalion for training the men. A sum is being taken in the present Estimates for raising a native battalion which shall take part in the submarine mining defence of Singapore, Hong Kong, and other important coaling stations, and some of these stations have certainly been very much strengthened. At Chatham the Submarine Mining School has been formed into a separate battalion. To obtain the advantage of having a Submarine Mining Company, a large number of intelligent boatmen and other intelligent men have been employed, and recruiting is going on at seaports. At present the Corps of Royal Engineers labour under a certain disadvantage compared with other corps in the absence of any chance of promotion from the ranks. This will for the future be remedied by the formation—for which some provision is made in the present Estimates—of a Coast Corps of Royal Engineers on lines similar to those upon which the Coast Corps of Royal Artillery was formed. The Corps will take charge and superintend the submarine mine defences of important stations, and take part in the recruiting, drilling, and training of Militia and Volunteer Submarine Mining Companies. The plans of the defences of the principal forts have been lately revised in consultation with the Naval Authorities, in order to obtain unity of action between them and the Military Authorities. I am not able to state what has been actually expended on the preparation of submarine mines; but very considerable expenditure has been, and is still being, incurred. The right hon. Gentleman will, therefore, see that the subject is not being neglected. I should like to say a few words upon the more general question raised by the right hon. Gentleman in the Motion which he has placed upon the Paper—namely, the question of the defences of our principal military stations. When the fortification of those stations was provided for by Lord Palmerston—by the raising of a long loan for between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000—it was intended that the cost of the necessary armaments should be defrayed out of the annual Estimates; and in 1860 it was estimated that £5,250,000 had been employed for this particular purpose. From 1860 to 1878 £3,250,000 were expended, leaving a balance, according to the original Estimate, of £1,750,000 still to be provided. About £750,000 has since been spent, so that about £1,000,000 is still due on the original Estimate; but the increased cost of heavy ordnance, although, of course, the number of guns required at the works has considerably diminished, has considerably increased the total cost of the necessary arms, and it is now considered that about £1,250,000 are still due to complete the approved defences of the principal military stations at home and abroad. The alterations in the character of ordnance have also rendered necessary certain structural alterations in the works themselves, and also, in some cases, the construction of new works, and works in new and more advanced positions; and for these purposes, and for the completion of preparations for the new mode of defence, it is estimated that something like £1,000,000 will be required in addition to the works for submarine mining. There is, therefore, about £2,250,000 to be expended before the defences of the great military ports at home and abroad can be considered completely satisfactory. I am very far indeed from saying that this expenditure ought to be very long delayed; but the question of how and when, and in what mode it should be proceeded with is one of very considerable difficulty and embarrassment. Certainly it is no Party question, because both Parties in the country have acquiesced in the delay that has been incurred. The difficulty is not only the very great difficulty common to all Governments of finding the money, but it is necessary that we should be satisfied that we had got something which, if not absolutely final, presents a reasonable prospect of being satisfactory for a very considerable number of years before calling upon Parliament to make a great effort in the matter. Up to the present time I am bound to say no such stage of finality can be said to have been reached. Then, Sir, the question of the time when we ought to make a great effort is one that requires a great deal of consideration; and, above all things, we ought to avoid by a hasty expenditure making the country indisposed subsequently to make those efforts and sacrifices which it may ultimately have to make. If these ports and military stations are defenceless, we should not be justified in acquiescing in any further delay; but that is by no means the case. Although the armaments have not been completed up to the approved scale, the defences are exceedingly strong. The opinion, I believe, of military authorities derived from recent experience—from experience such as that gained by the attack on the forts at Alexandria, and from the still more recent experience gained from the attack by the French Fleet on the Chinese forts—the opinion is that the defence of fortifications is gaining ground in comparison to the power of the attack; and both at Alexandria and the Chinese forts I believe that the general opinion is that the forts, if defended by a resolute garrison, would have been able to offer a very successful resistance to the attack of even a powerful fleet. I believe that our forts at any rate, even in their present position, are exceedingly strong. It is extremely doubtful whether any Power or combination of Powers would venture to attack them, unless they were assured that they would not themselves be exposed to the possible attack of our own Fleet. They are, I think, strong enough to make a successful resistance, except under a combination of circumstances almost impossible, if not utterly out of the question. There is, therefore, no cause whatever for a panic—there is no cause for alarm, or for a hasty and ill-considered expenditure. We have upon our hands at the present moment an expenditure of a very heavy nature, not only in connection with military expeditions, but also for Imperial defences. We have also undertaken to protect a number of Colonial coaling stations; and that, in the opinion of the Admiralty, is a service of a most urgent nature. We have also undertaken and are making provision for an expenditure of more than £1,500,000 in the next five years in an addition to the naval guns, and we have also to make some provision for replenishing military equipments and stores. Those services tax severely, I will not say the resources of the country, but certainly to a very considerable amount the resources of the Military Department, both engineering and manufacturing. The Engineering Department at the present moment is occupied almost to the utmost in connection with the Expeditions that are in hand, and also in connection with the works in progress at the coaling stations; and I doubt whether it would be in the power of this Department to undertake any very heavy expenditure at the present time. The House, however, may rely upon it that as soon as there is any reasonable prospect of a finality in these matters being attained, and that as soon as we are convinced that we can assure the country that it will have its money's worth, we shall not hesitate to make such proposals as will provide for the complete security of these important stations, and to call upon the country to make such sacrifices as may be necessary for the purpose.

The Marquess of Hartington

COLONEL STANLEY said, he agreed with the noble Marquess that this was no Party question; but it was very desirable that it should be discussed apart from other questions of Army administration, and in such a manner as would show to the House and the country that the Government were keeping themselves in accord with the general desire that these stations should be strengthened. There was only one point in the speech of the noble Marquess with which he should have found fault, and that was contained in almost his last sentence. The noble Marquess said the House might rest assured that whenever the Government saw a reasonable prospect of finality they would take such steps as they might deem necessary to complete the defences of the country. That was just laying down the one condition that was most difficult of fulfilment. There could be no such thing as finality in these matters. What the country was fairly entitled to ask was that the Government, without committing themselves absolutely to the expenditure of money on schemes which might be valueless before the time came for their completion, should yet make such preparations as might enable them in the event of any emergency to meet it without delay. Over and over again it had occurred that before schemes for forts and other extensive works were completed a great change in the original plans had had to be made at great expense owing to various circumstances. The noble Lord had overlooked the fact that his right hon. Friend was well within his right in making the observations that he did, having regard to the statement of the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty, who, in "another place," gave as a ground for showing that the ships of the Navy were sufficient for the calls that might be made on them the fact that—

"This subject was also under the consideration of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War; and it was probable that he would have proposals to bring before Her Majesty's Government."—(3 Hansard, [294] 413.)

The House and the country were very anxious to know what these proposals exactly were. When they came to discuss the Votes themselves the Government would have to be pressed in greater detail on these matters. There certainly was an impression abroad that there was not quite that state of preparedness at some of these ports which the country had a right to expect. It was not enough to have the materials on the spot. There should be in the hands of the authorities some intelligible plan as to the means by which they would carry out their system of defence, and from time to time this system ought to be tested. He believed that when the late Government left Office there were very ample and carefully worked out plans for the defence of some of the principal ports of the Kingdom. Of course these plans required revision from time to time; but it was most important that such plans and schemes should be brought up to date, and kept in a condition to be worked efficiently without delay.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL desired to know whether any progress had been made to find out whether the large ports were willing to contribute themselves towards their own defence? The time for action had now come; and he hoped that the noble Lord would, in the statement he was about to make, re-assure the country by making it feel that no step would be left untried to settle this most important question upon a sound and adequate basis.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he had never heard such an idea expressed in the House before. In his opinion, the whole country was equally interested in the defence of the various ports; and it was altogether out of the question that the inhabitants of places like Plymouth and Portsmouth should be called upon to contribute specially to their defence, as the noble Lord opposite suggested.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL said, it was not his suggestion. The Secretary of State for War had stated, in reply to a Question last year, that the matter was under consideration how far a locality should contribute to its own defence.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the subject under discussion last year was that of commercial harbours as distinguished from military ports, and he had thrown out the idea whether commercial harbours should not contribute towards their own defence; but his remark did not apply to naval ports like Portsmouth and Plymouth.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that was a very different thing. He should like to know whether the guns were ready for the forts if they were required to be used?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, there was a part of our Dominions in North-West America which possible contingencies might render it desirable for us to look after. The coast of British Columbia, for a distance of several hundred miles, was absolutely without a harbour. During the months that preceded the ascent of our Fleet to Constantinople, Russian ships of war were cruising off the coast of British Columbia. There were two powerful Russian iron-clads, but no British Force at all. The strength of our squadron on this coast was one iron-clad and three corvettes, a force which was totally inadequate to protect the enormous range of coast, practically speaking, extending from Australia in the South to Behring's Straits in the North. Russia, no doubt, was fully alive to the importance of those possessions, and her first step, in the event of war with this country, would probably be to seize the principal harbour, which commanded the whole coast of British Columbia; and if they did this the whole of the North-West Coast would be at their mercy. He desired, however, to call the attention of the House to the subject of which he had given Notice—namely—

Colonel Stanley

“To call attention to the dissatisfaction caused by certain conditions of Army service as at present regulated, and to move, that, instead of the system of stoppages under which the soldier is called upon to pay for certain indispensable articles, these should be supplied free of charge, and the scale of pay altered, if necessary, in consequence.”

He believed that there was no point in the Military Service which caused such widespread dissatisfaction as the system of stoppages of pay. In the proclamations by which recruits were attracted to the Army certain attractions were held out for military service. There would probably be no dissatisfaction on the part of non-commissioned officers and men were the terms of the proclamation adhered to; but there was no reason why the War Department should enlist soldiers under what were practically false pretences. A short time ago there was placed at the door of the Horse Guards a proclamation which contained a direct mis-statement. It contained the catalogue of supposed advantages which men obtained on enlistment, and among them there was a statement that free rations were supplied. In the official paper it was true that a free ration of bread and meat was stipulated for. That was, no doubt, correct, because the soldier received 1 lb. of bread and three-quarters of a pound of meat per day. But he asked the House whether, if they enlisted a soldier on condition of his receiving free rations, and then gave him only 1 lb. of bread and three-quarters of a pound of beef, they were fulfilling the spirit of the proclamation under which they had attracted the soldier to the Service? He said they would not be fulfilling its spirit. The soldier got what was barely sufficient to maintain him in life, but not sufficient to maintain him in health. He received 1s. a day, which, no doubt, he calculated upon having to spend; but, as a matter of fact, he had to supply himself out of this 1s. with certain necessaries, such as tea and other groceries, and vegetables. When he enlisted he was said to be supplied with a free kit, and that was to last him for the whole time of his service—namely, seven years. In this kit he was supplied with two shirts, and if they did not last for the seven years, as he was obliged to wear a shirt under his tunic, he was obliged to supply the deficiency out of his 1s. a day. By the Regulations the soldier was bound to pipe-lay his belts—the pipe-lay he had to provide himself. Then, again, he was compelled to have the articles in his kit marked, and he was charged 1d. for each article marked. Indeed, the deductions from the soldier's pay, consequent upon and inseparable from the conditions of his service, amounted from 1d. to 7d. per day. In addition to the Regulation stoppages, there was a form of stoppage which came under the head of barrack damages. It was unfair and unjust that men should be charged for the inherent defects of articles supplied by the Government. As an instance of what he said was of daily occurrence, he mentioned that a soldier in a certain barracks in London was ordered to affix to the chimney-piece of the barrack-room a board with certain Regulations upon it. The board was supplied by the Department duly marked. In order to hang up the board the soldier had to bore two holes in it, and he was assured by the superior officer of that soldier that it was absolutely impossible to bore the holes without splitting the board. There was no cause for surprise, therefore, that the board in the course of being fixed was split, but there was considerable cause for surprise to find that the soldier was charged 10d. for a new board. Also with regard to brushes, they would not last for seven years, and the soldier had to supply new ones at his own cost, the result being that the cleanest soldier suffered the most in this respect. Then, again, a soldier was compelled to shave, and yet he was only supplied with a 1s. razor, which certainly would not last for seven years. The whole system of stoppage out of pay was a bad one, and the first Secretary for War who devised a means of putting an end to it would deserve the thanks of the Service. He asked the noble Lord the present Secretary for War to satisfy himself by personal inquiry as to the justice of the complaint of the soldiers upon this point.

If he found that they had a real grievance, he was bound to devise some means for remedying it. With regard to the question of deferred pay, he might say that there was a very strong inducement to the soldier to draw his £21 at the expiration of his first term of seven years' service. Many soldiers married without leave, and at the expiration of their first term of service they felt themselves compelled to draw their deferred pay. He suggested that at the expiration of the first term of service a soldier, upon re-enlisting, should be allowed two or three months furlough. If this course were adopted, they would keep many good men in the Service, and should induce them to re-enlist at the expiration of their first term, and thus we should greatly increase the efficiency of the Army as a whole.

MR. GOURLEY remarked, that what was required for the better defence of our commercial harbours was an organization of all our available Forces on the spot, whether Regulars or Volunteers.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME also desired to impress upon the Secretary for War the necessity for taking steps in order to prevent in some instances the calls which were now made upon the soldier for providing part of his kit out of his pay. He should do away with some of the stoppages; but before going into that he wished to say a word as to free rations. He considered it most desirable to increase the meat ration. Three-quarters of a pound of meat was absurdly little—hon. Members would not dare give such a quantity to their own servants. The ration might be free, but it was not a "ration." As to the constant re-issue a free kit, he thought that was out of the question, some men being much more careless than others. He had seen soldiers lose everything in a few weeks, whereas others could keep their kits for months most economically. There were, however, exceptions—such as the Autumn Manœuvres—where he should make special allowance. The question of deferred pay was most important. It was, indeed, highly important to see that everything was done to induce good men to stop in the Army. He was afraid, however, some Regulations had gone against that, short service being so much encouraged.

Sir Herbert Maxwell

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON urged that they should do away with the stoppages altogether. He would rather see the British soldier have some defined pay and no stoppages at all. He knew from experience that men entered the Service thinking they had 1s. a-day, whereas they soon discovered how false their hopes were. There was an important leader in The Times last year on this subject; and he thought it could not receive too much consideration, and he hoped the Secretary for War would not allow it to escape his attention. A reform in the direction would very much stimulate recruiting and increase the popularity of the Service. As regarded the deferred pay, he had always been against it, and he believed it interfered with the desire of soldiers to re-engage. He considered that soldiers, at the expiration of their term of service, should be allowed some more on leave. If this were done he believed many would re-join the Service, and would prove very valuable additions to it.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, the House would not expect him to make a lengthy reply to speeches which, although of an important character, might, he thought, have been better delivered on the same points in Committee. He could assure the hon. Baronet that this subject had been fully discussed by the Royal Commission for Recruiting; and General Peel, in introducing that Report, said that in order to make the Service more attractive it was better to increase the pay than make any alterations in the stoppages. He held that 2d. a-day would be more attractive. That was at a time when it was desirable to obtain more men for the Service. He thought hon. Members could hardly be aware of the enormous amount of money involved in this question of the stoppages. They must do one thing or another; they must leave the pay intact or reduce it pro tanto. The amount, if they were to concede this to the soldier, would be £400,000, if valued at 2d., and £80,000 was the sum estimated for stoppages for necessaries. If, on the other hand, the pay was to be reduced pro tanto, they should have to reduce the daily pay below 1s., which was the proverbial sum always recognized by the recruit. He believed this would be most unpopular in the Army and prejudicial to recruiting. Some system of stoppages for necessaries was obviously required, for otherwise the public would not be protected against the improvident soldier. They must also have stoppages for barrack damages, or great harm might be done. On all occasions on troops marching out or marching in two officers attended—one belonging to those going out and one to those coming in, and the damages were assessed in their presence. This was done in order that nothing but what was really fair should be assessed against the troops going out. There was great variety in the stoppages as between different ranks and different regiments. On active service the soldier had a free ration, and allowance was made for the wear and tear of his clothing. Having regard to the fact that the ranks were now full, and that they were under no necessity for holding out extra inducements, and considering the enormous sums involved in the stoppages, he could not, if it had been made, agree to the Motion of the hon. Baronet Sir Herbert Maxwell.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES (NUMBERS).

DEPARTMENTAL STATEMENT.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

In the Committee

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir Arthur Otway, in moving the Estimates which have been laid upon the Table, or rather in moving the first Vote for Men, and making the general Statement which is usual on these occasions, I regret that I have to say that the Estimates which we are now considering cannot be treated as final Estimates—they are rather of a provisional character. They do not represent the full demands which will have to be made upon the country for the Military Services of the year. The Estimates were in course of preparation—in fact, they were almost complete—before the catastrophe took place which we heard of in February, and, consequently, before the measures which were decided upon by Parliament, and which were subsequent to that event. The full demands which we shall have to make upon the House for the Military Services of the year cannot, therefore, be made known until a Vote of Credit is asked for after Easter. We are obtaining, as quickly as we can, the information and collecting the materials upon we hope to be able to lay before the House a full statement of what the other demands for the Military Services of the year will be; but until we have obtained that information it would be impossible, I think, and it would be inconvenient, to enter into any discussion at the present time as to what will probably be required for the Expedition in the Sudan. I will first state to the Committee the basis upon which these Estimates are framed. In addition to the ordinary Home and Colonial requirements, and for keeping 6,000 men in Lower Egypt, they also provide for an estimated expenditure of £500,000 on account of the Bechuanaland Expedition; and, as I have already stated, they provide nothing either for the Nile Expedition, or for the Suakin Expedition, or for the Suakin and Berber Railway. The original Estimate presented in the present year for the Military Services of 1884-5 was £15,930,600. In August last we obtained a Vote of Credit for £300,000 on account of the Nile Expedition, and in the course of the Autumn Session we obtained a further Supplementary Estimate of £1,000,000 for the Nile Expedition, and £675,000 for the Bechuanaland Expedition. These additions to the ordinary Estimates of the year amounted to £1,975,000. Since the Estimates we are now discussing were laid upon the Table we have had to ask for a Supplementary Estimate for £942,000, of which £672,000 were for the expenses connected with General Graham's Suakin Expedition, and £270,000 were Supplementary Estimates in respect of the ordinary Services of the year. Therefore, we have thus had £2,917,000 voted in addition to the ordinary Estimates presented last year. That brings up the total sum voted for Military Services for 1884-5 to £18,847,600, as against £17,820,700 for 1883-6, being a difference of £1,026,900. But the whole of the Supplementary Estimates to which I have just made reference, with the exception of £270,000, were for special war expenditure, these Supplementary Estimates providing a special war expenditure of £2,647,000. Therefore, the sums Parliament voted for what may be called the ordinary Military Services of the present year is £16,200,600. Of the Estimates I am now moving only £500,000 is for special, or war expenditure in connection with the Bechuanaland Expedition. We ask for £17,820,700 for the ordinary Services of the year, which is an excess over the amount voted for the ordinary Service of the previous year of £1,120,100. The occupation of Egypt accounts for £150,000—that is to say, the estimated additional cost of the Army of Occupation in Egypt is £250,000, of which only the sum of £100,000 is estimated to be borne by Egypt. Since these Estimates were laid upon the Table a slight modification has been made in the Egyptian financial arrangements, by which a larger sum than £100,000 will be paid by Egypt; £70,000 more will be paid by Egypt in aid of the Army Estimates; and the charge, therefore, in respect of Egypt, will be £70,000 less than that which is shown on the Estimates. To that extent the £150,000 required will be reduced. There has also been a considerable reduction in the military contributions to be received from the Ceylon Government, owing to a smaller part of the garrison being regarded as necessary for Colonial purposes. This, and some minor items of loss by exchanges in other Colonial military contributions, will entail an additional charge on the Estimates of £46,700. The increase of regimental and other establishments of the Army, to which I will refer by-and-bye, will cost £65,000. There is an excess in addition to the Store Vote of £680,000, and also an addition to the Works Vote of £98,300. I may state, however, that these figures do not precisely agree with the statement of the differences that was circulated to Members with the Army Estimates, because the accuracy of the statement has been affected by the circumstance to which I have referred—that since these Estimates were presented, and since the statement was made showing the difference between these and the provisional Estimates, other Supplementary Estimates have been voted containing charges for ordinary expenditure amounting to £270,000. The additional cost of the Auxiliary and Reserve Forces amounts to £79,000; and there is an increased charge for deferred pay of £30,000, and for the Clothing Vote of £17,500. The last item is, I believe, caused by the issue of additional clothing to the troops. The sum of £22,000 is required, in addition to that taken in last year's Vote, for rewards to inventors. There is also a miscellaneous increase of £7,600, causing a total increase of £1,195,700. On the other hand, it is subject to a decrease, owing to a larger estimated receipt from India and from the Non-Effective Vote of £75,000, making the total increase in ordinary expenditure of the present over the past year of £1,120,000. It is right that I should now give the Committee some explanation as to the progress of recruiting and the proposed Establishments for the year. Last year I stated, in moving the Estimates, that the large deficiency in the number of the Army which existed in 1883 made it necessary to amend, in certain respects, the term of enlistment, and steps for that purpose were being taken at the time I presented the Estimates. Up to that time the result of recruiting had been satisfactory; but the deficiency had not been materially restored. The experience of the present year has justified the anticipations which were formed as to the effect of the measures taken with regard to recruiting. The result of these measures is, that we have raised in the past year—I speak of the real, not the financial year—35,653 recruits. That addition to the number of recruits not only met the loss of the year itself, but has also given us a net gain of 7,500 men serving with the Colours. The number of effectives on January 1, 1884, including rank and file and non-commissioned officers, was 173,529 men; on January 1, 1885, it was 181,000, or an increase of about 7,500. This rate of progress in recruiting has been maintained during the portion which has elapsed of the present year. We have raised, up to March 1 in the present year, 7,442 recruits, and the number of effectives on that date was 184,209. In comparing the actual numbers with the Establishment, as voted by Parliament, I may remind the Committee that unless some such special measures had been taken as have been taken in the present year to enable us to recruit over the Establishment strength—unless this strength is exceeded at some time or other, there must be a deficiency at the time of the season for relief and for some time afterwards.

The Marquess of Hartington

The loss of the Army in India is concentrated in the months in which the reliefs are effected, but the gain to the Army is only caused by a gradual process of recruiting, which goes on during the year; and therefore, unless arrangements are made by voting an excess of 2,000 men this year to enable our Establishment to be in excess of the number agreed to by Parliament, there must be a normal deficiency at this time of the year. In March, 1884, on the Establishment of 165,386 rank and file, there was a deficiency of 2,816 on the British Establishment, and 3,570 on the Indian Establishment, or a total deficiency of 6,416. In last year's Estimate 2,600 men were added to the Establishment. With this increased Establishment of 167,986 rank and file, we have now an excess of 1,903 men on the British Establishment, and the deficiency has been reduced to 1,459 on the Indian Establishment, leaving a total excess of 430 men. The increase in the numbers to which I have referred has been mainly, though not entirely, due to the recruiting of the year. To a certain small extent it is due to other reasons, as, for instance, to the measures which were taken in August to meet the requirements of the Expeditionary Force. In August, under the 87th section of the Army Act, men were detained with their battalions who were actually serving in South Africa or in Egypt. We cannot at present state the exact number of those who were so detained, and who, in the ordinary course, would have been passed into the Reserve; but it is not very large. Further, in August, an order was issued enabling men who had joined the Reserve previous to August 10 of last year, and who had three years' service to give, to rejoin the Colours. Up to the 1st of January in the present year 1,455 Reserve men had so rejoined. I have already stated the measures taken in February upon the receipt of the news of the fall of Khartoum.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: What is the number of men who have rejoined the Colours?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Between the 10th of August, 1884, and the 1st of January this year, 1,455 men have rejoined; but I may add that our offer was to a certain extent a limited one. No man was allowed to rejoin who had not got three years still to serve. I have already stated, in moving the Supplementary Estimates, the measures that were taken in February on the receipt of the news of the fall of Khartoum in connection with the larger military operations which, in our opinion, then became necessary. I will not repeat a statement of those measures, for it would be partly a repetition and partly an anticipation of what further measures we may have to state when we make our proposal for a Vote of Credit; but on this occasion I may add that the Reserve men who have volunteered to rejoin the Colours will, on their discharge, receive deferred pay from the date of their transfer to the Reserve, and not only from the date of their rejoining the Colours. The scheme of Establishment which was laid down in 1881 by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which a large increase was made to the Establishment, has to a very great extent been disturbed by the exigencies of the Service, and has never had an opportunity of coming into real and normal operation. Notwithstanding the difficulties, however, under which this scheme has suffered, it has nevertheless worked, as far as it has had a chance, exceedingly well. The object of the scheme was to enable us, without delay, and without having immediate recourse to the Reserve, to send abroad a few battalions in the event of a small war, such as had frequently occurred. That object has been attained, and, I think, something more than attained. We have been able to despatch and maintain for a considerable time abroad 16 Infantry battalions of the Line in addition to three battalions of the Guards, these being the battalions which practically formed the First Army Corps spoken of by my right hon. Friend. The 1,400 Reserve men, of whom I have spoken as having joined the Colours, were not until February necessarily appointed to the battalions serving abroad. We have now, in addition to the ordinary Colonial battalions, eight battalions with Lord Wolseley on the Nile, besides two battalions on the line of communication. General Graham has three battalions of the Guards and three of the Line, and we have also four-and-a-half battalions in Egypt. In Egypt and the Sudan at present there are 20½ battalions, numbering 16,400 men, and by the last Return the efficient officers commanding the depôts also say that the regiments are more closely identified with their own districts. As to the quality of the recruits, that is, of course, a matter on which there would always be room for difference of opinion; but last year there were only 371 passed by the medical recruiting officers who were objected to by the commanding officers of the regiments to which they were sent. They are now under examination. There is no doubt that a large number of the recruits are enlisted young. That, as has been explained, is almost inevitable in the case of an Army raised entirely by voluntary enlistment and with a period of short service. It would be impossible, under such circumstances, to secure the men you require at all unless they were enlisted comparatively young. There is, however, no reason to believe that these men are deficient in physique as compared with the recruits obtained on other occasions; and although some who are enlisted at an early age may at the date of their enlistment be apparently somewhat deficient in physique, yet it is found that in a great number of cases they rapidly improve after a short period of service. There is no doubt that the large number of recruits that we obtained in the course of last year has been to some extent due to the depressed condition of trade and the want of employment. But there is, I think, reason to believe that the Service is becoming more popular, and that a great many of the prejudices that formerly existed, not altogether without foundation, against the Army as a Profession are now disappearing. Every effort is being made to render the Service more popular, and also to make the condition of the Reserve men who are leaving the Army a better one. Two Registers have been established, which we suppose will be found useful in this respect. The first is a Register of Recruits belonging to each parish in the district; and the next—which is one of some importance—is a Register of Applicants for Civil employment. I am glad to say that some assistance is being given in many regimental districts by persons of great influence, with the object of securing employment for Reserve men on leaving the Service. Nothing can be of more advantage to the Army than assistance of that description, because nothing can tend more to raise the character and increase the popularity of the Army than assured prospects of obtaining employment on their discharge from the Colours by men of good character. The permission to extend service, which was applied tentatively in 1843, has been made permanent. Experience has shown that there was no risk that so large a number of men as to cause a serious burden to the country would desire to extend their service, and we now no longer apply the system tentatively, but have made it a permanent one; so that a considerable step has been made in a direction which many hon. Members desire to see taken—namely, that of giving, as far as possible, free play to recruiting and allowing the men to enlist for a short time; or, if they desire it, to make a Profession of the Military Service. It is, as I have said, premature to form any estimate yet of how far the men enlisted for short service in the Guards will desire to extend their service. As to the Establishment, the net increase in the Regimental Establishment provided in these Estimates is 1,665 men. The principal items are an increase in the Infantry Establishment of 1,015; in the Medical Staff Corps of 222; in the Royal Engineers of 144; in the Ordnance Staff Corps of 82; and for the Submarine Mining Corps, of which I spoke a short time ago, 252 men are taken. The Infantry Establishment will be so modified by the subsequent arrangements which it will be necessary to explain in connection with the operations in the Sudan that it would be useless to enter into details now of measures that were intended for the ordinary Estimates of the present year, but which will be altogether modified by subsequent arrangements. All that I need say at present on that point is that in consequence of the difficulty experienced in providing drafts for battalions for Indian and Colonial service, the lowest Battalion Establishment will be again raised, so that no battalion will have an Establishment of less than 650, including the depot. As to the Militia, during the year 1884 no less than 41,900 recruits were enlisted, including re-engaged men. The number of recruits enlisted between the trainings of 1881 and 1882 was 23,432; between the trainings of 1882 and 1883 they were 32,049; and between the trainings of 1883 and 1884 they were 36,067. The Committee will see that there has been a gradual and steady improvement during the last three years. Of those 36,067, 27,000 elected to drill on enrolment. In consequence of the new system of training and the abolition of bounty, absence without leave has greatly decreased. Between the years 1876 and 1881 the percentage of recruits absent without leave from preliminary drill varied from 24 to 12. In the years 1881 to 1883, when the 10s. bounty on enlistment was partially abolished, the percentage of absentees dropped to 3·9 and 4·7. And last year, when the bounty was entirely abolished, it dropped to 1·4. I have already stated, and need not now repeat, that measures have been taken for the embodiment of a certain number of Militia regiments. All I would add is that the Returns show that the regiments selected for embodiment have responded to the call made upon them in the most creditable manner. With regard to the Yeomanry, there is nothing that I need now mention except that £3,500 has been provided to allow 3s. 6d. for two extra troop drills, the condition for the issue of this allowance being that at least two-thirds of the enrolled strength of the troop are present at the drill. As to the Volunteers, the reports are also most satisfactory. The number of efficient has increased from 199,000 in 1882 to 208,000. There is a proportionate increase in the number of officers and non-commissioned officers who have become proficient, and also of officers who have passed in tactics, the latter now numbering 627. The Force is now being armed with the Martini-Henry rifle; and, as has been stated on previous occasions, it is under consideration whether, in consequence of being supplied with a more accurate arm, some amendment might not possibly be made in the qualifications for efficiency. The change that is being made seems to offer a good opportunity for this improvement. A sum of £40,000 is provided for the camping out of Volunteers, an addition of £8,000 upon the Vote of last year. Last year the number of Volunteers applying for the privilege of going into camping training was so large that the Vote was inadequate to camp out more than 80 per cent of the applicants. Eventually, I believe the sum allotted allowed every man who attended the camp to receive an allowance. The next point to which I think I ought to call the attention of the Committee is the Vote for Military Stores. There is a large increase in the Vote upon last year, the increase being £680,000, exclusive altogether of what was granted as the sum necessary for war service. But in addition to that amount, as I have already stated, £235,000 has been voted for the ordinary service for the past year. This Vote, therefore, standing in the Estimates for next year, shows an increase of £915,000 over the original Estimates presented to Parliament for the present year. The Vote of £235,000 on a Supplementary Estimate this year was practically obtained because it was found that for many years past insufficient provision had been made for some portions of the Service. The constantly increasing demands for Naval ordnance virtually starved the provision for the Land Service. There has been a constantly increasing charge for gunpowder for the heavy guns, and there has also been an increase in small arms and ammunition in consequence of the increase of practice on the part of both the Regulars, the Militia, and the Volunteers. All these things have had the effect of reducing the amount which has been available for other purposes. The £235,000 for the present year, or the greater part of it added to the Supplementary Estimates, has been spent in making a larger addition to the provision for cocoa powder for the heaviest kind of guns. It has also been voted in part for bringing up the reserve stores which I have mentioned. It is estimated that an annual addition to this Vote of £115,000 for gunpowder and for small arms ammunition will be required; but in addition to this increase for which we ask this year it will be necessary, in my opinion, for some years to come to increase by about £150,000 the Votes for the general reserve and for necessary equipment, accoutrements, and miscellaneous articles. The subject of ordnance both for the Land and Sea Services has been sometimes dealt with in the general statement on this subject; but, in my opinion, it is at present much too large and important a question to be dealt with in a general statement. The Report of the Ordnance Select Committee to which reference has been made in a question put by the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), and answered by my hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand), has not yet been presented; and I think it would be well, before any statement is made on the subject of the naval guns or of heavy ordnance generally, that we should have that Report, and should have time to look into it. It would then be possible to make a fuller statement than can be made now.

The Marquess of Hartington

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: When will the Report be presented?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Report itself has not been received, and it would not be convenient to say anything about laying it on the Table until the Report has been received by the Department. There will, no doubt, be opportunities for discussing it either upon the Naval Estimates or upon the Vote itself for heavy ordnance. All I need say with regard to the question now is that the increase of the Vote will provide £75,000 for additional plant at Woolwich for the manufacture of heavy guns for the Navy. It will also provide £350,000 for the manufacture of additional guns for the Naval Service, which it is expected will have to be continued for five years. It also provides £155,300 for the commencement of the armament of the Colonial coaling stations. The work at these stations was commenced last year at Aden and Hong Kong, both locally and in the provision of ordnance, and steps have been already taken which have materially increased the strength of these stations pending the completion of new works. In the Supplementary Estimates £35,000 was provided for the works which are in progress at these two stations, in addition to £9,000 which has been provided by the Colonial Government or the Government of India. Next year a commencement will be made at Trincomalee, Singapore, Simon's Bay, Sierra Leone, St. Helena, the Mauritius, Jamaica, St. Lucia, and Port Elizabeth. The sum which is provided in these Estimates for submarine work and armament stores and vessels is £195,000, in addition to £67,000 which we anticipate will be provided by the Indian and the Colonial Governments. The pressure at the present moment, as I have already stated in a previous discussion on the Engineers' Department, is very great. A large number of officers are on active service in Egypt and the Soudan, or in South Africa, and a large number are always employed in India. In consequence of the strain upon the Department there has been some greater delay than was anticipated in providing for an accurate plan and survey of these works. In addition there has been, or there may be, some delay in consequence of those everlasting changes which are brought about in the progress of Artillery science which so constantly occur. This delay has necessarily at the present time interfered with final decisions as to the best modes of mounting the heaviest guns. I may add that experiments are in progress which will finally decide the question. Until it is decided progress can only be made to such an extent as is not likely to be affected by the changes required by the advance of Artillery science. On the whole, looking at the state of pressure in the Engineers' Department, and at the uncertainty which attends the question of mounting the heaviest artillery, we are of opinion that the Votes I have already referred to, and which will have to be provided in the present Estimates, will make a sufficient provision for the year. The noble Lord the Member for West Essex Lord Eustace Cecil asked what progress has been made on a subject which was discussed last year — namely, the Defence of Commercial Harbours. Now the subject of the defence not only of coaling stations, but of military ports and commercial harbours, has received a great deal of attention in past years. For reasons, however, which I stated in the course of a previous discussion, we do not think it desirable to push forward these works with greater rapidity than we are doing. We believe that the energy of the Engineering and Manufacturing Department may be for the present year advantageously applied to the construction of the defence of the Colonial coaling stations, and the pressing forward of the supply of heavy guns for the Navy. What our views are with regard to the defence of commercial harbours I think will be more conveniently and fully discussed when we come to the Vote for Fortifications. There is a good deal to be said upon it, but it would be inconvenient to include it in a general statement. I believe I have now referred to most of the principal points which are contained in the Estimates. I feel very much indebted to the Committee for the attention with which they have listened to me, and I beg to move the first Vote for Men.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 142,194, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886."—
(The Marquess of Hartington.)

COLONEL STANLEY: I think all the Committee must have followed with great interest the Statement of the noble Marquess; and I feel that, on the whole, so far as he has spoken of the operation of the measures which have been taken, and especially of recruiting, his Statement is one which, on the face of it, must appear very satisfactory to the Committee. I only hope that the noble Marquess is not led away entirely by the mere Reports made to him of the numbers and of the general disposition of the men who enlist, but that he will also take some means of personally acquainting himself with the general appearance and character of the recruits whom he gets in that way. I know a very striking instance in which this was done, and it shows that the difficulty existed then as now in the matter of recruiting, and that it is not a difficulty of the present day only. Some few years ago, when an unusually large number of recruits had been obtained, and it was naturally supposed that recruiting was going on satisfactorily, I remember my then Chief and Predecessor, Viscount Cranbrook, going down to one of the large camps and asking that the men who had enlisted in the current year, the year before, and the year previous, should be put into different lines. When this was done the effect was very striking, and it showed that we were getting recruits capable of a good deal of development. Each year showed a difference in the height and development of the men. Those who had only been in the Service for one year were the shortest and least developed; those who had been in two years were taller; while those who had been in three years were taller still. The inspection showed that during the whole of the three years the men had been only developing, which indicated what the real difficulty is in all these matters. I must say that the noble Marquess has very frankly recognized that difficulty. In this country, I suppose, as matters now stand, considering the state of the labour market, and the conditions of the voluntary service, you must expect to get a large number of very young men; and if the authorities receive them with their eyes open, and are prepared with measures to meet the difficulty that arises in consequence, then well and good. The Service under such circumstances is, perhaps, not more at a loss now than it was in former times. I have ventured to point out the difficulty; but I do hope that the noble Marquess and the officers immediately responsible to him are not led away merely by Reports of mere numbers, but that they really look to see for themselves what kind of men they are getting. What the noble Marquess has said tends to confirm my belief that we were right in 1879, and in the case of the Army Act in 1881, in laying down the principle of free trade in recruiting. The noble Marquess has gone further in that direction, and has seen his way to allow the men to extend their service still longer. The only way that we can deal with the voluntary service of this country is to make it a free service, and to allow men to extend their time by their own free will, and not by entering into arbitrary engagements. Get the best men you can get, and when you have got them, do the best you can to keep them. If that is done with due regard to the interests of the men on the one hand, and the good of the Service on the other, I am quite sure the voluntary service may be made to succeed in this country. I join issue with a good many of my military friends who find fault with the statement in the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, which, however, the noble Marquess did not refer to, as to the number of men who take advantage of the liberty they have in the first month of their service to purchase their discharge. That number is increasing, and a good deal of inconvenience is thrown upon the Service in consequence; but I believe that more good is done by allowing men to go freely and honestly than by keeping them against their will, and tempting them almost to desert. On the other hand, the point, I think, deserves the attention of the Secretary of State for War and the Military Advisers of the Crown. Allowing for all the freaks which bring men into the Service in ignorance of the sort of life they are going to lead, it does not seem to me to be right; but, on the contrary, it seems to me that there must be something wrong when the percentage of men who get their discharge so very soon is so large, and when so large a number of men who take to a soldier's life get tired of it so very soon. It is not easy to say where the fault exactly lies; but the fact does appear to me to be something rather odd, and I think something might be done, without any undue relaxation of discipline, to make the first month of a soldier's life a little more pleasant than it now is. What with drill, school, and the variety of things which he is obliged to be taught, I think very judicious arrangements are required, and we have a good index afforded in the circumstance that so large a proportion of these young men purchase themselves out of the Service after the first month. My hon. and gallant Friend sitting near me (Sir Robert Lloyd-Lindsay) says that 1,751 men have bought themselves out within the first three months. That is, of course, a very large number; but it is very much better that they should buy themselves out than that they should go without leave or without any repayment to the public. Still, it is a circumstance which is not altogether satisfactory. Then, when we come to the noble Marquess's Statement, I find after all that it is a little difficult to do what is usual—that is, enter into criticism—because, as my noble Friend, with his customary frankness, told us, neither the Establishments nor the Estimates which we are now asked to vote are, in point of fact, really the Establishments and Estimates for the year. On both sides we are told that the real Estimates for the year and the number of men are to be dealt with on a future occasion, and I presume upon a Vote of Credit, which will form the subject of a future discussion. If it is understood that the discussion, whenever it comes on, is to be a real discussion, and one which will give all the proper opportunities for criticism, I think there is nothing more to be said upon these points now. But there are certain other questions upon which I observe the noble Marquess would also like to defer the consideration until a future occasion—questions relating to guns and works. There is no doubt a disposition to agree that as all the information is not before us, these matters should not be discussed at present, as we are hardly in a position to discuss them; but although inconvenient, it would be better to discuss them now, and would be even less inconvenient, than to be placed in the position we once found ourselves in of being called upon to discuss them upon Votes which may be brought forward and forced through under pressure of time in the month of August. If that is going to be the case, then I say, whatever the inconvenience, let us discuss them now, because otherwise the postponement of them until a future occasion would virtually be the putting off of any discussion whatever. I need not say that the noble Marquess did all in his power to bring on the discussion; but that was the result, and if we consent now to postpone the discussion, it must be with the distinct understanding that a reasonable and fair opportunity, in the full sense of that term, is given to us, and that we shall not be put off, as on a former occasion, when we made a similar request. I should like to say that I hope the attention of the noble Marquess has been directed, as I think it has been, to the double recruiting which will be necessary two years hence, when the Reserve men of two successive years are going down from the Colours at the same time. The Reserve men who have continued with the Colours now for certainly another year will, when they claim to leave the Colours in order to go into the Reserves, produce an abnormal drain upon the Regimental Establishment, and a consequent strain upon the recruiting. There will not only be the ordinary demands of the year to meet, but the extraordinary demands occasioned by the rolling up of arrears which are being saved now by the men remaining with the Colours. That is a point which the authorities will do well to look to, if they have not already done so, in order to guard against the battalions being suddenly depleted. I am glad to hear, although I can only discuss it in the absence of positive information, that the noble Marquess is going to bring up the strength of the lowest battalions to 650. I think I am responsible for the provisions by which the lowest battalions were brought up to 450; but still I am free to admit now that that was by no means a satisfactory arrangement, for the tendency of small battalions is to throw a very undue and, in many cases, a cruel amount of hard work on the very few men left in the battalion to perform it. And everyone knows that there is a good deal of work to do, whether the battalion is large or small; and when you come to small battalions, and more than the ordinary duty has to be done from day to day, the work becomes very oppressive. The addition to the Store Vote—I have no doubt the noble Marquess will be able to defend it—but it certainly seems to have been very large and considerable. I noticed one expression which fell from my noble Friend with regard to the Ordnance Vote. He said that the Army Vote in some years had been a good deal starved for the sake of the Navy. I am very sorry to hear that that has been the case. Of course, we know that there always has been in connection with the Ordnance Vote an increasing pressure on the part of the Navy; and it seems to me that the time is very fast approaching when it will become a question for consideration by the authorities, partly for the sake of independence, and partly for the sake of the Votes, whether the Naval Service relating to naval guns will not have to be altogether separated from the Army Service. I suppose that it is pretty generally known that the Army in all these matters, as far as I am aware, endeavours to be loyally subservient to the more pressing wants of the Navy. If there are any guns to be made, it is the Navy and not the Army that gets the best guns. It was so when the 35-ton gun was first designed. I am speaking from memory, but I think I am right when I say that the 35-ton gun was designed for the Army; but the Navy having found it a better gun than their own, the guns were handed over from the Land to the Sea Service. And so it has always been; and although I speak with great respect of the authorities, and only express my own opinion, I cannot help thinking that practically what the whole thing will come to before long is this—the Army will manufacture its own field guns and small guns specially for the Land Service, and the naval guns, with all their complicated fittings, will become, as they ought properly to become, part of the Naval Service, and be voted in the Naval Estimates. There always had been, and there always must be, a great deal of friction in matters of detail between two great Departments. It was so in the case of the gun carriages. When they were on four wheels there was very little difficulty; but when the carriages became part and parcel of the ships, and were worked by hydraulic machinery, it became an almost imperative necessity that the Navy should be consulted about the fittings which had to be provided, and the result was that the gun-carriages for the Navy were transferred to the Naval Votes, and ever since that arrangement has been carried out. That was so even in my time, when the arrangements were not so elaborate as they are now. It think it was a step in the right direction, and now that new problems and complicated questions have sprung up in connection with naval gunnery another move in the same direction will very likely have to be made. When that is done, I hope we shall not have the Secretary of State for War getting up in his place and saying, what I am afraid many other Secretaries of State might with truth have said before him, that the Army Votes, for some years past, have been starved on account of the Navy. There are many other questions which I might ask, but they may, perhaps, be more fitly asked when we come to the Gun Vote; for I have every confidence that the noble Marquess will give the Committee an assurance, and will fully carry it out, that there shall be a real discussion, and not a sham one, on the question of guns. I should like to know what further trials have been made with respect both to machine guns and the repeating arms of our troops in the field? I know that other Services have been making experimental trials in these things, and I should like to hear whether the War Department have got beyond experiments upon a small scale with one or two guns, and whether they are trying repeating rifles and field guns of various kinds upon a larger scale? We had an interesting discussion a short time ago upon machine guns, and I think the question is one which the country is watching with considerable interest, and one in which a general hope is expressed that Her Majesty's Government will be fully alive to the advantages and value of these guns; and, while they have their own patterns already tried and approved, that they will not entirely lose sight of the newer inventions which are springing up from day to day. The noble Marquess told us about the Votes for the coaling stations. I was especially glad to hear that at last something is going to be done for Simon's Bay. Probably there is no station which, under all conceivable circumstances, is more important to our trade. There may be circumstances in which even Aden might become of less importance than it is, and in that case Simon's Bay would, of course, become still more important than it is at present. Without going into these matters—for it would be obviously inexpedient to enter into details—I do hope that the question has been looked to from the point of view of maintaining coaling stations which will enable a main route, both in regard to commerce, and, if necessary, in connection with a military force for the protection of commerce, to be kept open under all circumstances, at all seasons, and at all times. There are a good many minor matters which I might refer to; but it is hardly expedient that I should dwell upon them now. There are two or three questions, however, which I may reserve for the discussion when the Vote of Credit is asked for; but before I pass altogether from the general question, there is one thing which I omitted just now, and that is to ask a question. There is an impression—I do not know the details, and I am not in a position to state the matter as a matter of fact—but there is a very wide impression that the Cavalry squadrons which have been sent abroad have been made up, to an undue extent, by contributions from other squadrons at the expense of the efficiency of those which have been left behind. I do not know from what causes it proceeds, whether the demands of foreign service have been of a more than usually rigid character than formerly, or that the class of horses has deteriorated, or that there are not horses enough in the ranks which are fit for the work they have to undertake. But whatever the cause, it is a matter of notoriety that the Cavalry regiments have to be made up to a far greater extent than was formerly the case, and nothing can be more painful to an officer in command than to find his men asked to volunteer from the regiment for service in another. No officer likes to see his best men going away, though it may be for the public service that they should; and when the horses have been well trained and well looked after to see them taken away at a moment's notice and drafted into another squadron or another regiment to which they do not properly belong is certainly not pleasant. If this complaint is well founded, I hope that special attention will be paid to it, and that greater care will be taken, either as regards the purchase of horses, or, in keeping up the number of the establishments, to keep up also the number of horses required, and to keep them in a state of efficiency. There are several minor questions upon which I may ask for information at some future time, but I do not think it worth while to take up the time of the Committee with them now; but I do hope that the noble Marquess, when he rises to reply to all the questions that may be put to him in the course of the discussion, will be able to assure the Committee that if this Vote is, as a matter of necessity, to be passed to-night, we shall have a real and ample opportunity of discussing the great and important questions connected not only with gunnery, but the defence of our coaling stations, and the other questions to which I have referred. I do not wish to say that there is any undue suspicion on this side of the House; but the very fact of our having been cut off from such an opportunity once before obliges us to exercise the caution which proved experience renders necessary. These are all the remarks I have to make. I think the Statement of the noble Marquess, on the whole, is highly satisfactory, but I hope that in all these matters he will not be satisfied with the mere numbers given to him, but that he will look into the figures himself.

The Marquess of Hartington

Colonel Stanley

Mr. CAUSTON said, he was sorry that the noble Marquess, in the course of his very interesting Statement, had made no reference to the Staff Clerks, to the question of whose position he had kindly said, on a former occasion, he would give his consideration; but he took that to have been an unintentional omission, and hoped that in the course of the evening either he or the Financial Secretary Sir Arthur Hayter) would make some reference to that deserving body of men. When he put their case before the House last year, he took the opportunity of paying what he considered a just tribute of gratitude to the noble Marquess, when he said that the Quartermasters highly appreciated what he had done for them. But unfortunately he had since then received several communications from Quartermasters intimating that he was under a delusion, and that all the benefits, which he was under the impression that they had received, were nothing but myths; and, rightly or wrongly, the Quartermasters thought that they were the most friendless body of officers in the Army. They considered that they were slighted at Head Quarters, and that their services were hardly appreciated. He was glad to hear that evening, from the noble Marquess, that every effort was being made to render the Army more popular. He was sure that the noble Marquess had every desire to include in that statement a body of men who had always been regarded as a useful body, and who had now the feeling he had described; and he hoped that something would be done to redress the grievances of which they complained. The few remarks he should make on their behalf that night he proposed to divide into two parts; he should refer to their financial grievances, and to their grievances of a more sentimental character. His remarks applied not only to the Regimental Quartermasters, but to those of the Commissariat, Ordnance, and Medical Departments. They considered that during the past 40 years their duties had considerably increased, and that they were considerably more important—in other words, that their duties had really doubled; and they considered that during that time, instead of having gone forward in the way of promotion or money, they were in a worse position now than they were 40 years ago. One of their grievances was that, by the re-organization of the Militia, Quartermasters were deprived of their chance of serving with the Militia and of receiving what they had been in the habit of doing before—namely, their pensions from the Army and pay from the Militia. They also alleged another grievance to be that they were the only soldiers who could not get any paid promotion for services in the field; and—although they performed many important field duties, and had recently shown this in the Soudan, where they ran the risk of losing their lives, and where they had lost a greater proportion of men than any other class of officers, comparing numbers—they said they were treated not as combatant officers but—he did not want to say with contempt—in such a way that their claims and services had been quite overlooked. Another grievance which they put forward was, that whereas before the establishment of the Army Clothing Department Quartermasters had been in receipt, in connection with the clothing arrangements of regiments, of an annual sum of something like £150, and whereas the Colonels of regiments had been compensated for the loss they had sustained by the establishment of that Department to the extent of £500 per annum, the loss of the Quartermasters had been recognized to the extent of £30 per annum only, by Royal Warrant dated 28th of January, 1875, in place of the amount which they had generally received. He knew that he might be told by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Arthur Hayter) that this £150 had never been paid direct from the War Office, but that it had been received direct from the Colonels of regiments; but the case of the Quartermasters remained substantially the same. Again, by the formation of the Army Pay Department they had been deprived of their chance of becoming Paymasters, with the very great and largely increased advantages attaching to that position. Those advantages had been considerably increased since the Quartermasters had been refused admission. The Regimental Quartermasters could formerly succeed to Paymasterships, and the Commissariat and Ordnance Quartermasters used to be assistant and sub-assistant Commissaries, and could rise to the highest grade of Commissaries. In January, 1876, before the Army Pay Department came into operation, there were no less than 24 ex-Quartermasters fulfilling the duties of Paymasters, and their grievance on this point was that the remaining and future Quartermasters were made ineligible for the Pay Department, and that the full pension which they could now obtain was £200 instead of £450 granted to Paymasters. Therefore, a great grievance had to his mind been inflicted on the Quartermasters, especially those who were serving at the time when the Army Pay Department came into operation. He would say no more in regard to the financial side of that question, on which he thought he had dwelt at sufficient length, than that he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would consider that the Quartermasters had a substantial financial grievance. He would now touch on the sentimental grievance.

Mr. Causton

THE CHAIRMAN said, that without saying the hon. Gentleman was out of Order, he thought he was pursuing a course exceedingly inconvenient in Committee. The hon. Gentleman was going into details on that Vote, which would come under discussion hereafter. It would be impossible to say when the Vote would be got through if the hon. Gentleman pursued that course with regard to it.

MR. CAUSTON said, he was, of course, desirous of falling in with any suggestion that might come from the Chairman, and he was taking the present course with the object of putting the Committee to as little inconvenience as possible; because otherwise he should have placed a Motion on the Paper with regard to the grievances in question which would have come forward on the Motion "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair." Therefore, unless the Chairman desired him to abstain from further remarks upon that subject, he should prefer to continue.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that he was not prepared to say that the hon. Gentleman was out of Order, but that the course he had been pursuing, of entering into all the details of the question now, was inconvenient to the Committee.

MR. CAUSTON said, that, under the circumstances, perhaps, of having gone so far, he should save the time of the Committee by proceeding. With regard to the sentimental grievances, he might remark, as apart from the financial grievances, that they would, if redressed, benefit the Quartermasters' position much, and cost the country nothing. In the first place, the title of Quartermaster was originally intended to indicate the individual who carried out particular duties; but the Quartermasters were under the impression that the title was now used as a brand upon those officers who by merit and experience had risen from the ranks. "No, no!" He did not profess to have any great technical knowledge on this point, but he was in a position to state that the opinion was that the title of Quartermaster was a brand; and those officers said that those who rose from the ranks by merit should have the rank of Lieutenant or Captain, as other officers had, and that the title of Quartermaster should follow as a matter of course. The honorary and relative rank of Captain given to Quartermasters after 10 years' commissioned service did not raise them from the lowest rank amongst officers in their regiment or Department, and their names appeared at the end of The Army List. Therefore, it appeared that promotion from the ranks, instead of being what he was sure all desired it should be—a reality—amounted to what might be called a sham; and the Quartermasters objected that, having risen from the ranks, they, as officers, were unfairly branded by that fact. The noble Marquess a short time ago had been good enough to grant him a "Return of all the officers commissioned from the ranks of the Regular Army since 31st January 1840, exclusive of Riding Masters, Quartermasters, officers of the Coast Brigade of the Royal Artillery, officers of the Army Hospital Corps, Sub-Inspectors of Army Schools, and those who were commissioned for bravery in the field."

Now, he was not going to say one word disrespectful of those men who had been promoted from the ranks; but he wished to point out that of the total number of 58 men so promoted 44 were promoted after a service of less than 10 years. One had been promoted after from two to three years' service; 10 after from three to four; 12 after from four to five; eight after from five to six; six after from six to seven; two after from seven to eight; three after from eight to nine, and two after from nine to 10 years' service: the total number of men promoted after between two and ten years' service being, as he had stated, 44, out of a total of 58. He was not going to ask why they were promoted, or make any observation upon their promotion at all, because he was delighted to see men rise from the ranks; but the Quartermasters did feel it a great hardship that, having obtained their commissions after long, good, and faithful service, they should remain stationary with regard to rank. He would point out to the Committee that, in respect of the last 100 Quartermasters appointed, the average service in the ranks had been 18 years and nine months. He said it was—and the Quartermasters thought so—a great hardship that others should, after such short periods of service as he had mentioned, take precedence of Quartermasters in the matter of promotion. For whereas the 58 men included in the Return quoted had promotion and pay open to them to the fullest extent, the Quartermasters were blocked at the honorary rank of Captain, and, as he said, after longer and probably more important service. He thought after those remarks it was unnecessary for him to detain the Committee at greater length; but he might express the hope that he had made out a case for the Quartermasters by showing that they had both a financial and a sentimental grievance. The noble Marquess had told the Committee that evening that every effort was being made to render the Army Service more popular; and he thought he had brought before the Committee the case of a body of officers which, in the interest of making the Service more popular, was deserving of favourable consideration.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he had certainly expected that the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) would have brought forward this question on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, which he thought would have been the more convenient course. However, as the hon. Gentleman had raised the question in Committee, and as he (General Alexander) took a great interest in the subject, the Committee would perhaps allow him to refer briefly to one or two points which the hon. Gentleman had not alluded to. It was true that by a process of giving a little here and taking away a little there in 1881, the magnificent result had been achieved of giving Quartermasters an extra 4d. per day. There was also a slight pension increase; for whereas up to that time they had pensions of £182 10s., in 1881 they obtained £200 a-year. At the same time, the rank of Captain was given to Quartermasters who had served 10 years as such, and the rank of Major on retirement. He believed that this advance in rank was appreciated very much, and he would remind the Committee that it was a boon which cost the country nothing. But the Quartermasters would prefer to be made Captains after seven years, instead of after 10 years, as arranged in 1881. He would like the Committee to hear what was the position of a non-commissioned officer accepting the position of combatant officer, and what was that of a non-commissioned officer accepting the position of Quartermaster. While the combatant officer might, and often did, rise to the highest ranks in the Service, of Quartermasters it might be said—“Once a Quartermaster, always a Quartermaster.” He had himself known some non-commissioned officers who had risen to the very highest positions in the Service. After 10 years’ service Quartermasters attained the rank of Captain, with 12s. a-day. Then, comparing the position of Quartermasters with that of Paymasters, he pointed out that, whereas the Paymaster received on appointment 15s. a-day, the Quartermaster only received 9s. a-day, and whereas the Paymaster, after 10 years’ service, received £1 a-day, the Quartermaster only received 12s. a-day. Again, on retirement, the Quartermaster received a pension of £200 a-year, while the Paymaster received no less than £350 a-year. And there was another grievance of which the Quartermasters complained—namely, that only one-half of their service in the ranks was allowed to reckon for pensions. Then, whereas the duties of Paymasters were light and intermittent, and were often performed by clerks, those of Quartermasters were extremely laborious and constant. It might be said that the Paymaster had more responsibility. But that he (General Alexander) entirely denied. The Quartermaster had in his possession a greater value in the shape of stores than the amount which the Paymaster could hold at any particular time. Then, as the hon. Member for Colchester had said, they felt very much their exclusion from the Paymastership in 1877. That was the work of Viscount Cranbrook, then Mr. Gathorne Hardy, who was at the time at his wit’s end to obtain promotion for officers, in consequence of the unsatisfactory abolition of purchase, and who induced combatant officers to leave the ranks for the position of Paymasters. The Quartermasters were then excluded from becoming Paymasters. In 1882 the noble Marquess was kind enough, at his request, to move the Government of India to give Quartermasters serving with the rank of Captain in India the allowance of Captains; and he would now appeal to the noble Marquess not to allow a well-founded and well-ascertained grievance on the part of those most meritorious officers to remain unnoticed at this particular period. He would like to make one or two remarks with respect to the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, and he could not help expressing his regret that this was the last Report they would receive from that excellent officer Major General Bulwer. Whatever differences of opinion might exist, and whatever views they might take of long and short service, they could not fail to acknowledge the distinguished ability and impartiality which had always characterized his Reports. There was one portion of the Report in which he was happy to say all could agree—namely, that in which the Inspector General especially condemned the system of attenuated battalions, of which there were no fewer than 35 last year. He would not refer to this subject minutely, because the noble Marquess had said that these battalions were to be got rid of, and that battalions of 650 rank and file were to be established in their place. [The Marquess of HARTINGTON: Including depôts.] The Inspector General of Recruiting, in condemning those attenuated battalions, spoke of the way in which they were hampered in the performance of garrison duties; and those garrison duties were very important at the present time, for they could not, in these days of dynamite outrages, dispense, as they had hoped to do, with a certain number of sentries, and trust entirely to the police. He found, in the Report, that not only did the Inspector General condemn attenuated battalions, but he condemned also the frequent change in the establishment of battalions; he wished that the establishment of battalions at home should be of more uniform strength, as in that case a supply of recruits would in time become annually more equal, and thus a certain proportion of the battalion would be composed of men fully trained and available for duty. In other words, the Inspector General thought, as he (General Alexander) did also, that there should not be a great variety of battalions, and that their present system was too complicated. He (General Alexander) thought, if they had one peace establishment and one war establishment, it would be sufficient. Why should they not content themselves with a peace establishment of 750 rank and file, and a war establishment of 950 rank and file? The battalion of Grenadier Guards sent out the other day was a fine battalion, because it contained the pick of three battalions. Therefore, he would take that opportunity of asking the noble Marquess to consider whether it would not be advisable to add at the present time another battalion to the Coldstream Guards, and another battalion to the Scots Guards, because he was satisfied that by doing so their efficiency would be greatly increased. He did not see why the battalions of the Guards, which, as an hon. Gentleman pointed out the other day, went so frequently abroad, should not be increased in number, and why those three regiments should be of unequal strength. He would also like to say a few words with regard to the new system of recruiting adopted in the Guards—that was to say, the three years' system established in June, 1843, and for which the Inspector General claimed that it had been a great success. But it must be remembered that this experiment was tried under exceptional circumstances. They were told by the Inspector General that all the agencies of recruiting were set to work in every district, in order to obtain recruits for the Guards, and to make known throughout the country the great advantages of that service. But it appeared to him to be a little premature to say whether the system had or had not been a success, for they must remember that there still existed in the battalions of the Guards a considerable number of old soldiers, and a great deal would depend on the circumstance as to whether a considerable number of men enlisted under the three years' system were induced to prolong their service with the Colours. He might inform the Committee that up to the 25th of February, 1,163 men had enlisted in the Grenadier Guards under the system of short service, and that out of that number exactly 173 men, or 14.84 per cent, had consented to prolong their service with the Colours. That, the Committee would admit, was not a very large number, and he was afraid that unless they obtained a greater number there would be some difficulty in obtaining a supply of good non-commissioned officers. With respect to the men, the numbers obtained were considered by the Inspector General to be exceedingly satisfactory. But what about the quality of the men; what did the General Officers of the district say in their Reports with respect to the quality of the recruits? There were 13 of these Reports, and only three of them were distinctly favourable, and they came from the Home District, from Scotland, and from Jersey. Jersey, he thought, they might leave altogether out of account, as coming from a not very important recruiting district. The general tenour of all the other Reports was that the recruits were a great deal too young, and that their appearance ought to show those who enlisted them that they were too young. The Inspector General (Major General Bulwer), when quoting the Reports, urged, with perfect truth, that provided time was given young men would ultimately become the best soldiers. But the question was would time be given? Time, no doubt, was a very important factor in the case. For instance, they heard a great deal the other day about the 3rd Battalion of the Rifle Brigade, that went out to Gibraltar with half its battalion consisting of boys, and more than 200 of them had not gone through any course of musketry. If time were given—if the Mahdi or the Russians would give them time—no doubt, that battalion would prove a very efficient battalion. He was glad to see that the Military Authorities were at last becoming alive to the circumstance that it was necessary to institute, at any rate, a partial return to the system of long service, because, instead of, as formerly, doing their very best to induce soldiers to enter the Reserve, they were now doing all they could to induce men to prolong their service to 12 years; nay, more, he was informed upon the very best authority that a man having served 12 years and wishing to prolong his service to 21 years, and thus get his pension, was scarcely ever refused. That was a very important point, and it was a most valuable testimony on the part of the Authorities to the advantages of long service.

Mr. Causton

General Alexander

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, he thought it might be convenient to the Committee that he should state what the views of the Department were with regard to the two classes of men the hon. Gentleman the Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) had alluded to. First of all, as to Military Staff Clerks. He had made a very careful analysis of their pay, and he found that they received on appointment 3*s.* 6*d.* a-day, and they ranked with sergeants, who received only 2*s.* 8*d.* a-day. They then rose 6*d.* a-day every three years to 5*s.* a-day, and at each step they received a very considerably higher rate of pay than the sergeants with whom they ranked. For instance, the Colour Sergeants with whom they ranked after three years' service received 3*s.* a-day, and they received 4*s.* When they rose to the highest grade they were paid 5*s.* a-day, as against 4*s.* paid to Quartermaster Sergeants; therefore, with regard to pay, they received in all the ranks in which they served considerably more than the regimental men. Now as to pensions. They received 3*s.* 6*d.* a-day pension after 12 years' service, and 4*s.* 6*d.* a-day after 21 years' service, whilst the maximum amount of pension paid to a non-commissioned officer was 2*s.* 9*d.* It had been said that there was no opportunity for these men to rise in the Service; but he found that posts open to regimental sergeants were open to them, and that if they obtained Quartermasterships they received a Quartermaster's pay. The Department were, however, making some changes this year, which it was hoped would even improve the position of the men. Well, then, with regard to the Quartermasters. He was obliged to trouble the Committee with a few figures, because he had had to compare the present position of the Quartermasters with their position before the Warrant was issued in 1881. Now, the advantages they had received were these. Before the Warrant was issued a Quartermaster of Infantry received 8*s.* 2*d.* a-day, rising to a maximum after 32 years' service of 13*s.* 2*d.*; after the Warrant the Quartermaster received on appointment 9*s.* a-day, and after 20 years' service (commissioned) 15*s.*, rising by successive increments after five, 10, and 15 years' service. With regard to his pension. Before the Warrant a Quartermaster received 5*s.* 6*d.* a-day after 15 years' service, and 10s. a-day after 30 years' service; he now received after 15 years' service £150 a-year, after 25 years £180 a-year, and after 30 years £200 a-year. As regarded pay and pension, therefore, the Quartermaster's position had been improved by the Warrant. He was also given by the Warrant after 10 years' service the honorary and relative rank of Captain, while formerly he did not obtain that rank until retirement—and the rank carried with it widow's pension and increased allowances. Something was said by his hon. Friend Mr. Causton with respect to promotion. Article 60 of the Warrant provided—

"A Quartermaster or Ridingmaster who may be recommended for promotion by our Commander-in-Chief, and who shall have passed such a professional examination as may be fixed from time to time by our Commander-in-Chief, with the approval of our Secretary of State, may be granted a commission as a lieutenant in our Cavalry or Infantry, provided he shall not exceed the age of 32 years."

And Article 7 provided—

"A Lieutenant shall be eligible for promotion to the rank of Captain after two years' service in our Army."

Of course, it might be said that very few accepted this promotion, or would be likely to. The reason, probably, was a financial one. The pay of a Lieutenant was only 5s. 3d. a-day, while that of a Quartermaster was 9s. a-day; and in addition to that, a Lieutenant, even if he rose to the rank of Captain, had to leave the Service at 40 years of age, but a Quartermaster was able to stay on full pay until he was 55 years of age. Well, then, something was said about the rank service. Rank service was reckoned for combatant officers, and for all officers appointed to Departments of the Army at half the service in the ranks. Article 425. Thus Paymasters had no advantage over Quartermasters. He heard that one of the grievances of the Quartermasters was that they received no increase beyond the maximum after 30 years' service; but neither did Lieutenant Colonels, Commissariat or Ordnance Store officers, or Surgeon Majors, or, he believed, any rank. If half the claims of the Quartermasters were granted, £40,000 a-year would be the charge—£80,000 for the whole. No doubt, Quartermasters did not now so frequently obtain Paymasterships; but that was in consequence of the change which, after very full consideration, was adopted by Mr. Secretary Hardy. He Sir Arthur Hayter thought it would be a very bad step for them to raise the age for promotion, because in all probability they would fill the higher ranks of the Army with old men. Considering the immense expense which it would involve, and considering that the men whose case his hon. Friend (Mr. Causton) had taken up were in all respects better off than they were before the Warrant of 1851, it was not possible for his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington to entertain the request which had been made.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT said, he thought the hon. Member for Colchester Mr. Causton had done good service by bringing the case of the Quartermasters before the Committee, and he also thought that the clear way in which his hon. and gallant Friend (General Alexander) had stated the case of these men deserved somewhat more consideration at the hands of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) than it had received at the hands of the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Sir Arthur Hayter). He also agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend (General Alexander) that they were deeply indebted to General Bulwer for the Annual Statement he had made since he had occupied his present position; that Statement was clear and explicit, and gave them every detail and every information; and they would indeed be sorry to lose the services of General Bulwer, which had been of great advantage to the public. He Sir Walter B. Barttelot desired at that moment to call the attention of the noble Marquess the Marquess of Hartington to the peculiar position in which they were now placed. They had had already presented the Supplementary Estimates for the Army, and they had now received the Army Estimates themselves; but these Army Estimates were not the Army Estimates which they would have to deal with presently. A very large increase was to be made in the Army, and the noble Marquess considered that the proper time to discuss this increase would be when the Vote of Credit was brought on. He Sir Walter B. Barttelot ventured to say that no fair or proper discussion could be raised when they came to the Vote of Credit, because that Vote of Credit would be taken more upon political issues than upon military issues. The Vote of Credit would be debated, and debated most keenly, no doubt, from both sides of the House, and, in his opinion, very little of the real question—that was the increase of the Army—would enter into view, because all the many considerations connected with the occupation of Egypt would chiefly occupy the attention of hon. Members. He asked them, was it not fitter that some opportunity should be afforded for discussing the Estimates proper, because it would be quite impossible to discuss the Vote of Credit upon its merits? He also desired to remind the noble Marquess that when they came to discuss the Vote of Credit, it would not be the ordinary Members who usually took part in military discussions who would speak; it would not be those alone who, perhaps rightly or wrongly, thought they knew something about military matters; but the discussion would be carried on chiefly by all those hon. Members who were interested, on one side or the other, in the occupation of Egypt by an English Army; therefore, he thought he and his hon. Friends had some right, before the Vote was passed that night, to demand that they should have a proper opportunity of discussing in detail the proposals which the noble Marquess had to make. Now, there was one remark which the noble Marquess made which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was exceedingly sorry to hear. The noble Marquess said they were only going to increase the Army simply on account of the present war in the Sudan. Now, there was no man who had had such an opportunity as the noble Marquess of knowing the exact position and condition of their Army; and, therefore, if the noble Marquess were to get up in his place and say that the position of their Army was satisfactory, or had been satisfactory during the time he had been in Office, he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would be very much astonished. The noble Marquess knew perfectly well that there was a great want of men to do duty in the Home Army. If there was one thing more patent than another it was the want of men of sufficient age to send out to the Army abroad, and that whenever they were occupied in any war, however small, they were completely put upon their beam ends, and were obliged to go to the utmost of their resources to fill up the Army abroad. He knew it would be said that they had a Reserve which they could always fall back upon; but he thought the Reserve had been very much damaged of late by being called upon to serve at times when it never expected to be called upon. The men had been taken away from Civil employment at home so frequently that those who willingly employed them at the outset, believing that they were not going to be employed abroad again, were often bound to refuse to re-engage them when the necessity for their employment was over. It was because he had felt so strongly on this point, and because he had always felt that the depletion of the regiments at home to send out efficient men to the regiments abroad had made their Army at home so inefficient, that he had always urged a considerable increase of the Army. That was a question which was raised when short service was introduced. It was never supposed for a moment that the Army was to remain as it was, but it was always understood there was to be an increase in the number of men. But they had a Government pledged to retrenchment, and the bottom of the whole mischief, both in regard to the Navy and the Army, and their foreign coaling stations, and their home defences, was that it was very difficult to get the money. It was because the Government did not like to raise the money that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War was obliged to resort to the expedient of saying, with regard to the two latter questions, that when a proper and mature plan was presented the Government would be ready to take it into consideration. But, supposing they were attacked in the meantime, where would they be with their great Arsenals undefended, where would they be when their Fleet was engaged elsewhere? Their preparation at home was to be delayed until some maturity was arrived at. Of course, half a defence was better than no defence at all, and he hoped the noble Marquess was entertaining the matter more seriously than he had shown in his speech that night when he said the Government could not consider the question until there was something more definite upon which they could act. Now, he would like for one moment to turn to what was an old Army Return, but, after all, the newest with the exception of the monthly. In the Army Return for last year very valuable information was given with regard to the waste that took place amongst the recruits. The waste was still great; it had not stopped, though at some times it was considerably less than at others. In the years 1881-2-3, he found there were no less than 83,156 recruits enlisted, and that the total falling off or waste in those years was 15,579, leaving only 67,577; therefore, that confirmed what his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) said—that they had not yet found any means of stopping the waste in the Army. He was glad to find that this year 35,653 recruits had joined the Service; but he would like to know how many of those men were still in the Service; how many had left? He remembered very well the occasion on which the noble and gallant Lord, Lord Wolseley, who was now commanding so well out in the Soudan, boasted that they had enlisted upwards of 33,000 men in the year; but it must be borne in mind that at the very moment the noble Lord was speaking between 3,000 and 4,000 of those recruits had wasted away and were not to be found. There was no doubt that this year there had simply been a repetition of the past, and it would be for the noble Marquess to see if he could not find out some means by which men might be prevented from leaving the Service. Surely there ought to be some means of preventing the great waste which now went on. As a general rule, if recruits got over the first six or eight months they continued in the Service, and made most excellent soldiers; it was the first six or eight months of service that broke them down and cooled their zeal for Her Majesty's Army. In regard to stoppages, there was great room for improvement; free rations, too, might be given. Of course, with regard to the kit, it was impossible to give everything that was asked; but more might be done in that direction than had been done hitherto, and at no very great cost. When they took a recruit and worked him as he was now worked, when they forced him into a position for which he was unfit, when they put him on sentry and to do duty before he was really half-drilled, the man found he was in a position he did not expect to be in. Men were forced on at an unreasonable rate because there was a scarcity of men in the regiments; and, therefore, it was a satisfaction to hear what the noble Marquess said the other day though he was rather inclined to go back from his statement to-day—that there was to be a considerable increase in the depôts. How was it that the Guards and Rifles and Marines were in such a good position? It was because the men, at the outset, were properly drilled, and were not sent away to go upon duty until they were fit to be put in the ranks. Was that so with line regiments? Could it be expected that the discipline of a regiment would be perfect if men were sent to join them before they were properly drilled? He noticed that the desertions had been 4,478—rather more than they were last year; but into that question he did not propose at that moment to go. There was, however, one question which he was in hopes might have been touched upon that night—namely, the increase of the regiments serving abroad and those first for duty at home, and the depôts of those regiments which had both the battalions abroad. Into that question, too, he would not go further, except to say that he did hope that a substantial increase in the Army would be made, because it was impossible, without such an increase, for the duty of the Army in their garrison towns and elsewhere to be carried on, except under great privations to the men who had to perform it. An increase of the Army was not alone required for warlike purposes, but simply to insure the proper protection of the nation. With all their interests, not only at home but abroad, and considering the vast amount of money which the country was called upon to expend, no reasonable man could admit that their Army was in a proper and fit condition. He had a few words to say about the Cavalry, because he could only compare the proposed increase in that branch of the Service to a drop in the ocean. He was speaking in the presence of a most distinguished Cavalry General, Lieutenant General Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram, and if he therefore said anything which was not absolutely correct, that hon. and gallant Gentleman would, he was sure, correct him. He knew that he and his hon. and gallant Friend did not agree on all military questions; but as to the necessity of keeping up the most efficient Cavalry Force they certainly were agreed. There was a most remarkable statement made the other day in the papers by an hon. and gallant Gentleman of 30 years' service. He did not know whether the attention of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had been directed to that statement. Looking at the use of Cavalry in the present day, looking at the number of Cavalry they had at home, if there was one thing they ought to be more particular about than another it was that their Cavalry regiments should be efficient. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War could not possibly say that it was a wise or prudent thing to pick all the best men out of the Cavalry regiments and send them, as they had been sent recently, to the Soudan to form Lord Wolseley's Camel Corps; such a thing could not possibly contribute to the efficiency of the Cavalry regiments left behind. Whenever it suited the convenience of right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench, they were apt to say they liked to imitate what was done abroad. Let them, however, follow the foreign Armies with regard to their Cavalry and with regard to their Artillery. The Cavalry regiments in foreign Armies were always kept up to war strength, and our regiments ought always to be kept up to that strength. They were constantly reading in the papers of some new organization being required for the Cavalry. Now, if there was one thing more mischievous than another it would be to make the organization of the Infantry applicable to the Cavalry; for this country a Cavalry regiment must be complete in itself. It ought to be of such a strength that it could easily be increased when sent abroad, and it ought always to be 600 strong. Let them see how the regiments stood at that moment. He noticed that there were 10 regiments stationed in Great Britain from October 15, 1883, to October 14, 1884, and their establishments, if complete, were eight regiments of 469, and two regiments of 600, making an aggregate of 4,952. Now, in this one year, looking to the various losses from all causes, without particularizing such losses, they amounted to the very large number of 1,745. He admitted that 430 were sent out to form the Camel Corps in the Soudan; but they were lost to the establishments at home, and could not be considered to add to the efficiency of the Home regiments. When it was borne in mind what heavy work that of a Cavalry regiment was, what fatigue duties the men had to perform, what guards the men had to do, it was unwise that the regiments should be burdened with young and untrained soldiers. It would be well if the noble Marquess were to inspect the Cavalry regiments, for then he would see in what an inefficient state they were. Why, there was one Cavalry regiment of 469 men who, within the past 18 months, had received 255 recruits; another regiment within the same period had received 244 recruits, and a third 252 recruits. He would take two regiments with regard to which the noble Marquess had spoken as having sent two squadrons of each with the Force sent to Suakin under Sir Gerald Graham. The Hussar regiment which was first for duty, which consisted of 600 men, had sent two squadrons to the Soudan, and yet it had received 310 recruits during the past 18 months. The 5th Lancers, which were on a lower establishment, had received 254 recruits during the past 18 months, and had sent two squadrons to the Soudan. Now, he would put it to the noble Marquess whether it was possible that recruits could do their duty under such circumstances as those? He saw his hon. Friend the Surveyor General of Ordnance (Mr. Brand) smile at that statement. He should like to see the hon. Gentleman himself do the duty of one of those men—just for a week. If the hon. Gentleman knew anything of the circumstances, he would know what hard work those men had to do. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would go the length of saying that at the present time if there was one arm of the Service which ought not to be neglected it was the Cavalry. There was one other matter which the noble Marquess had said little or nothing about—that was the question of Mounted Infantry. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was glad that the Mounted Infantry had not been turned into Cavalry regiments. He was convinced that the best men they could find in the Infantry regiments, given proper opportunities for instruction, and whose officers were encouraged to learn their duties, were the best men who could be found for a certain class of service. They ought to have every opportunity for becoming proficient, and facilities ought to be given at Aldershot and elsewhere. He would ask the noble Marquess whether he had turned his attention in that direction, and whether he had done anything to help, establish, and foster the idea that that branch of the Service was one which required development? The point was one which would commend itself to everyone interested in the Service. And now just one word with regard to the Reserve. He admitted, and admitted freely, that the Reserve stood far better than it had ever done—that was to say, they had 39,244 men in the First Class Army Reserve, and he supposed they had something like 30,813 in the Militia Reserve, making a total of 70,057. The noble Marquess had kept in the Army a certain number of men who should have passed into the Reserve, and he had also asked for volunteers from the Reserve. He thought that was a wise course to take in both those cases; but he should like to know how many men had volunteered from the Reserve to serve again in the Army? When the noble Marquess replied, perhaps he would be able to tell them, because it would be interesting to know how many men had volunteered since the order was first given.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have told the hon. and gallant Member how many men there were up to the 1st of January.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOTT: The noble Marquess gave us so many figures that I could not understand from his speech how many men there were. No doubt, he gave us a figure—

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I said that 1,400 men had volunteered up to the 1st of January.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOTT: The noble Marquess said 1,400. Well, he was very glad to think that that number had volunteered; but he would like to ask the noble Marquess whether he considered 1,400 volunteers, out of 39,000 men, was satisfactory—whether he thought it satisfactory that only 1,400 men should volunteer from the Reserve at such a time of emergency as the present? The country asked the Reserve to volunteer, and only 1,400 responded to the call.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I say up to the 1st of January; I do not know how many have volunteered since.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOTT said, that if the noble Marquess declared that he did not know how many volunteered since the 1st of January, he would say nothing further about it except to continue in this way, that why he had urged so strongly an increase to the Army itself, and why he should always continue to do so, was because he thought that when emergencies arise, unless they were very great ones, they had no right to trench upon the Reserve. The Reserves were all they would have to depend upon in the case of the greatest emergency, and if they used them up on the first blush in all these small wars, where would they be when they had to face some great European complication? Why, they would then have nothing to fall back upon; and he ventured to say that by relying upon the Reserves as they were now doing a great mischief was done to that arm of the Service itself. When the Reserves were taken out for occasions that were not of the first magnitude, civilians would cease employing them in proportion as they knew their services were not to be relied upon for any length of time. Ordinary employers of labour would have nothing to do with these men when they knew they were liable to be taken for service in the Army on the smallest provocation, and when it was known also that there were plenty of means of increasing the Army in other ways. The men themselves must be dissatisfied, seeing that when they enlisted it was on the understanding that they should not be called out as Reserves except in case of a great National emergency. No doubt, it might be argued that a great emergency now existed; but the other wars into which they had entered were not cases of such emergency, therefore he urged, and urged most strongly, that the case of the Reserves was a peculiar one, and one that did deserve far more consideration than what had yet been given to it. Look at the cost of increasing the Army. The cost to this country of the Army itself was not to be measured by the number of pounds, shillings, and pence that was paid for it. Their Army was a voluntary one—look at the class of men they got into it. It was the making of many of them taking them into the Army. A very large proportion of them would have done nothing else if they had not enlisted; and yet even many of those who had been the very worst, when they got into civil life after their service in the Army, proved to be most valuable servants to those who engaged them. If they looked abroad they would see that the men in the Army were taken from various occupations—many of them were skilled artizans who earned large sums of money for their country. Many of the men serving in Continental Armies had been capable, before enrolment, of earning eight or 10 francs a-day, whereas their pay when in the Army was only one franc a-day. Could they compare the case of those countries with that of England? Certainly England was in the best position she possibly could be in in that respect. They were giving employment to men who probably would not otherwise be employed, and at the same time saving the nation from using higher skilled labour which could be turned to better account than employing it in the Army. He had only one word more to say, and that was with regard to a Force with which he had had a great deal to do—namely, the Volunteers. He was sorry to hear that the noble Marquess, though he was going to do something, was not going to do as much as he thought the circumstances of the case required. They might depend upon it, it was a most desirable thing to encourage the Volunteers to go into camp; and to his mind it would be most advantageous to set aside a certain amount of camp equipment for the men. All the expense that it cost the battalions when they got into camp should be paid for them. If they wanted that Force to be efficient and well-disciplined, that was the way to bring that desirable state of things about. The Volunteers were becoming a highly valuable Force to the country, and the more the Authorities tried to instil into them the principles of discipline, so much the more would they be of use to the nation. He would, in conclusion, say they would have an opportunity later on of talking about the two Army Corps, which he hoped the noble

Marquess would tell them were to have all their transport and commissariat, and all that which was so essential in warfare, attached to them. Up to the present the arrangement of those Army Corps in that respect—namely, with regard to commissariat and transport, had entirely failed. He hoped the noble Marquess would be able to say that those Army Corps were to be completed in every sense and in every way. One more word. He, for one, was rejoiced to find that their Colonies had shown such a determination to come to the succour of the Mother Country. He only hoped that the Mother Country would extend to them that good feeling, and that friendly hand which at first he was afraid they had given grudgingly, because he believed the safety and security of the Empire depended upon their being a united people.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that that was the time to discuss questions connected with the financial part of these Estimates, because the future occasion for the discussion of Army matters promised by the noble Marquess would be occupied by very different matter. If the Committee was to have any control whatever over these large Estimates, now was the time to go into them. He must thank the noble Marquess for having framed the Estimates this year with the addition he had asked for last Session, by separating the Supplementary Estimates from the original Estimates of the year. In that way the Committee was able to see at a glance the increase which they made in the normal Estimate of the year. But there was one thing he had suggested which had not been done. He had asked that the estimated increase and decrease should be made on the current Estimate each year, with the original Estimate of the past year; not on the original Estimate of one year, with total Estimate, original and supplementary, of the past year, because it was impossible to form a fair Estimate in that way. He would like to give an illustration of what he meant. In this year's Estimate they had an increase on the Establishment of £722,000, and parallel to it were the decreases upon last year's Estimates amounting to £732,000. Those amounts nearly balanced themselves, and no great damage appeared to be done; but if the Estimates were prepared in the way he asked, showing the real increase of the Estimate now asked for, and the real Estimate asked for that time last year, a very different state of things would be found to exist. He did not understand why the Committee should not have placed before it, in clear figures, the increase they were asked to vote, that they might know year by year the increase that was made in the Estimates. As the Estimates were now framed they saw in large figures a net decrease of £84,900, whereas in reality there was an increase of £1,890,100. He was aware that the matter was explained at the end below the big figures; but it did not catch the eye, and they were flattering themselves that they were voting a decreased sum this year, when really they were voting an increase, and in that way the Army Estimates mounted up year by year to a very large sum; the Estimates of the country were increasing £1,000,000 a-year steadily. During the last 10 years they had increased at that rate, the increase having been for that period £10,000,000 by this system of preparing the Estimates. His contention was that they did not know what they were doing, and, therefore, as the noble Marquess had complied with half his request, he would strongly urge him now to comply with the other half. The plan he proposed would make the plan very simple, and would not cause any official inconvenience. Beyond that he wished to draw attention to one point, and to one point only. It was a matter to which he had drawn attention last year on these Estimates. It was with regard to the great falling off of the Militia of the country. He forgot the exact case he quoted last year, but the falling off had been very large, especially in regard to the officers; but he would draw attention to the matter as it stood this year. There were of officers enrolled now 2,777, whereas in 1883, or two years ago, there were 3,290 enrolled. That was to say, the country had 513 Militia officers fewer this year than she had two years ago. Then, if they took the number of officers in training they would find that though the number of the Establishment was 3,579, there were only 2,347 at training, or a difference of 1,232. Out of the number enrolled, small as it was compared with what it was two years ago, no less than 395 were absent on leave. He could not think there was any energy in the Service and any real desire on the part of officers to do their duty when they saw such a large number of officers on leave of absence and away from training. Then, with regard to privates, he found the Establishment was 121,000 odd privates—the figures were so small in the Estimates that it was almost impossible to read them, and he was not sure, therefore, that he was quoting correctly. Last year the number was 122,629, showing a difference of nearly 1,000 less this year on the Establishment than last. How it was that the Militia had been reduced in that way he did not know; but, as a matter of fact, the number required to complete the Establishment were 2,000 more this year than they were last. The noble Marquess told him last year that he had taken steps to deal with this matter, and hoped that the Militia would rally, and that they would find that the difficulty under which they were suffering would be removed, and that additional Militia would be added to the Establishment. He Sir Alexander Gordon was sorry to say, however, that if these figures were correct—and he had no reason to doubt them—the depletion of the Militia was going on very rapidly. With regard to the Adjutant General's Return, dealing with recruiting in the Army, he was struck by the reference to the large number of men who obtained their discharge by purchase before the expiration of three months' service. Some hon. Members would remember that the clause bearing upon this matter was inserted in the Act of 1881 for the first time. Instead of a recruit being able to pay £1, he thought it was, of "smart money" within 24 or 48 hours of enlistment, that privilege was taken away, and it was enacted that a man had first to be enlisted, was to be attested immediately on the same day, and to have no chance of escape unless he paid £10. According to communications received from officers in the recruiting service, it was clear that large numbers of men tried to get off, but were unable to obtain the money. On page 22 of the Report it would be found that no less than £76,490 had been paid into the Exchequer by poor lads who had enlisted in order to get out of the Service, into which they had been inveigled, within three months of their taking the shilling. That seemed to him to be a great hardship. Another point was with regard to recruiting officers being allowed to act as magistrates and swearing in the recruits. That system had been forbidden up to 1881, and it was only then that these officers were allowed to act in the capacity of Justices of the Peace for the purpose of administering the oath. The recruit was made in the street and taken into the barracks; the commanding officer swore him in at once, and the man was fixed, and unable to get off without paying £10. He had protested against that system when the clause was put into the Act, and he was sure that all officers who had ever had anything to do with the recruiting service knew how unjust it was. In 1880, 1,400 men purchased their discharge; in 1881, 1,400; in 1883, 1,500; and last year, 1,751. The number of young men who acted in this way seemed to be increasing, and that, as hon. Members would see, did not tend to make the Service more popular. For the Service to be popular young men should enter it and remain in it willingly. At present it was evident that a great number of men were unwilling. He thought this matter was worthy the attention of the noble Marquess. The system seemed to be one of forcing young lads to take the shilling, and then compelling them, by the alternative of this £10 fine, to remain in the Service.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

LORD ALGERNON PERCY said, that after listening to the speech of the noble Marquess, it was impossible not to lament that the Statement made by the Minister for War differed very materially from the opinion of all officers who were at present serving in the Army, and from all those who had any knowledge on the subject. Indeed, he believed that it also differed very much from the real opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers themselves. They were invariably told that the Army was in a most efficient condition, and that they were capable of despatching a large Force at a moment's notice to any part of the Empire, and were able to meet any emergency that might arise; whereas it was perfectly well known that the real facts of the case were very different. The noble Marquess had prided himself a good deal upon the fact of the despatch of a Force to Egypt the other day without any delay, and he thought the noble Marquess said without any dislocation of the Service. Well, he (Lord Algernon Percy) would deal with that subject in a few minutes. He believed that, although there was no delay, the dislocation in the Service was very considerable, and he could not help feeling that it was rather a pity that Ministers for the time being did not meet the case boldly and state what they really knew to be the fact—namely, that the Service required a great deal to be done to it in order to render it efficient, because he was convinced that the House and the country would be willing to vote any sum that was absolutely required to bring about that efficiency. As it was, the country was paying a large sum of money for the Army, and was not really getting the article it ought to possess. They were told that a certain number of regiments were to be so many strong—were to be increased to 650 strong, and certainly the officers in the Army had thought that that would be a great improvement; but their joy was at once damped when they learned that the number was to include the depôts. That made a great difference, and made the increase to the regiments very small indeed. People who knew very little about these matters—probably the House generally—would think, when they heard of a regiment being 650 strong, that it implied that the regiment contained that number of fighting men; but such was not the fact. He would undertake to say that if the noble Marquess were to take the trouble to go down and attend a parade unexpectedly—because if his coming were known an effort would be made to get together a large number of men, and a great many who under other circumstances would be employed in other duties would be brought to parade—he would find a regiment of, perhaps, 600 strong, parading 100, or not 150 men. He would find that at least half the men were recruits, who had lately learnt their drill, and not one of whom had ever fired a shot out of a rifle, and the remainder would be composed of men on garrison fatigue, on duty as orderlies or cooks, or in the other casual duty that had to be performed in every regiment. The few men left on duty would be old soldiers who were feeling extremely dissatisfied with the amount of extra work thrown upon them. The recruits of which such a large number would be found, would be men incapable of doing a great many things that old soldiers had to do, such as guard duty. A letter which had been written by General Fraser to The Morning Post on the 10th of this month, had been referred to. That officer had pointed out that many of the Cavalry regiments had had half their number recruited within the last 18 months. That was the case also with regard to Line regiments. It was impossible to describe regiments so incomplete and so unfinished as efficient. They were not efficient at all, and certainly were not prepared for any service that might be required of them. With regard to the question of fatigue, he must submit it would be a good thing if a system could be arrived at by which fatigue duty could be lightened. At all quarters and camps throughout the Kingdom, the amount of Government fatigues, as they were called, was very large indeed. All the work of the different stores was performed by privates who were taken out of the camp when they ought to be employed in drill. The period of service was short enough, Heaven knew, and it ought not to be wasted in this manner, but should be employed in teaching the men their duty as soldiers; it should not be frittered away by this fatigue duty, gymnastics, and every sort of work except that of learning the duty of a soldier. On this matter he was not speaking from his own experience solely, but he was fortified in the opinion he was expressing by such an eminent and distinguished officer as General Fraser. The fact was, that the more the present system was tried the more it was proved to have failed. The noble Marquess had expressed the opinion that the Guards' system of enlistment had worked admirably. The noble Marquess prided himself upon its success; but the fact was that that system tended rather towards long service than anything else, and certainly not towards short service, for the idea was that a man would re-engage for nine years. Their system was copied from Germany; but the reformers of the Army, when they adopted it, seemed to have entirely forgotten two very important circumstances, one being that the German Army never left its native shores, and the other being that in Germany they had compulsory service, whereas in England they had to find troops to serve in every quarter of the globe, and their service was voluntary. He thought there could be no greater proof of the failure of their system than the circumstances attaching to the despatch of troops to Egypt and South Africa this year. In order to equip Lord Wolseley's Force every single Cavalry regiment in the Service had been injured, irremediably injured. From every Cavalry regiment a great number of the best men had been taken to make up the number required, and everybody knew that to take a large number of well-trained soldiers out of a Cavalry regiment damaged that regiment for a very considerable space of time. Then the noble Marquess had said that no volunteering had been necessary to fill up the regiments that had been sent out. No doubt, that was perfectly true; but then they must not lose sight of the fact that there had been considerable drafting, and that in order to send out the Guards battalions, other regiments had been obliged to give a number of their best men. When it became necessary for them to put a large Force in the field, as in the case of the campaign in the Sudan—and after all a little over 20,000 men was not a very large Force for the English Army to put in the field—they had the pleasure of knowing that the Army at home was in an utterly disorganized condition. With regard to the Forces in South Africa, they were actually employing civilians to take part in the war, and he regarded it as a most extraordinary circumstance that a country like England with a large standing Army should be compelled to have recourse to civilians for the purpose of placing so small a Force in the field. He was not going on his own judgment alone as to the failure of the present system, because he found that at the anniversary meeting of the Royal United Service Institution on February 28, the subject of the essay for the prize was—"Can the European Army in India remain as at present constituted, or should it be in whole or in part a local force?" There were 16 essays submitted, and every one of them expressed a decided opinion that short service as enforced in their Army was inapplicable to the Forces in India, and that it was impossible to maintain in India an Army that could take the field under the present system. If there were two things which militated against the efficiency and popularity of the Service at the present moment, it was the constant changes among the men in the battalions and the constant stoppages, to which allusion had been made. General Fraser, speaking of the great unrest there was in the Service, had pointed out that of 278 men discharged by purchase 175 had less than three months' service, and that in the case of one regiment, out of 169 men, enlisted from November, 1883, to November, 1884, 75 men had in that time left the regiment. It was impossible that a regiment could have any solidarity about it under these circumstances of change. Again, with regard to stoppages, there was no doubt that a recruit from the moment of engagement to the moment of leaving the Service considered himself to be fraudulently treated in this respect. He was promised that he should have a free kit. Well, he had a free kit, but he was told that it was to last him longer than it was possible for a kit to last any man; he had to replace the articles when worn out, and the whole of the articles had to be kept in order at his expense. And, again, although his clothing was worn out in the performance of his duties, he was made to put it in order at his own expense. He (Lord Algernon Percy) thought it would be well that a certain number of canvass working suits should be kept in barracks and served out to the men, and that the repairs in these suits should be made good and paid for by the regiment in the same way as other barrack damages were paid. He believed that such an arrangement would be exceedingly popular with the men. Then with regard to orderly duties, which took so many men out of the ranks, he thought it would be a popular thing if the men after serving with the Colours could join some orderly corps to perform the duties of orderlies in garrison towns, and also do the orderly work at the Public Offices. The hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) had made some remarks with regard to the absence of officers from the Militia training. He (Lord Algernon Percy) took objection to the remark of the hon. and gallant Member that those officers did not take a keen interest in their duties. The fact was that the time of training often clashed with the time of examinations, so that if an officer wanted to read up for an examination he could not do so and train with the Militia as well. He thought the officers might be allowed to train with other regiments, or that some relief might be given to them under the circumstances he had mentioned. There was no doubt the Militia was going down in a certain sense; but that was due to the fact of its being made the means of feeding the Army. He would not detain the Committee at any greater length than to say that these matters might be treated and remedied by Her Majesty's Government without expense to the country.

Lord Algernon Percy

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that remedies had been attempted for some of the evils which existed in the Service by enabling a certain number of soldiers to be re-engaged. But those remedies had not been successful, and it was the duty of that House to find out and remove the cause. He believed the cause was mainly to be found in the system of deferred pay. Under the existing system the deferred pay was given to the man when he left the Army, but if he re-engaged it was not given to him before the final termination of his service; and he (Colonel Colthurst) was therefore of opinion that the £10 under such circumstances was too great an inducement for him to leave the Service. He thought that if the system of deferred pay was to be retained, the money should be given to the man whether he re-engaged or not. But, in his opinion, the far better way would be to do away with the stoppages of 3½d. a-day for groceries. The men were told that they were to have free rations; but the ration was not sufficient, and they had to pay from 3d. to 3½d. a-day to make it so. He thought the noble Marquess should consider whether it would not be a good thing to do away with the stoppages and give a man 1s. a-day with his food and no deferred pay at all. It was an extraordinary thing that with the inducements given of late to re-engage, and with the privilege which the noble Marquess had also given to Reserve men of coming back, so few of them should return to the ranks; 1,400 was a very small proportion of those who might have been expected to return. He was unable to understand that except on the ground of the constant changes made during the last few years, under which the minds of the men had become quite puzzled and disheartened; when the privilege of re-engagement was taken away the men regretted it, but when it was given back to them they would not take advantage of it. There seemed to be some discontent at the bottom of this; and he thought that the facts mentioned by the noble Lord (Lord Algernon Percy), and the fact that the older men in the regiment did more work than they were accustomed to formerly, on account of the recruits, were the cause of it. With regard to orderlies, he thought it would be well if those employed in Public Offices and in garrison towns were taken out of an orderly corps. There was at the present time a great need of soldiers, and he thought the soldiers they had might be left to do their duties as soldiers without engaging them in other occupations. He hoped the noble Marquess would take those points into consideration, which, although they might appear small in themselves, were of very great importance in connection with the popularity of the Service.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, he agreed with much that had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Colthurst), and with regard to deferred pay on which he had remarked, he was entirely in accord with him. The deferred pay had been, in his opinion, and in the opinion of old soldiers, a very great mistake. He would like to bring before the notice of the Committee another matter which he knew would be met with some opposition from the Benches opposite. He referred to the Order from the Horse Guards, dated 24th January, 1885, to the effect that after the 30th of June next gratuities given in connection with medals for long service and good service would cease. He had given Notice to his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Sir Arthur Hayter) that he would bring forward this question. The present was a time when they must not play fast-and-loose with good and gallant soldiers. Their Army was a volunteer Army, and they wanted to get men to re-engage. He sincerely thanked the noble Marquess for what he had done in the matter of allowing soldiers to re-engage; but was that a time for the issue of an Order such as that to which he had referred, which could not but operate in a very opposite direction—that was to say, against the re-engagement of soldiers? For his own part, he regarded it as a breach of faith with the men that soldiers who had enlisted on previous conditions should now be told that after the 30th of June next they should not have the £5 gratuity given to them at the end of their period of service. He knew the feeling of the old soldiers in the Army, and their views of the Service; he worked for them as much as he could, and he could not but believe that it was detrimental to the interests of the Service that that Order should have been issued which deprived them of their gratuity. He had taken the trouble to work out the number of medals distributed last year, and he found from the 1st of April, 1884, to the 1st of January, 1885, there were 880 medals distributed amongst the old soldiers in Her Majesty's Service, and that with those 880 medals was granted altogether the sum of £4,880 by way of gratuity. He asked whether it was wise, with the Army in a transition state, for the sake of £4,880 to create discontent amongst old soldiers who had enlisted on the understanding that they should have this gratuity with their medal? He would not, on that occasion, dwell longer on that point; but he hoped the noble Marquess would take the matter into consideration with a view, if possible, to the withdrawal of the Order in question. While thanking the noble Marquess for what he had done, he was obliged to take exception to one or two remarks which fell from him with regard to the state of the Guards regiment sent to Egypt. The noble Marquess said they had not been obliged to call for volunteers. But, although that was the case, he Sir Henry Fletcher pointed out that in consequence they had decimated the regiments at home. He thought it right that the whole system should be clearly understood at the present time. He was informed that one of the battalions of Guards which went out the other day to Egypt—the Scots Guards—had to be provided with 10 sergeants and 350 men from the battalion left at home to make up its complement on proceeding to Egypt. The consequence was that the one battalion left at home, and which was at that moment in London, was almost exhausted owing to the duties it had to perform. Those were matters which he thought the Military Authorities should look into. He was opposed to, and should always be opposed to, the territorial system, which he believed to be entirely wrong. He had read the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting, and from his own knowledge of the state of affairs throughout the country he was unable to agree with that Report. However, he would impress most forcibly upon the Military Authorities that they should consider very carefully how the regiments which had two battalions abroad should be best provided for. There were 15 regiments abroad of two battalions, and that was a point of great importance. He thought that before the Committee voted this large sum of money they ought carefully to consider whether the territorial system was a success, and whether they would be able to keep up the supply of men to the regiments which were abroad.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON said, that although at the present moment, as military men, they had reason to criticize the Army system, they were none the less able to appreciate and express admiration of the great deeds and valour of their men in Egypt. No doubt, the great question at issue was as to recruiting; and he thought that while the pay of the soldier was only 1s. a-day, they could not expect to get the same article, so to speak, as they did 30 years ago, when the price of labour was cheaper. But he was glad to see, by the Report of the Inspector General, that recruiting had improved; and not only that, but that desertion was less than it was four years ago. During the Crimean War the 10 years' system came into operation. In 1854 he had the honour of commanding a company when some troops had to take their discharge. Speaking to the soldiers, whom he found to be very reasonable men, as a friend, he asked them whether they thought that in the next 10 or 11 years, by leaving the Army, they would be able, out of the wages earned by the practice of their calling, to save enough of money to give them a pension of 1s. or 1s. 2d. a-day. He believed that on that occasion, with the exception of three, not a single man took his discharge—a fact which he thought very creditable to the men. But the real question was the difficulty of providing troops for India. He had always held that they should revert to the local system in India, because he was sure that the time occupied in crossing the seas and bringing home invalided men was the cause of a great deal of loss in respect of soldier labour. He was sure it would come to it in time, and that was a question which he believed operated in the mind of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when on a former occasion he mentioned the subject of pensions to him. They had discussed that evening the whole system of military administration, and the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had brought some important points under their consideration. He had always considered it their duty, as military men, to place military matters outside politics. Therefore he said he did not consider that the administration of affairs in the Army was as good as it might be, although he did not attribute that to anything which the noble Marquess had done. On the contrary, he had certainly made the system of extended service with the Colours more elastic; and if hon. Members wished to ascertain how that system had worked they had only to refer to the Inspector General's Report. They would find that when the system was made more elastic, and the noble Marquess offered £10 to men serving in India to re-engage with the Colours, not one single man re-engaged of under three years' service, a fact which proved that for the first three years a soldier's life was irksome and tedious to him, because he was made a soldier only after three years' service, and in the meantime he was, in a manner of speaking, bullied and kicked about, and was therefore, at the end of the short-service period, only too ready to take his discharge. Again, as the number of years of service increased, so the number of discharges decreased; and therefore he thought that if they could engage men to serve 21 years, they would confer a great boon both upon the Service and the country in general. The great difficulty now was to have a good line of attack and a good Reserve; but he trusted that they would never have to resort as they did during the Crimean War to the humiliating and miserable expedient of paying mercenaries to fight the battles of the country. He was convinced that the present state of things abroad had been good for the Service, inasmuch as it had awakened many to the fact that neither the Army nor the Navy was in that state of efficiency in which they would like to see it. He hoped before another year had passed the Service would be improved, and that a considerable improvement would take place before their soldiers were again called upon to exhibit their courage and valour in the field.

Sir Henry Fletcher

COLONEL MILNE-HOME said, he should not have addressed the Committee but for one point raised by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir Henry Fletcher) with reference to the proposed abolition of the gratuities accompanying medals for long service and good conduct. As a matter of fact, in the Household Cavalry, in which he had the honour of serving a long time, long service still prevailed. The consequence was that a large number of those medals had to be given away in the corps; and he knew of no prouder or pleasanter moment than when commanding officers had to call from the ranks men who had served during 18 years with uninterrupted good character for the purpose of bestowing upon them the medals in question. It was a very easy thing to lose character in a regiment, where temptations were so rife, and he repeated that it was a pleasant thing to award medals to men who had withstood those temptations and retained their character. Therefore, he felt it his duty to protest against the abolition of the gratuities which accompanied the long-service medals; and, in speaking on that subject, he would like the Committee to consider the kind of Circular which abolished them. It said—

"Until the 30th of June, 1885, a gratuity shall be paid to each soldier awarded a medal," and so on. Why, anyone would infer from the ingenious and ingenuous way in which the Circular was worded that something was to be granted to the soldiers until that date, whereas, as a matter of fact, something was to be taken away from them. It so happened that for the last nine years gratuities had been granted with good service medals, and that previous to that time there were only four such medals given away in each regiment. He repeated that this Article, instead of giving the soldier anything, absolutely deprived him of what he was entitled to. An hon. and gallant Friend of his had said it was a breach of faith. Surely common sense showed it was a breach of faith to all the men who joined the Service before the Circular was issued. The Circular was issued in 1881; it was repeated in 1882; and repeated again in January last; so that all the men who joined the Service before 1881 felt they would receive a gratuity of £5. Now, however, they were to be done out of it. Why were they to be done out of it? Was it because on Vote 17 it was hoped to save something like £3,000? In his opinion, £3,000 would be very well spent in the shape of these gratuities, because the very best recruiting agency they could have in the country were the men who left the Army, and who went back to their homes, and told their friends and companions how well they had been treated. Now, if men were sent down to the country who had been done out of this £5—he used the phrase advisably—recruiting would be very much checked, because they would tell their friends how, when they entered the Service, they were promised £5 one day, and how it was taken away from them the next. He had intended to say a word or two with reference to the condition of the Cavalry of the country; but the subject had been so thoroughly well dealt with by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that he would not detain the Committee more than a single moment on the subject. General Fraser's letter had been referred to. That letter was, in his opinion, a most valuable production, because it put the facts of the case in the briefest and tersest manner, and it ought to be added to the Annals of the House. Every Member of the House of Commons ought to make it a part of his duty to ascertain what the real facts were with regard to the Cavalry Force of the country. There was one point to which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, did not allude, and that was with reference to an Hussar regiment which had been sent abroad. The hon. and gallant Member said that the regiment had something like 300 recruits in distance; but they might be camped out even in the barrack yard. Every soldier, he thought, should be camped out once a-year, whether he belonged to Cavalry or Infantry, because it was well that he should acquire a certain knowledge of what would have to be done in actual warfare. Now, as to Commissariats and Transports. It ought to be borne in mind that the Committee of which he was President, after the Egyptian War, had declared very strongly in favour of training a certain number of Infantry soldiers to Transport duties. The measure was not a very large one; it would not be a very expensive one. At present, when any campaigning was to be done, they were obliged to trust the mules and camels in a measure to untrained Infantry soldiers. In the present war Mounted Infantry had been sent out with comparatively little or no knowledge of the duties they had to perform. He had seen it stated, in connection with the Soudan Campaign, that the loss of camels and horses, and animals generally, had been something terrible. He believed that in General Stewart's Brigade alone the loss amounted to 1,600 out of 1,750. It was a well-known fact that soldiers not knowing how to treat animals, or how to saddle them, added enormously to the expense of war. He did not know what the expense of keeping up a Camel Corps was; but he was confident that the losses in the Soudan must have entailed great expense. Of course, they could not have camels in this country; their hard roads would not suit them; but he thought it would be a wise step always to keep a certain number of mules here for the Commissariat and Transport Services, and to keep their soldiers well trained in their treatment. It was well that their soldiers should be trained to the care of mules, because they were very peculiar animals, and they were excessively vicious and nasty unless they were properly attended to. Then, again, it was very necessary to encourage all soldiers, particularly in Infantry regiments, in military trades—such, for instance, as shoeing horses. The first want which displayed itself in a campaign was the want of farriers; there always had been such a want, and he presumed there always would be, on the principle that when men were most wanted they were never forthcoming. He thought that every endeavour should be made to make every regiment as complete as it could possibly be in itself. Much had been said about special corps. Now, he had the strongest objection to all special corps. Indeed, he should like to abolish every special corps in the Service, and make the regiment furnish everything that was necessary for the service of the regiment. Take the case of hospital orderlies. Of old, every regiment possessed its own hospital orderlies; and wherever the regiment went the hospital orderlies went. It was quite possible to keep men in a regiment trained to hospital duties, and the same thing might be done with regard to Transport and other duties needed on a campaign.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished, before this Vote was passed, to refer to a matter which came under his own observation during the Recess. He happened to be at Gibraltar, and he there saw a regiment of the Line, part of whom were clothed in brown uniforms, and the other in red. The regiment certainly did not present a very creditable appearance. The explanation given to him was—he did not know whether it was a correct one—that reinforcements had come out a short time ago, and when they left England there were no brown uniforms in store, and they were obliged to go out in their red uniforms and parade with the men at Gibraltar, who had only the brown uniform. He only hoped that what he witnessed at Gibraltar was not an instance of the state of preparation in which the Service was generally in. It appeared too probable that the stores generally had been allowed to run down to an undue extent. He did not think they ought to allow this opportunity to pass without expressing, on behalf of the Volunteer Service, his thanks to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) for having considered the recommendations made last year with respect to the necessity of dealing more liberally with the Volunteers regarding camping. It was generally admitted by military authorities that camping out was the best mode of training for the Volunteer Service; but, notwithstanding the allowance made this year, it was still the fact that the allowances were not sufficient to maintain Volunteer Corps in camp, and that the officers were obliged to put their hands in their own pockets to meet the expenses. He did not think the Government were yet doing their duty in this respect to the Volunteer Service. He wished to make one observation with reference to the number of Volunteers. It was satisfactory to note that the number was increasing, and that there was also a steady advance in efficiency. He was sorry, however, to find that the advance in numbers did not extend to the Artillery Volunteers, for they had been reduced during the year from 38,889 to 38,236—a decrease of something like 653. This circumstance was very much to be regretted, because, in the opinion of competent men, the Artillery Volunteers were, perhaps, the most useful element in the Volunteer Service. They were trained in managing heavy guns, and would, therefore, if required, prove themselves most valuable. He suggested that it might be worth the while of the noble Marquess to inquire into the cause of the diminution. In his (Mr. Tomlinson's) opinion, the Artillery was a force which ought to be encouraged in every possible way. It was very well to congratulate themselves on the condition of the Volunteer Service; but they ought never to forget—and no one who had had anything to do with the Volunteer Service could forget—that after all that was said and done the Service was in a very incomplete condition, considered as an effective part of the defensive forces of this country. Until the Volunteers possessed every equipment, including transport, necessary to make them an effective body, it could not be said they were in a condition to perform the work which might be required of them. Whilst speaking of the Artillery Corps, he should like to mention a circumstance which struck him very much. He was not connected himself with the Artillery Service, but he was told of a certain corps in Lancashire that would, in case its services were required, be marched to Portsmouth or some part of the South Coast. He could not help thinking that that disclosed a defective system of organization. The primary object of a Volunteer Corps ought to be to defend the particular county or part of the country in which it was raised. If the Volunteers were called out their recognized post of duty should be the military district to which they belonged.

Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram

Mr T. P. O'CONNOR said, he hoped the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War the Marquess of Hartington would be able to see his way to take seriously into consideration the case of that deserving class of officers, the Quartermasters. It might be said that when once a man became a Quartermaster he always remained a Quartermaster. If an ordinary soldier raised from the ranks remained in the Service he might rise to any rank even to that of a General Officer or of Field Marshal; and, as a matter of fact, there were one or two amongst the higher officers in the Army who had risen from the ranks. The Quartermasters did not receive the money they used to receive as Paymasters. A Paymaster was a much less important officer in a regiment than a Quartermaster, and had not so much intrusted to his care, because the stores under the control of the Quartermaster were frequently of far greater value than the amount of money intrusted to the Paymaster, and yet, while the Paymaster was allowed 15s. a day, the Quartermaster received only 7s. That they felt very strongly, and it seemed to him that in this matter the grievance they felt was very just. They had over and over again applied to the various Heads of the War Department for relief, but, like most individuals who had not the great advantage of aristocratic or other influences to bring to bear upon the authorities, their prayers had hitherto been very much neglected. In 1841 the Government offered the old officers an increase of 1d. per day, and he had no doubt that he should be only expressing the sense of the Committee and the opinion of everybody who had paid any attention at all to this subject, when he said that their offer of 1d. per day was little short of insult added to the injury under which that deserving body of men had long suffered. He thought the minimum pension ought to be raised to £150 a year. Another point which he thought ought to be considered was this. He understood that at present only a certain portion of the service of Quartermasters, whilst they were non-commissioned officers, was taken into account in fixing their pensions. He failed to see any ground in reason or justice for this regulation. Surely the time a man served in the Army as a private soldier was just as former were granted deferred pay during the first period in 1876, and in 1881 it was conceded to them that they should have deferred pay for the second period of service also, which boon was not conceded to the men. Retiring non-commissioned officers, therefore, would get £63 instead of the smaller sum. The men who enlisted before 1881, and who went on for 18 years' service, having understood they came into the Army on a definite understanding, and enlisted expecting to receive the gratuity, were, of course, an exception to the general rule, and he should be happy to consider their case again.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, he was much obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for the statement he had just made. He would point out that in the Estimates there were only £1,200 put down for this item as against £4,000 granted last year, so that all the soldiers could not be deprived of their rights.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether the noble Marquess had any explanation to offer with regard to the regiment he had referred to?

LORD BURGHLEY wished to know whether the noble Marquess could give him an answer to the question which he had addressed to him with reference to the Militia?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Perhaps it will be more convenient to discuss the details of the Militia on the Militia Vote. It is impossible in a general discussion to give details. With regard to the question put by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), the Committee will agree that I can hardly be expected to know the circumstances of the uniforming of a certain regiment at Malta; but I can promise that inquiries shall be made into the subject.

Question put, and agreed to.

(2. £4,543,000, Pay and Allowances.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to say, Sir, with regard to this Vote—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have taken the voices.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will ask—I appeal to the Committee—

THE CHAIRMAN: I state that I had taken the voices before the hon. Gentleman rose. I had not said who had it; but I called both for the Ayes and Nays—therefore the hon. Gentleman is too late. I say the Ayes have it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish, Sir, to say that I rise—

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot allow the hon. Member to contest my ruling.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg, Sir, to move, "That you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Government, Sir, agree to that Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

EAST INDIA LOAN.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—Mr. J. K. Cross.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he had no desire to detain the House; but he thought that this Resolution with regard to the East India Loan was of such importance that it ought to be accompanied by some explanation as to its object.

MR. J. K. CROSS said, a Select Committee had reported last year in favour of a considerable extension of railways in India, and the money asked for was for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of that Committee. He would not enter into any detailed explanation at the present stage, because it would probably be better to take any discussion which might arise upon the second reading of the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money not exceeding £10,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the security of the Revenue of India.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [16th March] reported.

MR. SEXTON said, it would be in the memory of hon. Members that a man named Dennis Murphy was shot in his house at Castleisland, and that he died, from the effects of the injury received, in two days. Two constables reported that an outrage had been committed, and that shots had been fired from the outside of the house, and the District Inspector on going to the house found that a window had been broken. However, on closer examination, he found that the outrage could not have been committed from the outside of the house, because, judging from the position which the man occupied, the shots could not have been fired through the window in which the hole was made. In the course of two days it turned out that the two constables were in the house of Dennis Murphy, and that Murphy had been wounded by the discharge of one of their rifles, after which the two constables went out of the house and fired shots in order to create the impression that an outrage had been committed. They then induced the family of the wounded man, and the wounded man himself, to support their story, and it appeared that the circumstances were such that he would have corroborated any story which they chose to present. It was strange to him, under the circumstances, that the Inspector forwarded to the County Inspector a Report describing the case as an outrage, and that he caused to be arrested 12 men at night, one of them having been dragged out of the house in which his father was dying; after that application was made to the magistrate, and a remand obtained. He wished to impress on the House that the Government had not taken the course which the desire to do justice in this case would seem to demand. The Coroner's Jury appeared to think that the killing of Murphy was purely accidental, and the Resident Magistrate appeared to have been of the same opinion. But there remained another question gravely concerning the administration of justice; and that was, whether one of the constables invented, or whether both constables conspired to fabricate a false story for the purpose of producing an impression that an outrage had been committed, and thereby to impede the administration of justice? There could be no rational doubt that the constables did invent and propagate that story. On Friday last the Lord Chief Baron of Ireland opened the Assizes at Derry.

Mr. Sexton

Now, 20 days had elapsed since the occurrence of the accident, and 16 days had elapsed since the District Inspector announced in the public Press that it was not an outrage, but an accidental occurrence. He (Mr. Sexton) said that there had been ample time for the Crown and its agents to consider whether there was or was not sufficient evidence to put these constables on their trial for conspiracy to defeat the administration of justice. The constables had denied at first that they were in the house at all, although they were subsequently compelled to admit that they were there, and one of them had since admitted that he had induced the family to endorse the story, and that he had fired the shots outside the house. Well, the Lord Chief Baron was confronted with these facts, and in addressing the Grand Jury how did he deal with the case? He said, whatever might be the question as to the accidental or other character of the death of Murphy, there was no reason to doubt that a grievous misdemeanour had been committed. He said that it was a lamentable thing that members of the Constabulary Force should have deceived their superiors in a matter of this kind; that officers paid to support the due administration of justice should have endeavoured to defeat and misdirect the administration of it. He expressed his deep regret, and said that it was most unfortunate that the Crown had not sent up before the Grand Jury any Bill whatever which would have enabled them to investigate whether or not this gross offence had been committed. He (Mr. Sexton) said that within his memory no such language of censure had been applied to the Crown agents in Ireland by any Judge on the Bench; and he wished to ask what steps the Crown intended to take for the administration of justice in this case? For his part, he thought they ought to take very stern measures indeed. This was due from them, first, to those members of the Constabulary Force who desired to do their duty honestly; secondly, they owed it to the public at large, who in Ireland found it especially difficult to procure the administration of justice; and, in the third place, they owed it to the people of Castleisland, who had by accident been saved from becoming the victims of an atrocious conspiracy, and from having been thrown into gaol and indicted for murder. And Irish Members knew from experience in the last four years that in that case informers would have been forthcoming — that there would have been a flood of evidence forthcoming against these innocent persons, and that the sequel would have been that the two peccant constables would be promoted for efficiency and ability; that iron huts would have been put up in the district, and that the people would have had to pay a special tax on account of the alleged outrage. He thought it would be seen that the Government had erred gravely in allowing so much time to elapse in coming to a conclusion with regard to the conduct of these men; and he trusted they would do their best to remove the heavy censure under which they lay at the hands of the Lord Chief Baron. He wished also to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he sanctioned the extraordinary freak which had been perpetrated by the Local Government Board in Ireland on the Board of Guardians of the North Dublin Union. Not long ago the Guardians desired to change their treasurer. The Bank of Ireland having been their treasurer for many years, they applied to the Bank for a loan of £2,000 at 4½ per cent, and the Bank refused to give it. The Guardians then applied to the Hibernian Bank, who agreed to advance the money on the security of the rates, and to charge no interest for the first three months. Thereupon the Board of Guardians transferred their account to the Hibernian Bank. After that the Local Government Board wrote to the Guardians and said that it rested with them to decide on the removal of the treasurer of the Union, and that they refused to agree to the transfer from the Bank of Ireland to the Hibernian Bank. The result of that was that the North Dublin Guardians had been compelled to seek for a loan of £2,000 elsewhere on more disadvantageous terms than they could obtain from the Hibernian Bank, and to pay interest upon an advance which the Hibernian Bank was willing to give them for nothing. He said that it was the duty of the Local Government Board in Ireland to protect the interests of the ratepayers, and that they were not doing so in acting thus, and that their attempt to influence the Guardians in the choice of a treasurer was an intolerable pre-tension. In order to allow the right hon. Gentleman to say that he disagreed with the Local Government Board or with the Guardians of the North Dublin Union, he should move that either the Vote be reduced by £500, or that the House disagree with the Committee in this Resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, the last matter to which the hon. Member referred was one with regard to which he had given him no Notice.

Mr. SEXTON: I only heard of it since the House assembled.

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was still more unfortunate in not having heard of it at all; and it was impossible for him to give any explanation or tell the House anything about the facts at that moment. He would only say that the matter should be looked into; but as to its being debated that night, it was perfectly impossible for him to make any statement upon the subject. The hon. Gentleman had brought forward a most deplorable event which had occurred in Castleisland. The hon. Gentleman had stated the circumstances as they occurred, and as he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had explained them in his answer to an hon. Member opposite a few days ago. But the hon. Gentleman had conveyed an impression to the House that the Government had been extremely remiss in dealing with the case. What were the facts? When the circumstances were brought to the notice of the Government the constables were immediately dismissed from the service, which was in itself a very considerable punishment. Then it was said that the District Inspector was greatly to be blamed, because he had proceeded in the case when he had suspicions of its not being correct; but the charge having been reported and substantiated by the testimony of the two men, it was his bounden duty to proceed with it as if it were correct. It was true that he had suspicions with regard to it from the first; but whatever those suspicions might have been he had to wait until he obtained corroborative evidence. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) thought his conduct in this respect was greatly to be praised, because he got the two men to make a clean breast of the matter and contradict one another, finally worming from each of them the truth. But as to screening anyone, or attempting to defeat the true interests of justice, every disposition had been shown from the bottom to the top of the hierarchy of the Constabulary to bring the matter into the light of day and expose what had happened. So much as to the conduct of the Constabulary. Then the question was raised as to what the Law Officers should have done in the way of prosecution. He had told the hon. Member that that had been considered. The decision of the Resident Magistrate was, he believed, that the death of Murphy was accidental; and that, of course, took away the idea of proceeding against the men for manslaughter. Then there remained the question of conspiracy. Well, that had been under the consideration of the Law Officers; but he believed it was not by any means so easy and plain a matter as hon. Members seemed to suppose. Since he answered the Question a few days ago he had heard nothing more as to the decision arrived at; but he could assure the House that there was every desire on the part of the Government to proceed in this matter in such a way as should mark their sense of the great mischief done to the public interest by the conduct of those men or one of them, if their conduct were proved to be what it was supposed to have been, and there would be no reasonable steps untaken which would lead to the punishment of such acts in future.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was very well calculated to spread alarm and dismay in Ireland. Here were two constables actually engaged in conspiracy to murder. Those two men spread the story that Dennis Murphy had been shot through the window of his house, and that he had been murdered. On that statement 12 men were arrested and kept in prison for three days. The two constables adhered to their statement until they were forced into contradiction, not by remorse of conscience, but by cross-examination. They would have persisted in their story if they could; they would have gone to the table in Court and given their evidence against the men arrested, and those men would have been hanged upon that evidence. Therefore, he said that the two constables were guilty of conspiracy to murder. And what punishment had they received? Those two guardians of the peace appointed to protect the life of Murphy, the caretaker—those two guardians of the peace were only to be dismissed from the Service. [MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir; I did not say so.] He said it was an abuse of phrases, and an insult to the intelligence of that House, for any sane man to say that serious action was taken against the two constables engaged in a conspiracy to murder when they were dismissed from the Service. He wondered that the right hon. Gentleman had learned so much during his short stay in Dublin as to be able to come before the House of Commons and say that the Government had taken serious action against two guardians of the peace because they had been dismissed the Service. The right hon. Gentleman had implied that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) rather underrated the difficulties of bringing these men to justice. Now, his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) was not a lawyer by profession, but the Chief Baron was a lawyer by profession; and he, like the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton), expressed his sense of bewilderment that so awful a crime as this should have been committed, and that the Government had not taken the trouble to appeal to the Grand Jury. How could the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, or any other man, defend such apathy, such screening, on the part of the Government? Why, not 20 hours, much less 20 days, ought to have elapsed before the men committing such an atrocious offence were brought to account. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not wish to exaggerate matters; but he was persuaded that when the right hon. Gentleman's statement was read to-morrow in Ireland it would be taken as amounting to this—that killing was no murder when it was done by a policeman. What would have happened if the story of those men had not been found out? Twelve men were arrested, and he supposed they would have been convicted. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), through his agent, would have taken good care to have had a jury of the proper colour; and he certainly would not have had any difficulty in getting a Judge of the proper colour. With a jury of 12 of the Loyal

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

Party, and with a ferocious partizan in the shape of a Judge—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has just used an expression which is quite out of Order. Mr. BLOOM: Oh, oh! I said the hon. Gentleman has used an expression which he ought not to have used in speaking of a Judge as a ferocious partizan. I ask him to be good enough to withdraw that expression.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would certainly withdraw the expression; but he supposed he would be in Order in saying that the same jury-packing would have taken place as had taken place in several other cases in Ireland, and the two policemen with their story well arranged, with informers procured by the lavish rewards that were offered by the Government in all these cases—the two constables, with all the means at the disposal of Government, would have been able to procure the conviction of the men. What would have happened? He supposed that two of the men would have been found guilty. They would have gone to the scaffold protesting their innocence; but, as the House knew, that would not have been any protection against the extreme penalty of the law. The neighbourhood would have been denounced in the House as a district in which innocent men were murdered at night by bands of marauders. The next step would have been that the relatives of the unfortunate men would have applied for a large money compensation, and of course that compensation would have been given. If the head of the family had been murdered, there was no reason why it should not have been given. The district, which was one of the poorest in Ireland, would have had perhaps £1,000 in the shape of a Blood Tax put upon it; and in the face of all these possibilities which had been avoided by something like a miracle the right hon. Gentleman now said the Government had taken serious action, because the two constables had been dismissed from the Force. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo Mr. Sexton had said that an endeavour was now being made to get the constables reinstated. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) should not be surprised if they were taken back, because they had proved themselves efficient in the manufacture of crime, and, therefore, they were most fitting to perform such services as were required in Ireland. He did not think that the action of the Sub-Inspector had been sufficiently vindicated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) upon this point. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) could say strong things, but he would refrain from doing so, because he wished to stick at what was the central fact of the whole case—namely, that two men had invented a charge of murder against innocent men; that they persisted in the charge until they were compelled to acknowledge its falsity; that on this charge 12 innocent men were arrested and imprisoned for three days; and that in the face of an atrocious crime the Government had up to the present—more than 30 days after the event—confined their action to dismissing the constables from the Force. He thought that a more shameful neglect of duty was never displayed by any Administration.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND Mr. WALKER said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway Borough Mr. T. P. O'Connor had spoken very strongly of the two constables. Now he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) was not there to say one word in justification of those constables. He could imagine nothing more improper than their action. The question was, what was to be done under the circumstances? He apprehended the first thing was to dismiss them from the Force; no one would find fault with the Government for doing that, inasmuch as it was a very natural course to take; and, as his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had said, a course involving to the two men most serious consequences, such as loss of employment, and loss of the chance of pension. The Government were not to stop there of course, for it was necessary that the men should be punished in other ways. It was necessary, in the first place, to consider whether the men should not be prosecuted for manslaughter. The Coroner's Jury found a verdict of accidental death, and the magistrate, before whom the case came, did not feel himself justified in sending the men for trial. The next step to be taken was, not as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had suggested, to try the constables for conspiracy to murder, but to consider whether they might not possibly be prosecuted for some conspiracy to defeat justice.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would not go so far as to say that their crime amounted to conspiracy to murder innocent people.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the hon. Gentleman agreed with him that it was impossible to prosecute the men for conspiracy to murder. As a matter of fact, the Attorney General for Ireland was at that moment considering whether the constables could not be prosecuted for conspiracy to defeat justice. It was too late to undertake such a prosecution at the last Assizes. ["Why?"] The prosecution for manslaughter only took place a short time ago, and it was by no means easy for any lawyer to arrive at a conclusion as to whether an indictment for conspiracy would lie. As a matter of fact, from information he had received within the last 24 hours, he knew his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland was now considering the matter.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that the fact stood, after all the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) had said, that not only the first thing, but the last thing the Government had done up to that moment to punish the two constables had been to dismiss them from the Force. If the Solicitor General for Ireland had studied the charge of the Chief Baron to the Grand Jury, he would have found that the Chief Baron was of opinion that the dismissal of the men from the Force for the atrocious conspiracy against the lives of 12 innocent men was an insufficient display of energy on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Surely the opinion of the Chief Baron, as a lawyer, was of some weight. He (Mr. O'Brien) was not a bit surprised that the Government in Ireland, or its instruments, did not follow up the scandal in Kerry, and did not follow it up with indignant zeal. That fact was that the higher police officers of Ireland were in the power, and at the mercy, of many of the police subordinates; they did not know what depths of villainy would be disclosed if men were pushed too closely. The district of Castleisland was one that had been noted for moonlight outrages. It was not long ago that a very similar moonlight outrage was reported; but policemen were found to have been the delinquents, and they were let off with a fine of £2. How did hon. Members know that it was not in this way that the district had earned its reputation? How did the House know that it had not been imposed upon by many occurrences of the same kind? Surely if policemen were capable of fabricating one story they were capable of fabricating other stories. The fact was that many of these police officers lived in glass houses. Again and again proof had been brought before the House of complicity on the part of the police in Ireland with crime; but the proofs had never been inquired into. There was the case of the man Noonan, who was hired by County Inspector French to assassinate Judge Barry. There was the case of the policeman Woods, who, disguised as a blacksmith, went down to Tubbercurry to organize a conspiracy to murder. There was the case of McDermott, who was closeted with Mr. Jenkinson in Dublin Castle at the time he was at the head of the dynamite conspiracy in Cork, the unfortunate dupes of which conspiracy had since been sent to penal servitude. Those things he (Mr. O'Brien) and his hon. Friends had brought forward in the House again and again, and the answer had always been the same—vague general statements of the good intentions of the Government. The people of Ireland gave mighty little for the good intentions of the Government. All they knew and believed was that the Government were afraid to have any honest inquiry into the proceedings of their police in Ireland, for fear it would turn out that their own police were the worst criminals and the greatest outrage mongers in the world. Just let them see the sort of latitude that was given to those very policemen of Castleisland, the very men who invented the story of the moonlight outrage—the latitude that was given to them in dealing with the people in the neighbourhood. A week ago he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) a question about the systematic persecution of a very respectable man in that district named Mr. Hussey, probably by those very policemen. On the morning to which his Question referred Hussey was waked up about 2 o'clock by a body of policemen who had not even a warrant, and his house was ransacked for concealed Moonlighters. It was on the very night or morning of this bogus occurrence that these men went roaming about the country breaking into innocent men's houses. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was not able to deny that Hussey's house was systematically invaded by the police just at their whim and pleasure in the middle of the night. The fact was that the police wanted to create an impression in the public mind that Hussey, who had previously been kept for over a year in prison as a suspect, without trial or without any charge being made against him, was guilty of complicity in crime. The police, however, had never been able to lay their hands on a scrap of evidence that would warrant them in injuring, and insulting, and blasting in this way Hussey's character before the public. If the house of an Englishman were invaded in the middle of the night by police without a warrant the police would be shot, and he did not believe that any 12 men in England would be found to convict the man who fired the shot of murder. Unfortunately in Ireland the people were perfectly helpless to prevent raids by the police. So long as things of that kind continued under the wing of the Irish Administration, so long as the crime of those policemen remained practically unpunished, England need not be in the least surprised if the Irish people cheered on every occasion they assembled together for the Mahdi, and for the success of other enemies of England. While he was in possession of the House he wanted to say a word about another matter. The other night he had a Motion on the Paper in regard to it, but it was dropped because the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) said it was not convenient for him to accede to it. He applied for a—

The Solicitor General for Ireland

" Return of all loans made to landowners or others in the county of Donegal, since the 1st day of January, 1880, according to the records now in possession of the Board of Works, specifying—1. The names of borrowers and townlands in which works were situated. 2. The nature of the works in respect of which loans were granted, whether a. Arterial Drainage, b. Thorough Drainage, c. Subsoiling, d. Farm or other Buildings, e. Boundary Walls, f. Other Walls, g. Fences, h. Improvements or other Works, distinguishing new works from repairs of old. 3. The amount approved for each of the foregoing together with the amount expended in each case. 4. Act under which each loan was made."

Now, he received a communication from the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert), stating two reasons for objecting to give this Return. They were reasons which he was perfectly certain could not for a moment impress upon the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Hibbert's) own good sense; they were reasons which, it was quite plain, were invented by the Board of Works in Dublin for the purpose of evading what they expected would be an inconvenient investigation. The first of the objections was that the Return would be of an inquisitorial character, and that to give it would be unfair to private individuals who were indebted to the Government. It would have been nothing at all of the sort. The Act under which all those loans was made was an Act which was passed by the late Government in 1879. It was an Act by which £1,000,000 of Irish money was set apart in loans to the Irish landlords, at a nominal rate of interest after two years, no interest at all being charged for the first two years. The loans were made for the express purpose of giving employment in the distressed districts. It was, therefore, public money given for an express public object, and he submitted that the persons who received the money were absolutely bound to account for it to Parliament. If the money had been honestly applied by them they had done a service to the community, and they ought to be very glad to have the matter cleared up. The other objection really seemed almost too absurd to be advanced by any public Department. It was that the Return would overtask the energies of the staff of the Board of Works. Now, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) knew thoroughly well that the Return could be made out by a single clerk in a week. It would be very useful if the Return could be made for every distressed district in Ireland; but there were special reasons for confining it to the one county of Donegal. Donegal was very greatly distressed, and there was the strongest possible reason to believe that large sums of the money which were granted to the landlords for the purpose of giving employment were never so employed, but employed upon bogus works, or devoted by landlords to their own necessities. Of course, the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) stated that he would inquire into any special charge of this character. Now, a promise of this sort was perfectly worthless. The Return for which he asked was absolutely necessary, in order that people might be able to test their information and test their suspicion. At the present moment people had no accurate information, and no way of getting at accurate information, as to the amount of money that was lent, or as to the works towards which it was supposed to have been given, or as to what became of the money at all. If the money had honestly been put to the purpose that Parliament intended it for, there was nobody who would be injured by the Return that he asked for. This was truly a matter of very great importance and interest in Ireland. This huge sum of money had been lent as a public trust; and he now stated, upon the authority of some of the very best informed persons, that large sums advanced were never applied to the proper purposes at all, but were applied for the benefit of the landlords themselves. There was the best reason to believe, moreover, that not only had some of the landlords—of course, he was sure his remarks only applied to a small number, and therefore it was all the more easy to get at the facts—not only had some of the landlords misapplied the money, but the inspections by the Inspectors of the Board of Works had been of the most cursory and most unsatisfactory character. In point of fact, in some cases of which he had information, certificates of the Board of Works were actually given without the works being examined at all, given upon the words of the landlords to their friends and brother Freemasons, the Inspectors of the Board of Works. He could not imagine that the hon. Gentleman, with his high sense of justice, could accept the miserable excuse that had been given by the Board of Works for shirking this investigation. All he could say was that if the hon. Gentleman could not that night give them some more substantial, some less ridiculous and trivial reasons for refusing this Return, the only conclusion that it would be possible for the people of Ireland to arrive at would be that there was something behind which both the Board of

Mr. O'Brien

Works and the landlords were anxious to keep in the dark.

MR. WARTON said, he thought that, in the case of the two policemen referred to by the hon. Members for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) and Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), the Government had done all they could reasonably be expected to do. Of course, it was quite right that the men should be punished; it was quite right that an attempt should be made to see whether they could not be prosecuted for manslaughter. That step, however, had been taken. He was inclined to think that, if the hon. Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not explained his meaning in the course of the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), a certain section of the inhabitants of Ireland would have gone under the impression that the hon. Gentleman charged the men with conspiracy to murder, and that the men could have been indicted on such a charge. Now, such a thing could not be done. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General for Ireland) that it was an exceedingly difficult matter to draw an indictment in such a case as this. Indeed, if the hon. Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) were to sit down and endeavour to draw up an indictment suitable for this case, he would find himself in a most difficult position. It was evident that, on general principles, the constables had been guilty of a Common Law misdemeanour.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he did not know whether he had any right to fancy himself a lawyer; but it did appear to him that, on the face of the case, it was clear that an indictment would lie for conspiracy. It was a crime recognized by the law to be guilty of a moonlight outrage. It was also a crime to accuse another man falsely of committing an outrage, and it was also a crime to conspire falsely to accuse another man of outrage. He thought that if his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warton) were to refer to the well-known book of Archbold, he would find in it the form of indictment for this offence. Why the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) hesitated so much, and allowed his conscience such delicate procrastination in the case of these policemen, he (Mr. A. O'Connor) found it difficult to understand. He had not read the charge of the Chief Baron; but he could imagine any Judge—at any rate, any English Judge—would have little difficulty in expressing himself on the action of the Government in respect of those policemen. Now, as to the Board of Works, he, too, had ground for complaint. It seemed to him that the whole history of the Irish Board of Works was a history of mismanagement and obstruction. It was the worst, the most useless, and most extravagant Board in Ireland, and God knew that they had enough of very bad Boards in that country. The whole of Ireland was studded with monuments to the mismanagement of the Board of Works, and he supposed there was no Department of the Government which had squandered so much money as that Board. In the Board's Reports, given year after year, hon. Members would find whole pages devoted to a record of the drainage works which they had in hand. He did not know for how many years they had been engaged in draining; but, at any rate, there was not a county in Ireland—there was no division of any county in Ireland—in which the Board of Works had not been called upon to do something or other in connection with drainage. As a general rule, it had been very badly done. Whether the works of drainage were public or private, they all had to come under the cognizance of the Board of Works. Nothing was so important in Ireland as draining, and the other day, when he asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury Mr. Hibbert if the Board of Works were in a position to furnish information, merely of an elementary kind, necessary for the formation of any judgment with regard to general drainage in Ireland, or with regard to any particular basin, the hon. Gentleman was obliged to admit that the Board of Works were not in a position to give information with regard to a single basin. Well, he thought that was absolutely scandalous. It was disgraceful that this Board, with all the materials in the Office of Registry, should hesitate about furnishing such a Return. He himself would undertake to furnish such a Return with less than two days' work, either from books and documents in the Library of the House of Commons, or in his own library, and he was certain that at that moment the Board of Works must have in its possession Mr. Griffiths' survey of the bogs taken in 1809, 1810, and 1811. That alone would be sufficient to furnish almost all the information required. That was only one Department of the work of this Board, and in every single one of those Departments they found the same incompetency, maladministration, and waste of money, and injury done to the country. He regretted that no Motion had been made to reduce the Vote, because he thought that such a proposal should have been submitted, if only to secure some declaration from the Government with regard to this particular Board. He was perfectly certain that if the Government would only inquire into the constitution of the Board of Works in Ireland—if they would only send a Treasury officer over to inquire into the work of the staff of the Office—they would find the staff capable of reduction by at least 30 per cent. He felt satisfied that the Treasury would be able to effect considerable saving of the public money, and that while they did that they could also so far improve the efficiency of the Board, that the Public Service would gain in more respects than one. As a matter of fact, the Department was a kind of outwork and buffer to the Treasury, and the Secretary to the Treasury was its mouthpiece in that House. The Board of Works in Ireland was incorrigible and inert, and asked only to be left alone, and all the Treasury asked was that that Board should help the Treasury to be left alone. Now, when they had a new broom in the Treasury in the person of the hon. Gentleman the present Secretary Mr. Hibbert, who seemed willing to improve all matters in Ireland that came under his management in any way, he Mr. A. O'Connor trusted that this question would not be lost sight of. He hardly thought it would be, from what they had seen of the action of the hon. Gentleman since he had anything to do with Irish affairs. He Mr. A. O'Connor hoped that in 12 months they would see a great improvement in connection with the Irish Board of Works, and that when this Vote came on for discussion they would hear that the hon. Gentleman had seriously considered the question.

MR. HIBBERT thanked the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) for having given him private Notice of his intention to bring forward this question, because if that Notice had not been given, in all probability he (Mr. Hibbert) should not have been in his place, and would not have been able to have submitted a proper reply. He could assure the hon. Member that it was with very great regret that he was unable to assent to this Motion for the Return, and he took upon himself to say that though the hon. Member had used strong language towards the Board of Works, on account of the reasons they had given for not granting this Return, he thought the first reason referred to was one which anyone who looked at the wording of the Motion for the Return would agree was perfectly justified. The Motion was in these words—

“Return of all Loans made to landowners or others in the County of Donegal, since the 1st day of January 1880, according to the records now in the possession of the Board of Works, specifying:—1. The names of borrowers and townlands in which works were situated; 2. The nature of the works in respect of which Loans were granted, whether (a) Arterial Drainage; (b) Thorough Drainage; (c) Subsoiling; (d) Farm or other Buildings; (e) Demesne Walls; (f) other Walls; (g) Fences; (h) Improvements or other Works, distinguishing new works from repairs of old; 3. The amount approved for each of the foregoing, together with the amount expended in each case; 4. Act under which each Loan was made.”

All that, of course, not only applied to loans to be made to landowners, but also to loans to be made to tenants; and he thought that if the Act of Parliament had intended that the circumstances connected with the granting of those loans were to be made public, and that if it were legitimate for such Returns as that to be made, it would require very inquisitorial proceedings.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The name was advertised in the newspapers in the case of each application.

MR. HIBBERT: If the names were advertised in the papers when the loans were made the information would be at hand, and there is no necessity for this Return. I think it would be an inquisitorial thing to publish the information asked for in this Motion.

MR. O'BRIEN asked whether he understood the hon. Member to say that if he (Mr. O'Brien) could find the Return of landowners, and those who obtained loans under the Act of 1879-80, the Return would be granted?

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not say that. What he said was, that the Return, as drawn, would include information with regard to loans made to landowners and tenants alike, and that if the Act of Parliament had intended such a Return to be made to Parliament, it would have contained a provision to that effect. If the hon. Member would give him any case in his county in which he suspected the occurrences to which he had alluded, or where he thought there was ground for suspicion that the money obtained for loans was not being properly spent, he (Mr. Hibbert) would undertake to inquire into those cases, and to supply all the information he could obtain privately. Having made that offer, he should have thought that the hon. Member would have been satisfied, and would not have thought it necessary to proceed further with his Motion with regard to the Return for which he seemed so anxious. He (Mr. Hibbert) could only say that since he had been at the Treasury he had been anxious on every occasion to give the Irish Members all the information in his power, and that he had given them such information whenever they had applied for it. That was the first occasion on which he had had to refuse an application of the kind; and he could assure the hon. Member that if he would give the names of any persons whose case he suspected, he would make inquiries and undertake to give him all the information he could.

MR. LEAMY said, that the hon. Member was offering to give his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Brien) information of just as inquisitorial a character as that for which the hon. Member asked in his Motion.

MR. HIBBERT: But the difference is this. In the one case the information will be made public, and in the other it would be given to the hon. Member privately.

MR. LEAMY said, that in any case the inquisitorial inquiry would have to be made. The reason why he thought that the information sought for in this Return should be granted was that the money granted under the Act of 1879-80 was really handed over to the applicants in the form of a public trust. Other Acts of Parliament had granted loans for the carrying out of public improvements, but public improvements which, so far as the landlords were concerned, were their own special improvements—improvements on their own holdings, and in their own interest. In the case of the fund in question, however, the money was granted to the interest of all; not merely that the landlord should be able to carry out work upon his property, or that the farmer should be able to drain his land for his own benefit, but that by the spending of the money the landlord or the farmer would be able to give a large amount of employment to the peasantry and the poor people generally, when famine was in the country. Under the circumstances, this fund was looked upon in Ireland as a trust fund, and he thought that the Irish Members had a perfect right to demand information as to how that trust fund had been expended—how the trust had been fulfilled. The hon. Gentleman Mr. Hibbert said he would not like to give the names; but it had been pointed out that those names had had to appear in the newspapers when the applications were made. The amounts when granted by the Board of Works also appeared in the newspapers; and surely to goodness there could be no serious objection to stating how much of that money had been expended on the works in respect of which it had been applied for, and the nature of those works. He did not wish to mention names, because he did not like to bring charges without being able to substantiate them, which he should not be able to do without the Return asked for; but he had heard of cases in which the money granted had been singularly misapplied. There was one case, however, in Donegal, where a landlord had borrowed money ostensibly to make a wall round his demesne. The landlord had received the money, and if he had applied it to the work for which he had obtained it a large amount of work would have been done and a large amount of employment given; but instead of that he only repaired a portion of an iron railing. The principal reason why the Irish Members made this demand was because this money was public money, lent for a specific public object and for the public benefit, and therefore the public had a right to know how it had been expended. If £5,000 or £10,000 had been granted for the erection of a pier, if the pier were for the benefit of the fishing community generally, the hon. Member would have no objection to state how the money had been spent. Why, then, should he object in this case, in which, as he said, the money had not been granted for the purpose of benefiting the landlords primarily, but for the purpose of benefiting the public? He (Mr. Leamy) was sorry that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had found it necessary, so early in his official capacity at the Treasury, to refuse the reasonable request of the Irish Members; and he could not help thinking that the more the hon. Member considered the matter the more he would come to the conclusion that the Irish Members had no inquisitorial motive in moving for this Return, but that they merely wanted to know how this money given for the Public Service had been actually spent. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in answer to the hon. Member for Sligo Mr. Sexton with regard to the action of the Local Government Board, had made a statement in the House that night which he no doubt thought a sufficient reply to the hon. Member. He had said that he did not know anything about the matter. That was to say, that the right hon. Gentleman who was President of the Local Government Board in Ireland knew nothing whatever of the action taken by the Body over which he presided. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for not knowing much about it, but Englishmen who grumbled at the temper of the Irish people ought not to be too much surprised at that temper when they saw, as in this case, a right hon. Gentleman at the head of a Department pleading absolute ignorance of the work of that Department, and being unable to give information except from people who were hostile to the majority of the Irish Representatives. He (Mr. Leamy) only referred to the right hon. Gentleman's ignorance for the purpose of pointing out the difficulty in which the Irish Members were placed in dealing with matters of this kind. The Solicitor General for Ireland had stated that the case of the two policemen was occupying the attention of the Government, but surely it was a very remarkable fact that the Chief Baron in Ireland should have declared that these men should have been sent up for defeating the ends of justice. He (Mr. Leamy) would give no opinion as to whether these men could have been indicted for conspiracy to murder. It was said that there was some doubt as to whether one of the policemen conspired with the other; but if one conspired with the members of Murphy's family to defeat the inquiry, the Coroner was bound to make it "and for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice;" and if the policeman made his statement for the purpose of enabling the family to obtain blood money, in case his statement was supported there was no doubt plenty of ground for indicting the man. He (Mr. Leamy) hoped that now the hon. and learned Gentleman had taken the matter into his hands the delay which had occurred would be made up for.

MR. MAYNE said, that they had a right to expect something more definite from the Chief Secretary than the reply which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had obtained as to the action of the Local Government Board in regard to the North Dublin Union. This was a matter of considerable importance to the ratepayers of the City of Dublin. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was President of the Irish Local Government Board, and this matter had now been pending nearly a fortnight, and yet the right hon. Gentleman appeared to know nothing of what had been going on. Was not the right hon. Gentleman aware that a letter from the Local Government Board of Ireland had been read at the meeting of the North Dublin Union Guardians yesterday, dated November last—a letter in which it was stated that their attention had been called to the Minute of the Board of Guardians, in which they changed their banking account by resolution, and in which they stated their refusal to permit the Board to carry out that change? The Local Government Board of Ireland took this course on a ground that he thought he was justified in describing as a quibble. They stated that the banker of the Board of Guardians was an official of the Board. Their allegation was that its banker was really the Board's Treasurer, but the banker was paid no salary. He was not appointed in the way officials were appointed, and yet the Local Government Board refused to permit the banking account to be changed, because they stated that under the 24th Order no official of the Board could be changed unless the Local Government Board themselves changed him; and in this case they refused to authorize the change. The reason why the Board of Guardians had endeavoured to effect this change should be borne in mind. It was a very substantial one. The Bank of Ireland had refused a loan for 10 years to the Board of Guardians that the Board deemed to be necessary. The Hibernian Bank had consented to grant it for 4½ per cent, on condition that the account of the Board of Guardians was transferred to them. They at the same time consented, if this arrangement were carried out, to charge nothing on the overdraft which was necessary for the Board of Guardians to make in Dublin and probably everywhere else, because, as most people knew, the rates for the year came in very slowly during the first three or four months of the year, with the result that the Dublin Board of Guardians, at all events, were considerably in debt during those three or four months, and had to overdraw their account. The Bank of Ireland, under those circumstances, took very good care of themselves, and charged 5s. per cent on any overdraft that occurred up to May, notwithstanding that during the remaining months of the year they had a large sum in their hands standing to the credit of the Board. The Hibernian Bank offered to put the large credit which the Guardians had during the latter part of the year against the overdraft in the early part of the year, allowing the overdraft to stand without interest. Those were the reasons why the Guardians of the North Dublin Union thought they could do better for the ratepayers by dealing with the Hibernian Bank. Why, therefore, should the Local Government Board step in between the Guardians and the Banking arrangement, and insist upon mulcting the ratepayers for the benefit of an institution which had hitherto had a monopoly? He (Mr. Mayne), as Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Dublin Corporation, knew that the Bank of Ireland, having this monopoly, were most illiberal under it. The Dublin Corporation were bound by law to deal with this bank, or they would not continue their present relations for a moment. The Dublin Corporation would take their account away from the Bank of Ireland on Monday if they could do so. The Bank of Ireland, knowing the position in which they were placed by the Local Government Board and other official bodies, took advantage of it for the benefit of their shareholders, and mulcted the ratepayers unmercifully. The Guardians of the North Dublin Union had made a manly attempt to deal with a bank which was just as safe a concern as the Bank of Ireland, and was anxious to deal with them liberally. He (Mr. Mayne) submitted that the President of the Irish Local Government Board owed it to the House and to the Irish Members to now state that the action taken by his Board had his disapproval. If the right hon. Gentleman expressed disapproval with the action of the Board of which he was President now, the Board might probably listen to the remonstrances of the Board of Guardians of the North Dublin Union. That Board of Guardians had passed a resolution remonstrating with the Local Government Board, and asking them to reconsider their extraordinary decision; and he asserted that it would help the Local Government Board very considerably if there was an expression of opinion on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, if he could address the House, and if he could not, then on the part of some other occupant of the Treasury Bench, in favour of the spirited and proper action of the Guardians of the North Dublin Union.

Mr. Leamy

Mr. SMALL said, that he had listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and he had understood from his observations in regard to the Castleisland case that the Government were of opinion that they could not prosecute the policemen for manslaughter, because the Coroner's Jury had not brought in such a verdict against them.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND Mr. WALKER: I did not say that. The magistrates had refused to send them for trial.

Mr. SMALL said, there were one or two other matters which had occurred in the North of Ireland which had come under the notice of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and which could not now, therefore, be regarded by him with surprise. He (Mr. Small) wished to draw attention to a trial which had taken place at Armagh in the case of Francis Hughes. An application had been made to get the venue changed from Armagh, on the ground that Party feeling ran so high that a trial of this kind could not be properly held in that county. A man had been violently murdered within a few yards of the Orange Hall in the town where the outrage occurred, and the murder was consequently attributed to Orangemen. He (Mr. Small) had some knowledge of the district, and he was aware that the majority of those on the Jury Panel in that county were strong sympathizers with the Orange brotherhood, many of them being sworn and active members of the organization. Three men, believed to be Orangemen, were charged with the murder to which he referred—the murder of a Catholic, and it was hardly likely that if they were tried locally they would get a fair trial. Therefore, a request was made to the Government to have the venue changed to some other county. The application was a very sensible one, and should have been complied with; but the Government, he understood, held that it would be unfair to change the venue, and that there was no reason to believe that a proper trial could not be had in Armagh. Accordingly, the three men charged with the murder of this Catholic were brought to trial in the county of Armagh. The bill sent up before the Grand Jury was for manslaughter. The Grand Jury threw it out, and found a bill merely for assault occasioning grievous bodily harm, and this notwithstanding that the man whose death was the subject of the trial had been killed by having his skull smashed in with a stone of several pounds weight. Could there be any doubt that an assault of this kind was an assault "occasioning grievous bodily harm?" The case came before the Petty Jury. He (Mr. Small) had often been present at Assizes in the city of Armagh, and had noticed the way in which this business was done. The Crown Solicitor, himself a Catholic—one of the class of men who were most despised in Ireland, that was to say, a Castle Catholic, one of those who were usually found to do the dirty work from which respectable Protestants would recoil—was in the habit of holding the Jury Panel in his hand, going over it, and carefully excluding from it all those whom he knew or believed to be Catholics. He (Mr. Small) asserted most positively that this Crown Solicitor, Kilkelly, had struck off Catholic names time out of mind, and that whenever a Catholic had got upon the panel it was only in consequence of his bearing a name which had a Protestant sound. In the case to which he was referring a jury was empanelled consisting of 11 Protestants and one Catholic, and that in a county where the majority of the people were Catholics. The one Catholic upon the jury got on simply because his name was Adams, which the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware was a well-known Protestant name in Ireland. Mr. Kilkelly had felt himself reasonably certain that William Adams was a Protestant, otherwise he would not have put him on the panel. The three men were put upon their trial before this jury, with the curious result that the prisoners were acquitted even on the minor charge, and were found guilty of a common assault. He presumed that the hon. and learned Gentleman knew, as every criminal lawyer knew, what a common assault was. It was a term which was generally applied to an assault of the slightest character, unaccompanied by serious disturbance or serious result. The jury found that the men who had smashed in their victim's skull with a stone which weighed several pounds were only guilty of a common assault. The trial had taken place before Mr. Justice Johnson, of whom it might be said, whatever could be said of other Judges in Ireland, that he at least was an impartial and just magistrate. This Justice said that of all the evidence which had ever been brought before a Petty Jury none had been clearer than this, and that they would have been justified in bringing in a verdict of manslaughter. It was stated in that House, in reply to an hon. Friend of his (Mr. Small's), a day or two ago, that all the evidence had been produced before the Petty Jury. Was all the evidence produced? Mr. Justice Johnson had given the men 12 months' imprisonment, which he believed was the utmost he could possibly give them. In that way he showed his appreciation of the conduct of the Grand Jury, in the first place, for returning a true bill for a less offence than that for which the prisoners had been indicted; and, secondly, of the conduct of the Petty Jury in bringing in a verdict for a common assault. In sentencing the men the learned Judge said that they had followed their victim as Indians dogged their enemies. He (Mr. Small) could inform the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland that before very long he would hear a great deal more about this trial. In the beginning of June there was a Nationalist demonstration in Newry, on which occasion the Orangemen fired with murderous intention on the Nationalist gathering. Although they were sent for trial by the magistrates, it was found that an impartial trial could not be had in the county town, and application was made to change the venue. The Government, always ready to bring prisoners to Dublin to be tried by special juries, hesitated to bring those men to Dublin to be tried. It was said that the Dublin juries had too much to do, and in the last two years, no doubt, they had had a great deal of work, because they had to try criminals from all parts of Ireland; but it was strange that this only struck the Government when an application was made to change the venue in this case. The Irish Government, however, after hesitating and coquetting with the question, promised to change the venue locally, and they changed it to—Belfast. Yes; they agreed that the prisoners could not have an impartial trial in the county town, and they thought it would be better to bring them before a jury in the county of Antrim. Anyone acquainted with the North of Ireland would know that the Antrim juries were the worst and most bigoted and intolerant in any part of Ireland. The Crown entered on the case at the Belfast Assizes with all the machinery of a State trial. Mr. Justice Murphy formed a strong opinion on the case; but notwithstanding that the jury disagreed. The trials were then adjourned, and it was understood that the venue should be changed to another place; but, to the surprise of everyone, within the last few days the Government had again changed the venue, and again changed it to Belfast. What did the hon. and learned Gentleman think the effect of this would be on the minds of the people in the North of Ireland? Did they want to purge their minds altogether of the idea that they would get any justice whatever from the Government? Irish Members knew that this farce would be gone through again and again; and the Orange jury would be empanelled, and this time he thought there was no chance of disagreement, because the jury would be too well versed in the case before the trial took place. Would the House believe that, in a later trial of an Orangeman charged with firing on a Nationalist procession, the Crown ordered Catholics to stand aside on the jury being empanelled? Only a few days ago, Mr. O'Hare, who was on the panel in Armagh, and a Catholic, was suspected of being a Nationalist, and because of that he was not thought fit by the Crown to be on a jury. Politically, however, he was not sorry for what had occurred in the county of Armagh, for when the next election took place at Newry he knew that the two circumstances he had drawn attention to would be well remembered, and if any gentleman under Whig colours presented himself there he would be likely to go away without the letters M.P. attached to his name.

Mr. Small

Mr. BIGGAR said, it could hardly be a matter of surprise to the House that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should have pleaded ignorance in the matter of the Hibernian Bank and the Guardians of the North Dublin Union, because he was in point of fact thoroughly ignorant of all Irish affairs, and, from what could be judged, likely to continue so. Perhaps, however, owing to the amount of enlightenment he had received from hon. Gentlemen on those Benches, there was hope that he would make some inquiry, and that justice would be done in the case. Then, with regard to the application made to the Board of Works, to which the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had alluded, he had listened with attention to the reply of the Secretary to the Treasury, and although he was not disposed to think harshly of that hon. Gentleman, who, he believed, was desirous of doing what was right, he was bound to say that he had in this case given a peculiarly weak and injudicious answer. It was notorious that the grossest frauds were practised by those who borrowed money from the Government. There was nothing exceptional in the fact that frauds were committed in connection with these Government loans, and the hon. Gentleman, instead of saying to the hon. Member for Mallow that he was very much obliged to him for drawing his attention to the circumstance, and that the subject should be investigated, replied—"If you will make a statement to me privately with regard to any particular case, I will give you every information." But then he took away from the hon. Member for Mallow the means of pursuing the case. He (Mr. Biggar) pointed out that if Returns of the loans were published, the local knowledge of persons who saw them would enable them to form an opinion as to whether or not there was any cause of complaint, and they could then draw attention to the subject through their Representatives, who would endeavour, if possible, to get some redress. A story had been told him by an hon. Member to the effect that, on one occasion, he had gone with the Board of Works Inspector, who had to grant a certificate for work alleged to be done. What occurred? His hon. Friend was alone with the Inspector, who simply went on the confines of the land supposed to have been drained, and asked the farmer—"How many purchases have you made for drainage, and what am I to certify for?" The Inspector never investigated any part of the work done, and in point of fact the certifying was a perfect farce, and he might just as well have certified on the statement of the farmer without going on the premises at all, and without pretending to investigate the matter in any way. He thought, although this was only one instance, that it was sufficient to show that the hon. Gentleman should reconsider this question, with a view to seeing whether, not only in the interest of Irish Members, but in the interest of the Board of Works, whose duty it was to get the work done honestly, and act with some show of judicious management, the system could not be altered. The Board of Works were in this matter the representatives of the Treasury, and he thought, seeing that there was such a tendency to borrow money from the Government on private representations alone, that all those transactions should be made as public as possible, and that information should be given to Members of the House for the purpose of saving the Government from being plundered by advancing money on such pleas. Turning to another subject, he had over and over again drawn the attention of the House to the Vote of £1,200, which year by year came forward for the Ulster Canal Works. The Canal, he pointed out, had never been opened at all, and the money had gone into the pockets of some swindlers, notwithstanding which it was the custom of the Government to grant the money annually. He had always protested against the throwing away of public money for any unproductive work in Ireland and everywhere else, because it was a thing which ought neither to be defended nor practised; and he would always be ready to throw obstacles in the way of the borrowing and spending of public money on works of that kind. Then, with regard to the Castleisland case. It was well known that two persons alleged to be innocent had been hanged for a murder which was committed at that place; and now, when a similar case was proved—when it was shown that two constables had attempted to get innocent men hanged—the Government simply dismissed the men from the Force, and there would be no chance of punishing them further, because, if they had any sense at all, they would get out of the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law. He thought with his hon. Friend the Member for Galway Borough (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that the Government ought to be ashamed of themselves for the course they had taken in this matter; because if the constables had not been found out in this conspiracy to murder, of which if not legally they were morally guilty, some of the 12 men who were arrested would undoubtedly have been hanged. The Government would have taken care that the men were tried at a place where they would be certain of getting a packed jury, they would have brought the case for trial before a partizan Judge like Mr. Justice Lawson or Mr. Justice O'Brien, and a conviction would have followed as a matter of course. Earl Spencer would then have said—"There has been a verdict by a jury given, and I will hang the men whether right or wrong." The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Small) had drawn attention to the change of venue which had taken place in the case of Orangemen who fired upon a Nationalist gathering at Newry, with regard to which he (Mr. Biggar) said, from his own knowledge, that it would be perfectly impossible to get an honest verdict at Belfast. He knew that, because he had been engaged in several cases in which civil juries had perjured themselves in the most atrocious manner, and had returned verdicts against him simply because he happened to belong to a Party different from that to which they belonged. The Government seemed to have lost their minds altogether, or they ought to know that it was their duty to get just and not dishonest verdicts; they ought to know, even from a mere Party point of view, that it was the interest of their Party to be reasonably popular with the Party to which hon. Members on those Benches belonged. As the hon. Member for Wexford had said, there was no doubt that it was the bounden duty of Nationalists in the North of Ireland to throw the whole weight of their power and influence against the Party who acted as gross partizans by deliberately packing juries and taking care that a class of persons who were their enemies politically should get off scot-free, and that those who belonged to the Party whose support they hoped to have at the next Election should be convicted, whether guilty or not. Those were matters with regard to which he thought the Government ought to turn over a new leaf. There was a large part of the Irish population living in England, whose support it would be impossible for the Government to gain if they continued their present course of action with regard to Judges, officials, and juries in Ireland. In point of fact, the whole conduct of the Government in Ireland had been to screen and support persons of bad character, and with regard to persons of good character to do all they could to injure them.

MR. P. J. POWER said, if some of his hon. Friends were a little more experienced in the way in which the Local Government Board discharged the duties of the Department, they would have expressed no surprise at anything they did. It was the practice to send down to the Poor Law Boards in Ireland a gentleman as Auditor from the Local Government Board, who, as a rule, differed with the Guardians on every point. Those gentlemen were most peremptory in the matter of surcharges. In England, if the Auditor made a surcharge there was an appeal against it; but in Ireland there was no appeal, and the Guardians had to submit to any charge, although it might be of the most outrageous character. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) ruled with gentle sway in Ireland, when he arrested and threw into gaol hundreds of the Irish people, without trial, it was not unusual for the wives of persons so arrested to apply to the Boards of Guardians for outdoor relief, while their husbands were in gaol. A "suspect," in the neighbourhood of Waterford, having been arrested, his wife applied to the Guardians for outdoor relief, which was granted her to the extent of 10s. or 15s. a-week for herself and five children. Shortly afterwards the Auditor came down and surcharged the amount paid. The Guardians were told that they should have applied to the Local Government Board before they made the grant, although it should be remembered that the poor woman would have had nothing to subsist on in the meantime. Well, the surcharge was made, and those who signed the checks had no remedy, and they had to pay the amount of the surcharge. If the advice which the hon. Member for Mallow Mr. O'Brien had given had been acted upon, the Board might not have found it very easy to collect the money, and in future they would probably profit by that advice. Then there was another case, with respect to the working of the Labourers' Act, in which a great interest was taken in Ireland. The Board thought it might be well that they should procure guides, published in Dublin, which clearly stated the object of the Act and the way in which it should be put in force. They were obtained, and in that case also the Auditor of the Local Government Board came down and surcharged the amount. Again, for some years previously it had been the habit in the Union over which he had the honour now to preside to make a certain annual payment of £55. He himself made the same payment in one year which his predecessors had made; but owing to some cause which he knew not, the Auditor came down and surcharged him with the sum of £55. That was another peculiar instance of even-handed justice on the part of the Local Government Board. He was happy to say, however, that his predecessor, Sir Robert Paul, and some gentlemen of his Sir Robert Paul's way of thinking and some gentlemen of his own way of thinking, considered the surcharge so monstrous that they interested themselves in the matter, and the Local Government Board spoke to their Auditor, and he, under their influence, did not make a charge. He thought that these few instances would suffice to show hon. Members, no matter to what Party they might belong in that House, that they in Ireland had to put up with a dictatorial spirit on the part of the Local Government Board which English or Scotch Members would not tolerate for 24 hours. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had, last autumn, held out some hopes that he would be prepared to bring in a measure dealing with this subject; however, he had not moved in the matter up to that time. The Local Government Board seemed to have no other work in Ireland than to thwart and annoy the Guardians. Certainly there could be no greater instance of their incapacity than their treatment of an eminent medical man a few years ago. The political views of this gentleman were not in accordance with the opinions held by the Local Government Board, and they, therefore, thought him an inconvenient person to have in a responsible position. When he was thrown into prison his practice suffered considerably, of course; but, in addition to that, this Board of worthies, who sat in Dublin, afterwards deprived him of the position which he held, by sealed order; and he would have been without his position to that day had it not been that popular opinion, which in Ireland was very strong, compelled the Local Government Board to reinstate him. He wished to mention these facts, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House might know what some of the advantages of the present system were. He imagined that a similar state of things would not be allowed to continue in England for 24 hours.

Mr. Biggar

Mr. KENNY regretted that the Members of the Government who were responsible for the administration of Ireland had already exhausted their right to reply to the observations which had been made by some of his hon. Friends. There were a few questions to which he wished to draw attention, and perhaps when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) heard him he might be enabled to offer a few words of explanation. Some time since he (Mr. Kenny) called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the manner in which the Irish Government had set their promise at naught with regard to the appointment to the Magistracy of gentlemen who belonged to the popular religion. Last year the Predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman, the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), and also the present Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), made repeated and distinct promises that if steps were taken to bring before the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland the names of Catholic gentlemen suitable for the position of Justices of the Peace, those gentlemen would be appointed; that, in fact, the Lord Chancellor would exercise his inherent right to appoint them over the heads, if necessary, of the Lord Lieutenants of the counties. Previous to that time, and unfortunately since, the appointment rested with the Lord Lieutenants of counties. Furnishing the other day an example in which a palpable unfairness was perpetrated, he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the Government meant to redeem their pledge by appointing a fair and reasonable number of Catholics to the Bench. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply, said that if the names of Catholic gentlemen were sent directly to the Lord Chancellor, he would consider them, no matter what the Lord Lieutenants of counties might think of the subject. No sooner had the right hon. Gentleman made that statement than he (Mr. Kenny) had sent to him a letter from the Secretary to the Lord Chancellor, in which he stated that with regard to the recommendations for the Commissions of the Peace the Lord Chancellor could not accede to them, owing to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant of the county had not sent a recommendation on the subject. Now, as a matter of fact, the two gentlemen who were recommended by the local Board of Guardians, and also by the respectable people of the locality, happened to be Catholics in religion, and also happened to differ in political opinions from the Lord Lietenant of the county, who was notoriously an extreme Orangeman and a very extreme Tory. Without entering into the question of the appointment to the Magistracy further, he (Mr. Kenny) would like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was fulfilling the expressed promise of the Irish Government last year when he said deliberately in a letter to a responsible body in Ireland that he refused to appoint certain gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace because the Lord Lieutenant of the county would not recommend them? There was another question to which he (Mr. Kenny) desired to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was this. The Government had undertaken to relieve certain districts of Ireland from a portion of extra Constabulary stationed there under the Act of Will. IV. Now, by the system of removal which had been adopted a great injustice had been done to the men who had been removed. In certain of the districts some of the subordinate men were removed while the sergeants remained. Now, under such a system the constables and sub-constables of the district had their prospects in the Force indefinitely postponed. Fifty-two had been removed from the county of Clare. These were all constables and sub-constables, but the sergeants were allowed to remain. Now, the result was that if that force of sergeants was kept up the constables and sub-constables who remained would have no possible chance of reaching any higher position in the Service for the next five or 10 years. That might seem a simple matter to the right hon. Gentleman, but at the same time it was a system which was practised throughout the whole of Ireland, or certainly in those counties in Ireland where the extra police had been stationed. There was another question to which he (Mr. Kenny) wished to draw attention—namely, the manner in which the County Court of Clare had been turned into a mockery by the antics of a gentleman who was called the County Court Judge of that district. For a long time the action of this man had been a perfect public scandal. It was ridiculous in the extreme to suppose that a person of this man's peculiar character could be capable of exercising judicial discretion to the satisfaction of anybody but himself. To give the man his due he was perfectly impartial in his vagaries, for he attacked all men no matter what position—high or low—with an equal want of discretion. He (Mr. Kenny) had drawn the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and also of his Predecessor (Mr. Trevelyan), to certain of this man's performances. He drew the attention of the Chief Secretary the other day to the fact that this County Court Judge was anxious of knowing from a witness who had been a juror in a previous case what verdict he was in favour of giving. Now, the Judge, if he knew the law at all, must have known very well that the question he put to the witness was a gross violation of the law. That was only one of the many freaks this man was constantly guilty of. Now, one of his favourite pranks was when witnesses were called on the table, witnesses infinitely more respectable than himself, to tell them that he did not believe a word they were going to say. That was rather hard on men who, in the first place, had not opened their mouths in the case, and who, in the second place, as far as public character was concerned, stood in a much higher position in the county than the County Court Judge. Recently, he (Mr. Kenny) had his attention drawn to another case in which two gentlemen, both of extreme Conservative views, came into conflict in a civil matter. It was the case of Mr. Studdart, a well-known local gentleman, a Justice of the Peace, a member of the Limerick Board of Works, but who resided in the county of Clare, and who was an extreme Tory, and a Mr. Stacpoole, also an extreme Tory. They had come into conflict concerning the value of some land. Mr. Stacpoole was engaged in the case previous to the one in which he was in conflict with Mr. Studdart. Mr. Stacpoole failed to prove the case, and then when the case in which Mr. Studdart was engaged was called, this County Court Judge immediately asked if the defendant was his friend, Mr. Stacpoole. Mr. Studdart handed up the account as required of him, whereupon Mr. Stacpoole's solicitor said that he had only received a copy of the account that day. A discussion ensued with regard to a longer notice being given; but the plaintiff explained that it was a matter which could be mastered in a few minutes.

Mr. Kenny

Then it was that the peculiarities of the County Court Judge were demonstrated. He threw the account book which had been handed to him on the table, saying he would not hear the case, and directing the Clerk of the Peace to dismiss it. He also told Mr. Studdart to go to some other Court which would hear the case. Mr. Studdart appealed in due course to the Judge of Assize, and the Court gave him a decree with costs. In another case the County Court Judge gave a decree to the plaintiff, refusing to hear the defendant; but when the latter appealed to the Judge of Assize, the decision was reversed. Now, there was another peculiarity about this Mr. Kelly, the County Court Judge. He resided at the County Club, which was kept up by landlords and their agents, and the members of that Club whenever they were concerned in a suit, took good care to earwig his Honour, and prejudice him beforehand on their behalf. That was a thing which went on constantly. If proof were wanted of the manner in which matters were conducted at the County Club, it was only necessary to take the testimony of Mr. Justice O'Hagan. When he was originally appointed Chairman of the county of Clare, he put up at the County Club; but he found he was so annoyed by gentlemen coming to him and stating their cases, and, when he refused to listen to them, taking seats near him, and discussing amongst themselves the relative merits of the suits in which they were engaged, that he was forced to leave the Club, and he refused to re-enter it again until his term of office in Clare ceased. Mr. Kelly stuck to the Club all the closer, because the members made themselves pleasant, and made his duty extremely simple. He (Mr. Kenny) assumed that Mr. Kelly was prejudiced against Mr. Studdart simply because that gentleman happened to be a member of the Limerick Club, and not of the Ennis Club. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would only consult the statistics in the possession of the House with regard to the successful appeals which had been made from the decision of this County Court Judge to the Judge of Assize, he would find sufficient proof of everything he (Mr. Kenny) had said. Some time ago a pamphlet was published in Ireland by a well-known member of the Irish Bar, dealing with the County Court question, and condemning strongly the present system. It was conclusively proved in that pamphlet that not only in one, but in many counties, the County Court system was equivalent to a travesty of justice. This was a serious matter to the unfortunate persons who happened to be litigants in Ireland. Many litigants were compelled to graduate through the County Court, involving them in great expense, before they were entitled to appear before the Judge of Assize. When, in 1877, a new law came into force, and a number of very able men were removed from the position of County Court Judges, or Chairmen of Counties, as they were then called, and a number of men, who were unfortunately their inferiors in every respect, were put in their place, appeals had grown rapidly, and the expense incurred by litigants in Ireland had been vastly multiplied, owing to the present most unjust and worthless system. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary thought it worth while to pay any attention to what he (Mr. Kenny) was saying; but he assured the right hon. Gentleman that the subject was not altogether unimportant, and that he might find before long there would be such an outcry raised with regard to the system of administration of the law in Ireland that it would be made extremely uncomfortable for any English Minister who turned a deaf ear to the demand of the people. Now, attention had been called to the money expended in foolish and absurd projects by the Board of Works. It was a notorious fact that almost every work which the Board of Works had undertaken had failed. The Board commenced their career a failure, in 1846 or 1847, during the Famine period, for at that time their favourite amusement was the endeavour to make water run up hills. If necessary, he could give an instance in which the Board of Works absolutely intended to drain a district in such a way that the water, instead of flowing downwards, would have been forced upwards. The conduct of the Board of Works in Ireland in sanctioning loans in a great many instances where loans ought not to have been sanctioned deserved the serious attention of the House. It was well to contrast their conduct in this respect with their niggardliness in refusing loans to industrious farmers simply on account of some technical flaw in the form of agreement, or in the signatures sent up. As a matter of fact, the Board of Works placed every objection in the way of honest and industrious men who required money for the improvement of their farms. Yet they made no demur in granting a loan of many thousand pounds to an arrant swindler. He knew instances in which the Board of Works had so assured farmers of their safety in getting loans, that the farmers had undertaken works, and virtually carried them out, expecting to receive an advance in due course from the Board of Works; but that then the Board of Works had sprung some objection, and the result was that the farmers, having undertaken an expenditure they could not afford, were virtually brought to ruin. Contrast such conduct with the action of the Board in lending to Mr. Drinkwater, of County Clare, a sum of £80,000 for the purpose of working out a scheme which would never be worth £20,000, or even £10,000. The loan was made to this individual under the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). He (Mr. Kenny) believed that this Mr. Drinkwater, who happened to be an Englishman, went across to Dublin, after having got some kind of a Private Bill passed through this House, authorizing a certain loan, and made a speech in Dublin Castle to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, in which speech he described the inhabitants of Clare as a set of barbarians whom he wished to civilize. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, with his cast-iron notions of philanthropy, got the Treasury to grant the man a loan of £78,000. Now, there was no inquiry whatever made into the character of the man. When Drinkwater had run through the money which he got from the Government in Ireland, he came over to England, and started as one of the "Long Firm," with the result that the gentleman soon found himself in gaol. This was the character of the man who went over to Ireland to civilize the people, and carry out philanthropic projects nominally for the civilization of the people, but really for the benefit of his own pocket. Drinkwater succeeded in extorting money from the Treasury, whereas honest Irishmen, who were really anxious to expend money in reproductive works, were refused loans by the Board of Works. This was one of the things which had the effect of ruining Irish credit; and perhaps five or 10 years hence, when a genuine scheme of reproductive work was formulated, and a loan was asked for, it would be thrown in the teeth of the people that a certain Drinkwater, in the year 1880, got a loan of £80,000 from the Treasury, and that not a single fraction had ever been repaid. The Government must admit—though the late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would never admit it—that in their action towards Mr. Drinkwater they had been extremely mistaken and extremely foolish. At the same time, he (Mr. Kenny) pointed out to the Treasury that in this matter they were themselves entirely to blame, and that they ought not to be in any way prejudiced with regard to future schemes which were promoted by honest and proper men. The men who were really anxious to carry out proper schemes were men who did not object to have their antecedents and character fully investigated. It was only swindlers like this man, Drinkwater, who never intended to repay loans made them, that so objected. He trusted the Government would be able to give some satisfactory explanation as to the manner in which Drinkwater succeeded in obtaining £78,000, and how it was they had allowed themselves and the country to be swindled to so great an extent.

Mr. Kenny

Resolutions agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the years ending on the 31st day of March 1884 and 1885, the sum of £2,130,064 5s. 7d. be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

2. Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, the sum of £10,804,760 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

CARE OF GOOD HOPE (RAILWAY LOAN)

BILL.

Resolutions [March 18] reported, and agreed to:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ARTHUR OTWAY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. HIBBERT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 101.]

MOTIONS.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

MR. SEXTON: (On this Motion I have only to complain that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) has broken his word which he gave to me at Question time to-day. The right hon. Gentleman promised that at the end of the Sitting he would ask leave to introduce Bills relating to the Registration of Voters and the Irish Constabulary. He has not done so, and I beg to say that such conduct on the part of the right hon. Gentleman is unworthy and unjustifiable, and we shall not forget it.

Question put, and agreed to.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS (IRELAND) PROVISIONAL ORDERS

BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders, under "The Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1862," and the Acts amending the same, relating to the Upper Morning Star Drainage District, county Limerick, and the Cashen River Drainage District, county Kerry, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented and read the first time. [Bill 100.]

MISCELLANEOUS AND OTHER SERVICES.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Expenditure for Miscellaneous Services, and the Expenses of the Postmaster General and the Revenue Boards."—Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

CHURCH BOARDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ALBERT (Jury), Bill for the establishment of Church Boards in the parishes of England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ALBERT (Jury), Mr. ROBERT REID, Mr. EDWARD HOWARD, Mr. FRANCIS BURNES, and Mr. HORTLEWORTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 102.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Three o'clock.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

VOLUME CCXCV.

THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1884 - 5.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amend., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—L., Lords.—C., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings":—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

ACLAND, Mr. C. T. D., Cornwall, E. Div.

Friendly Societies—Report of the Chief Registrar, 1883, 1886, 1887

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, Amend. 1173

Africa

Lords

East Coast—St. Lucia Bay, Question, The Earl of Harrowby, Answer, The Earl of Derby; short debate thereon Mar 3, 60

West Coast—The Cameroons—German Occupations, Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville Mar 10, 823

Africa

Commons

East Coast—German Annexations near Zanzibar, Question, Mr. Stagg; Answer, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice Mar 10, 613

VOL. CCXCV. [THIRD SERIES.] (cont.)

Africa—Commons—cont.

South

Mr. Muen's Irregular Horse, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 10, 623. Question, Mr. Unwin; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 1696

Bechuanaland

Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 10, 613. Question, Mr. Ingham-Hartland; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 890. Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 12, 1692

Stallaland—White Adventurers—Tides to Land, Question, Mr. A. M. Arthur; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 12, 853

Zululand—The Famine in the Reserved Territory, Question, Mr. A. M. Arthur; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 10, 1233

3 P

(cont.)

Africa (South)—COMMONS—cont.

Troops for the Soudan, Questions, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington; Question, Mr. Healy [no reply] Mar 5, 95

West Coast

West African Conference—The Papers, Questions, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 854

West African Convention—Inland Transit Duties, Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 13, 1076

The Cameroons—German Occupations, Question, Mr. Barran; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 16, 1230

Alleged Insult by Germany to the British Flag, Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 10, 625

AGNEW, Mr. W., Lancashire, S.E.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, 1099; add. cl. 1525

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—National Gallery, 210

Agricultural Statistics—Price of Barley in 1884

Question, Mr. Hicks; Answer, Mr. J. Holms Mar 17, 1430

ALEXANDER, General C., Ayrshire, S.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1759

Egypt—Military Expedition to the Soudan—Vote of Thanks to the Troops, 881

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 318; Schedule 1, 1603, 1610, 1618

America (South)—The Argentine Republic—Claims of Patrick Cantlon

Question, Mr. Gray; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 93

ARGYLL, Duke of

Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.), 2R. 1415

ARMY (Miscellaneous Questions)

Army Discipline Act, 1881—The Colonial Contingents in the Soudan, Question, Colonel Stanley; Answer, The Judge Advocate General Mar 19, 1700

Defective Cartridges—Military Expedition to the Soudan, Question, Viscount Lewisham; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 626; Question, Sir Trevor Lawrence; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 878

Defence of Military and Naval Stations, Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 16, 1242; Observations, Mr. W. H. Smith; Reply, The Marquess of Hartington; short debate thereon Mar 19, 1719

Peat - Moss Litter, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 9, 439; Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. J. Lowther; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 624

[cont.]

ARMY—cont.

Quartermasters—Disabilities, Question, Mr. Causton; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 860

Royal Engineers' Department, Woolwich—Quartermasters of Works, Question, Mr. H. S. Northcote; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 9, 437; Question, Mr. Causton; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 860

Royal Military Academy, Woolwich—Meals of Cadets, Questions, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 857; Mar 16, 1243; Mar 19, 1690

Royal Military Colleges, Sandhurst and Woolwich—Report of Board of Visitors, Question, Observations, Viscount Enfield, Viscount Bury; Reply, The Earl of Morley Mar 19, 1666

The Force in Ireland, Question, Mr. William Redmond; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 131

The Marine Artillery and Infantry, Question, Viscount Lewisham; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 122

The Royal Infirmary, Dublin, Question, Mr. Eaton; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 17, 1444

The Staff College, Question, Colonel Milne Home; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 19, 1694

Ordnance Department

Artillery and Rifles—The Gardner Gun at Abu Klea, Observations, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Carbutt; Reply, Mr. Brand Mar 19, 1709

Old Army Stores, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Brand Mar 10, 614

The 80-ton Guns of H.M.S. "Inflexible," Questions, Mr. Carbutt; Answers, Mr. Brand Mar 19, 1698

The Maxim Gun, Question, Mr. Carbutt; Answer, Mr. Brand Mar 10, 608

Purchase of Cartridges, Questions, Mr. Cole-ridge Kennard, Mr. Sampson Lloyd; Answers, Mr. Brand Mar 10, 611

Army (India)

Bounties to Soldiers, Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 5, 109

Soldiers' Reading Room, Allahabad, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 9, 428

The Auxiliary Forces

Organization and Equipment, Notice, Observations, The Earl of Wemyss, Viscount Bury Mar 19, 1668

Militia

Embodiment of the Militia, Question, Mr. Sidney Herbert; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 16, 1243

Militia Officers on Service in Africa, Questions, Sir Frederick Milner; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 619

[cont.]

ARMY—cont.

Volunteers

Volunteer Regiments, Question, Mr. Coleridge Kennard; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 19, 1891

The 31st Middlesex Volunteers, Question, Mr. Carington; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 9, 1891

Naval Artillery Volunteers, Question, Mr. Stewart MacLiver; Answer, Sir Thomas Brassey Mar 9, 1891

The Yeomanry

Martini-Henrys for the, Question, Mr. Montague Guest; Answer, Mr. Brand Mar 6, 1891

Pay for Extra Troop Drills, Question, Lord Harris; Answer, The Earl of Morley Mar 9, 1891

Army Administration

Address for Papers (The Viscount Bury) Mar 13, 1891; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Army (Commissariat and Transport Services)

Moved, "That the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Commissariat and Transport Services of the British Army in the recent Egyptian Campaign (1882), and to consider what changes, if any, are required to secure increased efficiency in these Services, be re-appointed:—That Mr. Brand, Dr. Cameron, Colonel Milne Home, Mr. Carington, Mr. Brown, Mr. Jackson, Sir Henry Fletcher, Lord Edward Cavendish, Colonel Nolan, Mr. Earp, Mr. Herbert, Dr. Farquharson, and Colonel Stanley be the Members of the said Committee:—That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records:—That Five be the quorum of the Committee" (Colonel Stanley) Mar 17, 1891; after short debate, Question put. A. 49, N. 63; M. 19 (D. L. 63)

Army (Reserve)—First-Class Army Reserve Men

Address for, "Return of the number of First Class Army Reserve men in each regimental district who have been registered as desirous of civil employment in accordance with General Order 79, of June 1884" (The Earl of Ducie) Mar 19, 1891; after short debate, Motion agreed to

ARNOLD, Mr. A., Salford

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Foot-and-Mouth Disease in Norfolk, 1886

Egypt (Finance, &c.—International Arrangement, Ministerial Statement, 1889, 1890

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, Amendt. 717, 727, 732, cl. 27, 1314

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Superannuations and Retired Allowances, 952

ASHER, Mr. A. (Solicitor General for Scotland), Elgin Burghs

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. Schedule 1, 1612

ASHLEY, Hon. E. M. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Isle of Wight

Africa (South)—Questions

Bechuanaland, 613, 1899

Famine in Zululand, 1233

Methuen's Irregular Horse, 623

White Adventurers in Stellaland, 852

Australasian Colonies—Queensland—Movement for Separation, 99

Cyprus—M. Bistachi, Chief Inspector of Revenue, 667

Egypt—War in the Sudan—Military Co-operation of the Colonies, 113, 114

Islands of the Pacific—Alleged Cession of Islands, 849

New Guinea—Occupation of the Northern Coast by Germany, 866, 867

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Diplomatic Services, 970, 991

ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Mr. E., Eye

Army—Artillery and Rifles—Gardner Gun at Abu Kira, 1709, 1712

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Land Forces, 451, 466, 467

Asia (Central)—Questions

England and Russia—Negotiations, 1246,

1246;—Declaration of Paris, 1854, 1897

Russian Railway, 1437

Russo-Afghan Frontier, 127, 129, 883, 1340, 1419, 1703

Egypt—War in the Sudan—Questions

Employment of Turkish Troops, 843, 891

Kassala, 114, 614, 619

Sudan Border Expedition, 117

Egypt and the Sultan—Speech of Prince Bismarck in the Reichstag, 293

Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1303

Navy (Supplementary) Estimate—Military Operations in Egypt, &c. 146, 147, 151

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Diplomatic Services, 937

Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1184

Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1027

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir H. JAMES), Taunton

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Comm. add. cl. 1141, 1143

Municipal Voters (Relief), Comm. 222; cl. 3, Motion for reporting Progress, id.; cl. 4, Amendt. 344

Parliamentary Elections—Expenses of Candidates, 284

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, 1022, 1026, 1029, 1107, cl. 7, 1174, 1175, cl. 8, 1109, 1171, cl. 11, 1172; cl. 14, 1121, 1124, 1105, 1127, 1194, cl. 27, 1313, 1315, 1320, 1322, 1323, Postponed cl. 26, 1324

Public Meetings— Riot at Aston Hall, Birmingham, 691, 803

Registration Acts Consolidation, 1690

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The—cont.

Registration (Occupation Voters) Bills, 132, 133
Registration (Occupation Voters), 2R. 1202, 1203

Australasian Colonies — Queensland — Movement for Separation

Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 5, 99

Australasian Colonies — Colonial Naval Force

Address for, "Copies of or extracts from Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of any of the Australasian Colonies relative to the formation and maintenance of a Colonial naval force" (The Viscount Sidmouth) Mar 16, 1205; after short debate, Motion agreed to [See titles New Guinea—Western Pacific, Islands of the]

AYLMER, Captain J. E. F., Maidstone

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Land Forces, 499
Egypt — Military Expedition — Supplies for Officers — Imposition of Customs Duty by Egypt, 622
Troops in the Soudan—Sun Spectacles, 622
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 808; cl. 3, 1111; cl. 4, 1132

BAILEY, Sir J. R., Herefordshire

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add. cl. 1632

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B. (Lord Advocate for Scotland), Clackmannan, &c.

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1853—Amendment, 1434
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 314; cl. 2, 800, 827, 823; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1601, 1631, 1632, 1642, 1644, 1652, 1653
Registration (Occupation Voters) Bills, 133
Royal Commission on Trawling—The Report, 1689
Scotland—Questions
Excise Licences, 448
Inspection of Rivers under "The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876," 1228
Law and Justice—Arrest of John Macdonald for Poaching, 99;—Trial of Crofters at Stornoway, 422
Magistracy — Mr. W. Ivory, Sheriff of Inverness-shire, 1686
Prisons Act, 1877—Appointment of Prison Chaplains, 1432

BALFOUR, General Sir G., Kincardineshire

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Land Forces, 498
Army (India)—Bounties to Soldiers, 169
Asia (Central)—Map of Afghanistan, 426
East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 580

BALFOUR, General Sir G.—cont.

India—Bengal Settlement, 1703, 1680
Navy (Supplementary) Estimates — Military Operations in Egypt, &c. 146

BALFOUR, Mr. A. J., Hertford

Parliament—Business of the House, 452, 890
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Diplomatic Services, 979
Superannuation and Retired Allowances, 984

BARCLAY, Mr. J. W., Forfarshire

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1275
Royal Commission on Trawling—The Report, 1689

BARING, Mr. T. C., Essex, S.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1157
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1193

BARRAN, Mr. J., Leeds

Africa (West Coast)—Cameroons, 1230
Law and Justice (England and Wales)—Inadequate Sentence—Case of Charles Forster, Leeds Assizes, 1228
Post Office—Continental Mails (Yorkshire), 605

BARRINGTON, Viscount

Poisons, 2R. 1064
Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.), 2R. 1407, 1417

Barristers Admission (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Callan, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. Healy, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Kenny)
c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 12 [Bill 95]

BARTTELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, IV.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1766, 1773, 1774
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Land Forces, 463, 473, 474, 475
Egypt (Military Expedition) — General Graham's Advance, 1707
Estimates—Increase of the Army, 130
Parliament—Business of the House, 1037
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Army of Occupation, Egypt, 1199
Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1107
Grant to the Family of the late General Charles George Gordon, 1197

BAXTER, Right Hon. W. E., Montrose, &c.

Post Office—North American Mails, 423

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks, Gloucestershire, &c.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 783; add. cl. 1644; cl. 9, 1477, 1478; Schedule 1, 1654, 1655

BERESFORD, Mr. G. De La Poer, Armagh
Ireland—Law and Justice—Newtownhamilton
Petty Sessions—Mr. Starr, 450
Parliament—Questions—Order—Newspaper
Press—Offensive Cartoons, 1679, 1680
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 313, 314; cl. 2, 779

BIGOAR, Mr. J. G., Cavan Co.
India—Bergal Tenancy, 639
Ireland—Questions
Civil Servants in Bankruptcy—Case of Mr.
John Kirwan—Order of Court of Bankruptcy, 1003
Law and Police—Cavan Co. Free Force,
847;—Dublin Police and Clubs, 1231
Magistracy—Belfast Police Court—Mr.
Forbes, R.M. 4:7;—Mr. W. W. Newenham, Co. Cork, 1064
Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Arms Licences—James Lord, of Mount Nugent,
423, 1064
Poor Law—Mr. Robert Graham, Clerk of Coochill Union, 91, 845
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate—Military
Operations in Egypt, &c. 105, 171
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 43; cl. 2, 644, 750; cl. 3, 1112
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment
of a Committee, 80
Supply, Report, 1893
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—
Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland, 150, 181,
183
National Gallery, 217
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1024; Amendt.
1025

BIRKBECK, Mr. E., Norfolk, N.
Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund,
1299

Board of Works Ireland) Bill
(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Herbert Gladstone)
c. 3R. deferred, after short debate Mar 9, 594
(Bill 52)

BOLTON, Mr. J. C., Stirling
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 929

BORLASE, Mr. W. C., Cornwall, E.
Railways (India)—Preference Rates for Wheat,
426

Borneo (North)
Questions, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Lord Edmund
Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 104; Mar 9, 445

BOURKE, Right Hon. R., Lynn Regis Africa—West African Conference—The Papers, 534
Africa—West African Convention—Inland
Transit Duties, 1076
Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Negotiations, 1246
British Ministers Abroad—The Embassy at Constantinople, 854

BORRIS, Right Hon. R.—cont.
Egypt (Finance, &c.), 882, 891, 1219
Prince Bismarck—The Papers, 833
Foreign Affairs—Germany—Earl Granville and Count Herbert Bismarck, 1077
General Gordon's Diaries, 1069
General Gordon's Telegrams, 1000
Zanzibar—Succession to the Sovereignty, 853

BRAMWELL, Lord
Law and Justice—Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic, Motion for an Address, 601
Water Companies (Regulation of Powers), 2R.
Amendt. 1422, 1424, 1426

BRAND, Hon. H. R. (Surveyor General of the Ordnance), Stroud
Army—Artillery and Rifles—The Gardner
Gun at Abu Klea, 1712
Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Martini-Henry's for the Yeomanry, 290
Army—Ordnance Department—Questions
Position (Ten of H.M.S. "Inflexible," 1000
Maxim Gun, 608
Old Army Stores, 614
Purchase of Cartridges, 612
Army Estimates Supplementary, 1894-5—
Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 527, 528, 529, 533
Egypt—Suehik-Berber Railway—Contract for Locomotives, 430, 431
War in the Soudan—Water Supply—Pipes and Pumps, 249, 290, 431, 574, 576
Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund,
1296, 1297

BRASSEY, Sir T. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Hastings
Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Naval Artillery
Volunteers, 433
Navy—Questions
Armoured Vessels—Error in Returns, 850
Building, &c.—Belted Cruisers, 613, 616;
—Torpedo Boats, 614
Engineers' Committee—The Report, 854
Ordnance, &c.—Experiments with Shells,
611
Pensions—Petty Officers, 125
Royal Yacht "Victoria and Albert," 277
Shipbuilding—Private Shipbuilders, 278
Ships fitted with the Electric Light, 1230
State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1304
Navy Estimates—Departmental Statement,
1305, 1309, 1314, 1317
Navy Supplementary Estimate—Military
Operations in Egypt, &c. 133, 136, 137, 138,
139, 141, 156, 157, 159, 160, 163, 165, 172,
174, 177

BRIGHT, Right Hon. J., Birmingham
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 26, 1503

British Agricultural Association Bill
1. 2R. negatived, after short debate Mar 13, 1046

BROADHURST, Mr. H., Stoke-on-Trent

Education Department—Technical Education, 1237

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Pumps for the Soudan, 451

Enfranchisement of Leaseholders, 1248

Friendly Societies—Reports of the Registrars, 863

H.M. Palace of Windsor, 846

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F., Surrey, W.

Africa (South)—Expedition to Bechuanaland—Methuen's Irregular Horse, 1696

Corporation of London Tower Bridge Bill, 124

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add. cl. 1548

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution)—Representation of Minorities, 1695

Town Parks (Ireland), Motion for a Select Committee, Motion for reporting Progress, 1571, 1581

BROWN, Mr. A. H., Wenlock

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services, Motion for Re-appointment of Select Committee, 1567

Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. 271

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1270

BRUCE, Hon. R. P., *Fifeshire*Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 830BRUCE, Sir H. H., *Coleraine

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 773, 774, 775, 1435

BRYCE, Mr. J., Tower Hamlets

Egypt—Military Expedition—List of Casualties, 288

Law and Justice — The Commoners at St. Albans, 281

Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. 266

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 323, 328, 399, 657; cl. 10, 1487

Treaty of Berlin—Albania and Macedonia, 627

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 572

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Chaplains in the Soudan, 107, 108

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 40; cl. 2, 824, 825, 826; add. cl. 1633; Schedule 1, 1606, 1613BUCKINGHAM and CHANDOS, Duke of

Army (Reserve), Motion for a Return, 1671

BURGHLEY, Lord, Northamptonshire, N.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1805

Burmah—Renewal of Diplomatic Arrangements

Question, Observations, Viscount Sidmouth; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley Mar 13, 1054

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

Mines Regulation Act—Usworth Colliery Explosion, 288

BURY, Viscount

Army (Auxiliary Forces), Notice, 1668

Army — Royal Military Colleges, Sandhurst and Woolwich, Report of Board of Visitors, 1667, 1668

Army Administration, Motion for Papers, 1055

Army (Reserve), Motion for a Return, 1671

Egypt (Military Expedition) — The Suakin-Berber Railway, 54

Egypt (War in the Soudan)—Colonies (Military Service), Motion for an Address, 1217

Zebehr Pasha, 1429

Law and Police—Street Newsvendors, 1670

BUXTON, Mr. S. C., Peterborough

Law and Police—Sunday Newsvendors, 1436

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add. cl. 1528, 1532CAINE, Mr. W. S. (Civil Lord of the Admiralty), *Scarborough

Egypt—Questions

Hired Transports — The Suakin-Berber Railway, 1683

Military Expedition — Wives of Marines serving in the Soudan, 1684

War in the Soudan—Battle of Tamai—Mr. Cathie, R.N., 287

Merchant Shipping—Questions

Steamship "Clyde," 432

The Troopship "Poonah," 91

Transport Service, 122

Navy—Questions

Committee on Naval Pensions, 1076;—Naval Pensioners, 1227

Dockyard Artificers, 438

Greenwich Age Pension, 885

Royal Naval Hospital, Stonehouse, 1285

Service under Steam, 1438

The Transport "Arab," 876

Widows and Orphans of Warrant Officers, 288, 1227

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1272

Navy (Supplementary Estimate) — Military Operations in Egypt, &c. 155, 156, 158, 171, 173, 178

CAIRNS, Earl

Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.), 2R. 1417

CALLAN, Mr. P., Louth

Ireland—Questions

Inland Revenue Stamp Office, Dublin, 95

Magistracy—Ballymena Bench of Magistrates, 105

Parliamentary Elections—Registration of Voters, 90

Poor Law—Omagh Workhouse Children—Wearing of Shoes and Stockings, 441

Post Office—Sub-Postmaster of Craanford, 1082

Ireland — Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of Select Committee, 587, 589

CALLAN, Mr. P.—cont.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 744, 809
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment
of a Committee, 76
Registration (Occupation Voters) Bills, 133
Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1352
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1021

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services
—Re-appointment of Select Committee,
1562, 1570
Egypt (Military Expedition)—Purchase of Camels, 1702;—The Supplies, 100
Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1251, 1266,
1267, 1271
Parliament—Business of the House, 450
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1619, 1643, 1654
Patent Medicines Act, 884
Scotland—Education Department—School
Board for Lensie, 813, 844
Law and Justice—Trial of Crofters at Stornoway, 421, 422

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
Army Services and Military Operations
in the Soudan, 512, 554
Land Forces, 463
Asia (Central)—Afghan Boundary Commission, 626
Egypt—Questions
Events in the Soudan, 114
Nile Railroad, 236
The Courbash, 273
War in the Soudan—Suakin-Berber Expedition, 117
Egypt (Military Expedition)—Army in Egypt,
Res. 1713, 1715
India—Bengal Tenancy, 631
Railways—Preference Rates for Wheat,
426 India—East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 568
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 8; Schedule 1, 1605, 1607, 1613,
1611, 1633, 1636, 1639, 1640, 1644, 1645, 1651 Redistribution of Seats (Scotland)—Boroughs and Burghs, 296
Supply—Embassies and Missions Abroad,
1190, 1200

CAMPBELL, Mr. J. A., Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities

Local Government Board—Cheltenham Medical Officer of Health, 1230
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 854; Schedule 1, 1643

CAMPBELL, Mr. R. F. F., Ayr, &c.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1619

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. H.
(Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Stirling, &c.

Ireland—Questions

Arran Islands and Galway Dispensary Districts, 449
Civil Servants in Bankruptcy—Case of Mr.
John Kirwan—Order of Court of Bankruptcy, 1063
Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—
Cattle Disease, 1231
Court of Bankruptcy—Returns for 1883 and 1884, 103
Crime and Outrage—Assault on Denis
Murphy, Castleisland, Co. Kerry, 285,
614, 618, 875, 876;—Fight for a Drum—
Fivemiletown Petty Sessions, 98, 99
Extra Police Tax, Limerick, 101
Fisheries—Trawling, 861
Fishery Piers and Harbours—Tarbert Pier,
603
Labourers' Act, 1883—Ennistymon Caten,
1063;—Mr. Penneft, Official Arbitrator,
1693, 1694
Lunatic Asylums—Salaries of Attendants,
1653
Municipal Franchise—Assimilation to English Franchise, 101
Parliamentary Registration—Voters' Lists,
Dublin, 610
Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Arms
Licences—James Lord, of Mount Nugent,
424, 1064
Police Expenses—Incidence of Cost, 1694
Prevention of Crime Act, 1883—Extra
Police, Clare County, 428;—Searches,
&c. 610, 611
Queen's College, Galway—Professor D'Arcy
Thompson, 95, 863, 864
Queen's Colleges, 606
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 273
Representation of the People Act, 1884—
Instructions to Clerks of Unions and Rate Collectors, 580
Roads and Bridges—Drumhariffe Bridge,
County Roscommon and Leitrim, 674
Seeds Supply Act—Repayment of Loans, 1067, 1068
Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, 282, 243
Viceregal Court—Gentleman Usher to the
Lord Lieutenant, 121
Ireland—Law and Justice—Questions
Disorderly Language—Case of George
Barker, Clifden, Co. Sligo, 1684
Grand Jury of Meath—Exemption from Service, 890, 891
Letterkenny Quarter Sessions, 606
Mr. John Eccles, Petty Sessions Clerk,
Portadown, 1070
Newtownhamilton Petty Sessions—Mr.
Starr, 451
Queen v. Ryan—Kilrush Quarter Sessions, 119
Ireland—Law and Police—Questions
Alleged Misconduct of Emergency Men at Clare Island, Co. Mayo, 275
Case of Thomas Lyden, 292
Cavan Co. Five Fords, 847
Dublin Police and Clubs, 1234
Gambling Clubs in Dublin, 609

CAMPBELL-BANKERMAN, Right Hon. H.—cont.

Meetings of the National League—Intrusion of the Police at Cashel, 279, 280
 Riots at Derry—Alleged Orange Attack on Sisters of Mercy, 621, 622
 St. Patrick's Day—Demonstration at Londonderry, 1083

Ireland—Magistracy—Questions

Appointment of Roman Catholics, Co. Clare, 280, 281
 Ballymona Bench of Magistrates, 104, 105
 Belfast Police Court—Mr. Forbes, R.M. 427
 Co. Tyrone, 425, 426
 Gorey Petty Sessions, 1236
 Kildare and Clare Counties, 1685
 Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M. 443
 Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P. 282
 Mr. W. W. Newnham, Co. Cork, 1065, 1066
 Oldcastle Petty Sessions, 856
 Petty Sessions—Cloonclare District, Co. Leitrim, 1227
 Tipperary Grand Jury—Benedine Bridge, Nenagh, 859

Ireland—National Education—Questions

Commissioners of National Education—Result of School Examinations—Supply to School Managers, 97
 Intermediate Education, Board of, 865
 National Education Bill, 1708

Ireland—Poor Law—Questions

Elections, 858, 863
 Mr. Robert Graham, Clerk of Cootehill Union, 92, 845
 Monaghan Workhouse—Dr. Hall, Medical Officer, 847
 Omagh Workhouse Children—Wearing of Shoes and Stockings, 441
 Union Rating, 433

Ireland—Poor Law—Election of Guardians—Questions

Legal Advice, 1639
 Maghernologher, Co. Donegal, 424
 Non-Resident Electors, 1639
 Qualifications—Mr. M. Kilkelly, Athlone, 1210
 Scrutiny of Votes, 442

Ireland—Prisons—Questions

Constitution of the Board, 293
 Dismissal of Warders at Mountjoy Prison, 444, 625
 Prisons Board, 1431

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Questions

Horses for Officers, 1226
 James Ellis French, late Detective Director, 439
 Recess Police, 848
 The Free Force, 1387, 1396, 1405

Ireland—Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of Select Committee, 587

Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1370
 Report, 1810, 1813

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 988, 990, 991, 997, 1000, 1003, 1015, 1016

Prisons, Ireland, 186

Public Education, Ireland, 895, 899, 908, 910, 911, 912, 925, 926, 927, 928

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

Parliament—Business of the House—War in the Soudan—Military Co-operation of the Colonies, 597
 Private Bills, 1203
 Water Companies (Regulation of Powers), 2R. 1418, 1422, 1424, 1426

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Egypt (Expeditionary Force)—Army Chaplains in the Soudan, Motion for an Address, 1312
 Roman Catholic Disabilities (Adrowsons, &c.), 2R. 1411

Cape of Good Hope (Railway Loan)

Considered in Committee; Resolutions agreed to Mar 18, 1861
 Resolutions reported Mar 19

Cape of Good Hope (Railway Loan) Bill (Sir Arthur Otway, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Hibbert)c. Resolutions in Committee Mar 18

Resolutions reported, and agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1st Mar 19 [Bill 101]

CARBUTT, Mr. E. H., Monmouth, &c.

Army—Artillery and Rifles—The Gardner Gun at Abu Klen, 1711
 Ordnance Department—Maxim Gun, 608; —80-ton Gun of H.M.S. "Inflexible," 1698

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 512, 527

Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1285, 1297

Navy (Supplementary Estimate)—Military Operations in Egypt, &c. 141, 142, 147

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 11, Amendt. 1489, 1492

CARINGTON, Hon. R. C., Bucks

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—24th Middlesex Volunteers, 431

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services, Motion for Re-appointment of Select Committee, 1569

Merchant Shipping—Steamship "Clyde," 432

CARLINGFORD, Lord (Lord President of the Council)

British Agricultural Association, 2R. 1054
 Poisons, 2R. 1662, 1666

CARNARVON, Earl of

Africa (South-East Coast)—St. Lucia Bay, 61, 63

Australasian Colonies—Colonial Naval Force, Motion for Papers, 1208

Egypt (Expeditionary Force)—Army Chaplains in the Soudan, Motion for an Address, 1211

Navy—State of the Navy, Ministerial Programme, 240

CARTWRIGHT, Mr. W. C., Oxfordshire
Literature, Science, and Art—National Gallery—Purchase of Pictures, 1083

CAUSTON, Mr. R. K., Colchester
Army—Quartermasters, 860
Royal Engineers—Military Foremen of Works, 860
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1754, 1757
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add. cl. 1831, 1836
Railway Rates and Charges, 1073, 1075

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, IV.
Africa (South)—Troops for the Soudan, 95, 96
Army—Seaward Defence of Military Ports, 1727, 1728
Army Estimates (Numbers)—Departmental Statement, 1745
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 523, 529, 533, 534, 538
Land Forces, 457

Central Asia

Lords

England and Russia—The Negotiations, Question, Observations, The Marquess of Salisbury; Reply, Earl Granville Mar 10, 1204; Question, Observations, The Marquess of Salisbury, Lord Strathnairn; Replies, Earl Granville, The Earl of Kimberley Mar 17, 1437

Commons

Afghan Boundary Commission—Sir Peter Lumley, Chief Boundary Commissioner, Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 112

The Russo-Afghan Boundary, Questions, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Henrage, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Answers, Mr. Gladstone; Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor (no reply) Mar 5, 120; Questions, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Gourley; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 12, 871; Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 16, 1240; Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Gibson, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. McCoan, Lord George Hamilton, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Onslow, Mr. F. Stanhope, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. Gladstone Mar 17, 1439; Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Speaker Mar 19, 1703

Russia and Afghanistan—Reported Russian Advances, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 11, 532

Russian Advance on India, Questions, Mr. Chaplin, Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 6, 274;—The Russian Advances, Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 12, 555

Central Asia—Commons—cont.

Map of Afghanistan, Questions, General Sir George Balfour; Answers, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 9, 426

The Afghan Boundary Commission, Question, Sir George Campbell; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 10, 626

Reference to Arbitration—The Declaration of Paris, 1856, Question, Mr. McCoan; Answer, Mr. Gladstone; Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett (no reply) Mar 13, 1083; Questions, Mr. Richard, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Onslow, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 13, 1084

The Negotiations—Russian Advance, Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Gorn, Mr. Chaplin; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 16, 1244

Russian Railway towards Samarkand, Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 17, 1437

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J. (President of the Board of Trade), Birmingham

Board of Trade—Pay of Lightkeepers, Great Britain, 277

Lighthouse Illuminants Committee, 92, 93

Parliament—Private Business—Railway Rates and Charges Bill, 437, 1070, 1074, 1076, 1702

Pier and Harbour Works (England and Wales)—Holyhead Mail Jetty, 90

Public Meetings—Riot at Aston Hall, Birmingham, 111

Trade and Commerce—West of England Bank, 1242

CHAMBERS, Sir T., Marylebone

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1161

CHANCELLOR, The Lord (Earl of SELBORNE)

British Agricultural Association, 2R. 1040, 1051

Election of Scotch Representative Peers, 812

Law and Justice—Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic, Motion for an Address, 603

Water Companies Regulation of Powers), 2R. 1424

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, The (Right Hon. H. C. E. CHILDERS), Pontefract

Aids (Central)—Russia and Afghanistan, 532

Assay Office, Easter, 1691

Civil Service Appointments, 832

Currency—Value of Silver, 415

Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund, 120, 121

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 392

Egypt (Finance, &c.), 627.—International Arrangement, 1865.—Ministerial Statement, 1656, 1660, 1661

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, The—cont.

- National Debt (Conversion of Stock) Act, 1884, 884, 1078
 Conversion of Consols—The Coinage Bill, 108, 109
 Navy Estimates—Sea and Coast Guard Services, 1341, 1342
 Parliament—Business of the House, 45, 832, 892, 893
 Public Business—Committee on Public Expenditure, 1586, 1588
 Patent Medicines Act, 884, 1248
 Public Offices—The Treasury—Mr. Herbert Gladstone, 1249
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Nomination of Committee, 589
 Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c., 1344, 1348, 1352, 1368, 1376, 1377
 Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
 Army, 1039
 Army of Occupation in Egypt, 1199, 1201
 Grant to the Family of the late General Charles George Gordon, 1036, 1038, 1198
 National Gallery, 195, 196
 Navy, 1039, 1040
 Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1030
 Report, 1198, 1199, 1201
 Supreme Court of Judicature Act Amendment—Reduction of the Irish Bench, 102, 103
 Ways and Means—Questions
 Financial Statement—Duty on Beer, 850
 Income Tax, 607
 Revenue and Expenditure—Probate Duty on Freehold Property, 1251

CHAPLIN, Mr. H., Lincolnshire, Mid

- Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
 Land Forces, 484, 485, 489
 Asia (Central)—Questions
 England and Russia—Declaration of Paris, 1086 ;—Negotiations, 1247
 Russian Advance on India, 274, 275
 Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Foot-and-Mouth Disease in Norfolk, 1067, 1077, 1078
 Egypt (Finance, &c.), 892
 The Nile Railroad, 285, 286

Charity Commissioners — Milton Abbas School

- Question, Mr. Montague Guest ; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 10, 622

CHEETHAM, Mr. J. F., Derbyshire, N.

- East India Expenses—(Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 583

CHILDERS, Right Hon. H. C. E. (see Chancellor of the Exchequer)Church Boards Bill

- (Mr. Albert Grey, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Edward Howard, Mr. Francis Buxton, Mr.

Houldsworth)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o Mar 19 [Bill 102]

Civil Service Expenditure Committee—Appointments

- Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 12, 851

CLANWILLIAM, Earl of

- Navy—State of the Navy, Ministerial Programme, 331, 344

CLARKE, Mr. E. G., Plymouth

- Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 27, 1519

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire, N.

- Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. Schedule 1, 1625

COLLINGS, Mr. J., Ipswich

- Education Department—Voluntary Schools not Supported by Private Subscription—Scale of Fees, 288
 Endowed Schools Act—Administration by the Charity Commissioners, 869 Law and Police (England)—Questions
 Alleged Case of Poaching—Ashford Petty Sessions, 1080, 1081, 1082
 Police as Game Keepers—Arrest of Labourers for Picking up a Dead Rabbit, 872

COLTHURST, Col. D. La Zouche, Cork Co.

- Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1784
 Ireland—Poor Law—Union Rating, 433
 Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 677
 Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
 Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 986
 Public Education, Ireland, 901

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Foot-and-Mouth Disease in Lincolnshire

- Questions, Mr. Chaplin ; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 13, 1077 ;—Norfolk, Questions, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. Chaplin ; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan Mar 13, 1066 ;—Cattle Disease (Ireland), Question, Mr. Clare Read ; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 16, 1231

COOPE, Mr. O. E., Middlesex

- Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
 National Gallery, 213
 Water Supply (Metropolis)—Water Companies Assessment, 434

Copyright (Works of Fine Art) Bill

- (Mr. Hastings, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy, Sir Gabriel Goldney, Mr. Agnew, Mr. Gregory)

c. Ordered ; read 1^o Mar 5 [Bill 84]

CORBET, Mr. W. J., Wicklow

- Egypt—The Courbash, 273, 1076
 Ireland—Questions
 Board of Works—Monolithic Piers and Breakwaters, 122

[cont.]

CONBY, Mr. W. J.—cont.

Piers and Harbours—Arklow Harbour, 119, 1225
 Poor Law Elections, 857, 858
 Lunacy Laws—Case of Mr. Charles Hillman, 1434
 Lunacy Legislation, 1695
 Morocco—Fraudulent Claims of British Subjects against Natives, 1229
 Judicial Cruelties, 1229
 Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 39
 Pier and Harbour Works (England and Wales), 99
 Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 935

Corporation of London Tower Bridge Bill

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o" (Sir Charles Forster) Mar 5, 63; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Moved, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee, Five to be nominated by the House, and Four by the Committee of Selection" (Mr. Ritchie); Question put, and agreed to Question, Mr. Brodrick; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 124

CORRY, Mr. J. P., Belfast Co.

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Horses for Officers, 1226
 Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 744

COTTON, Mr. Alderman W. J. R., London
 National Debt (Conversion of Stock) Act, 1884, 854

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1127

County Justices' Clerks Bill

(Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Dr. Connors, Mr. Molloy)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 18 [Bill 98]

COURTNEY, Mr. L. H., Liskeard

Parliament—Business of the House, 295
 Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1364

COWEN, Mr. J., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), 1232

CRICHTON, Viscount, Fermanagh

Ireland—Supreme Court of Judicature Bill, 2^o 2

Ireland—Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, 1575

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 730

CROPPER, Mr. J., Ayr

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 648; add. cl. 1553

Cross, Right Hon. Sir R. A., Lancashire, S. W.

Criminal Law—Babbicombe Murder—Attempted Execution at Exeter, 613

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Considered add. cl. 1183

Ireland—Prisons Board, 1431, 1432

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 7, 1177; add. cl. 1554

Registration Acts Consolidation, 1690

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1166, 1167

Cross, Mr. J. K. (Under Secretary of State for India), Bolton

Army (India)—Bounties to Soldiers, 109

Asia (Central)—Map of Afghanistan, 426

Russia and Afghanistan, 872

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. Motion for Adjournment, 223, 224, 558, 563, 583; Explanation, 1097

East India Loan, Comm. 1406

India—Questions

Bengal Settlement, 1793, 1681

Bengal Tenancy, 626, 627, 633, 699, 1244

Civil Service—Admission, 1432

Railways—Preference Rates for Wheat, 426;—Quetta Railway, 856

CUBITT, Right Hon. G., Surrey, W.

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—National Gallery, 187, 196, 221

Currency The—Value of Silver

Question, Mr. Coleridge Kennard; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 9, 448

CURZON, Major Hon. M., Leicestershire, N.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 20, 1502

Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund

Questions, Mr. Dawson; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 5, 120

Customs Promotion at Liverpool

Question, Lord Claud Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 5, 123

Cyprus — M. Bistachi, Chief Inspector of Revenue

Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 12, 667

DALHOUSIE, Earl of

Law and Justice—Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic, Motion for an Address, 609

Law and Police—Street Newsreaders, 1669, 1670

DALRYMPLE, Mr. C., Buteshire

Army Estimates—Supplementary, 1884-5—Land Forces, 496

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 814, 831, Schedule I, 1607, 1612, 1616; Amendt. 164

DAVEY, Mr. H., Christchurch

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 367

DAWNAY, Colonel Hon. L. P., Thirsk

Egypt (Military Expedition) — Purchase of Camels, 1701

DAWSON, Mr. C., Carlton

Customs Annuity and Benevolent Fund, 120,
121

Navy (Supplementary) Estimate — Military
Operations in Egypt, &c. 159, 164, 165

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 34

Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment
of a Committee, 66

Registration (Occupation Voters) Bills, 133

Supply — Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5 —
Science and Art Department, 187

DEASY, Mr. J., Cork

Ireland — Questions

Board of Works — Monolithic Piers and Breakwaters, 123

Crime and Outrage — Murder of Francis
Hughes, Keady, Co. Armagh, 291, 623

Explosives Act, 1876, 275, 276

Law and Police — Meetings of the National League — Intrusion of the Police at Cashel, 280

Poor Law — Election of Guardians —
Scrutiny of Votes, 442

Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 275

Merchant Shipping — Transport Service, 122

Navy (Supplementary) Estimate — Military
Operations in Egypt, &c. 160, 170, 172, 178

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 811

Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment
of a Committee, 72

Supply — Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5 —
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 991, 994,
1002

Prisons, Ireland, 183

Public Education, Ireland, 921

DERBY, Earl of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Africa (South-East Coast) — St. Lucia Bay,
61, 62

Australasian Colonies — Colonial Naval Force,
Motion for Papers, 1210

Egypt (War in the Soudan) — Colonies (Military Service), Motion for an Address, 1218

DE ROS, Lord

Law and Police — Street News-vendors, 1669

DE WORMS, Baron H., Greenwich

Asia (Central) — England and Russia — Russo-Afghan Frontier, 1441

Egypt — Hired Transports — Suakin-Berber
Railway, 1633

Supply — Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5 —
Diplomatic Services, 960

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Tyrone

Ireland — Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, 1570

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 741, 780

Parliamentary Elections — Registration of Voters (Ireland), 89, 845

Supreme Court of Judicature Act Amendment — Reduction of the Irish Bench, 102

DILKE, Right Hon. Sir C. W. (President of the Local Government Board), *Chelsea, &c.

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll). Consid.
401, 402; cl. 1, Amendt. ib. 403; cl. 2,
404; Re-comm. add cl. 1041, 1043, 1044;
Consid. add cl. 1183; 3R. 1184

Ireland — Redistribution of Seats — Reports of the Boundary Commissioners, 296

Parliament — Business of the House, 45

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), 1233, 1436

Central Election Courts, West Donegal,
438

Representation of Minorities, 1695, 1696

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 43; cl. 1,
322; cl. 2, 336, 725, 731, 762, 763, 774,
775, 801, 809, 819, 825, 832; cl. 3, 1109, 1110,
1111; cl. 4, 1120, 1126; cl. 7, 1177; cl. 8,
1451, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1473; cl. 9, 1475,
1477, 1478, 1479, 1480; cl. 10, 1484; cl. 11,
1489; cl. 15, 1500; cl. 17, 1501; cl. 26,
1502, 1503, 1524, 1525; add cl. 1527,
1534, 1538, 1539, 1540, 1544, 1546, 1550,
1551, 1552; Schedule 1, Motion for reporting
Progress, 1557, 1591, 1597, 1600, 1617, 1618,
1651, 1655

Supply — Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5 —
Temporary Commissions, 1034, 1036

Diplomatic and Consular Services — *The Embassy at Constantinople

Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Lord Edmond
Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 854

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Evesham

Africa (South) — Bechuanaland, 890

Egypt (Finance, &c.), 883

Poor Law (England and Wales) — Kensington
Union Infirmary, 446

Post Office — Colour of Postage Stamps, 445

Money Order Office — Promotion, 1687

Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 19 [Bill 100]

DUCIE, Earl of

Army (Reserve), Motion for a Return, 1670, 1671

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H., Kent, Mid
Municipal Corporation of Tunbridge Wells, 1696

EATON, Mr. H. W., Coventry
Army—Royal Infirmary, Dublin, 1446

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Bill [H.C.]
(The Lord Bishop of Lichfield)

1. Read 2^o Mar 3 (No. 17)
Committee^o: Report Mar 6
Read 3^o Mar 9

ECROYD, Mr. W. F., Preston
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. add cl. 1332

Educational Endowments (Ireland) Bill
[H.C.] (The Lord President)
1. Presented; read 1^o Mar 16 (No. 44)

Education Department

Education Acts—Tolnes School Board—Non-conformist Children, Question, Mr. Samuel Murley; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 12, 877

Harwoodsworth School Board—Conviction of a Member, Question, Mr. Berensford Hope; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 9, 431

Highland Schools, Question, Mr. Munro-Ferguson; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 10, 616

Loans to School Boards, Question, Mr. W. H. James; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 5, 109

Over-pressure in Board Schools—Dr. Crichton Brumac's Report, Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 6, 223

School Board Taxation, Question Lord Algernon Percy; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 6, 281

Technical Education, Questions, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Broadhurst; Answers, Mr. Mundella Mar 16, 1237

The Education Code for 1885, Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 13, 1070

Voluntary Schools not Supported by Private Subscriptions—Scale of Fees, Question, Mr. James Collinge; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 6, 224

Teachers in Voluntary Schools—Mr. Drayr, Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 12, 868

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Wigan
Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1302
Navy Estimates—Sea and Coast Guard Services, 1312

EGERTON, Hon. Alan de Tatton, Cheshire, Mid Merchant Shipping—The Troopship "Poonah," 91

Egypt

Lords

Finance, &c., Questions, Earl Stanhope, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answers, Earl Granville Mar 17, 1430

Military Expedition to the Soudan—The Sudan-Herber Railway, Question, Observations, The Marquess of Letham, Reply, The Earl of Morley; short debate thereon Mar 4, 49

Egypt—Loans—cont.

Vote of Thanks to the Troops, Question, Observations, The Earl of Galloway; Reply, The Earl of Morley Mar 12, 841

Zohar Pasha, Question, (Observations, Viscount Bury; Reply, Earl Granville Mar 17, 1429

Egypt (Finance, &c.) — International Agreement—Joint Guarantee of Loan

Moved to resolve "That considering the loss of life and treasure that has been incurred by this country in Egypt, any arrangements with the Powers, either political or financial, which may tend to impair or diminish the influence of England in the administration of that country, such as the acceptance of any form of loan to the Egyptian Treasury under a joint guarantee of the Powers, would be unacceptable to this House" (The Duke of Marlborough) Mar 19, 1672; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Egypt (War in the Soudan)—Colonies—(Military Service)

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty humbly thanking Her Majesty for having graciously accepted the loyal offer of military service from New South Wales; and expressing the satisfaction with which this House has heard the announcement that the like loyal offers of military service from other Colonies, and also from India, will, should occasion arise, be duly accepted" (The Earl of Wintour) Mar 16, 1213; after short debate, Motion agreed to domino dissentiente

Egypt—The Expeditionary Force—Army Chaplains in the Soudan

Address for, "Return of the number of the chaplains attached to Her Majesty's forces in the Soudan, and the distribution of them" (The Earl of Carnarvon) Mar 16, 1211; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Egypt

Commons

QUESTIONS (GENERAL)

Speech of Prince Bismarck in the Reichstag, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 5, 126; Personal Explanation, Earl Granville Mar 6, 227; Question, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answer, Mr. Gladstone, 223.—The Papers, Question, Mr. Bourke, Answer, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 833

The Courthouse, Questions, Mr. W. J. Corbett, Sir George Campbell, Mr. McCann, Answers, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice Mar 6, 223. Question, Mr. W. J. Corbett, Answer, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice Mar 13, 1076

The N. & K. Railroad, Questions, Mr. Chaplin, Sir George Campbell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 6, 265

[cont.]

[cont.]

Egypt—Commons—cont.Finance, &c.

Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 99; Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 10, 627; Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 882; Questions, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Chaplin, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 12, 891; Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 16, 1240

The International Agreement—Joint Guarantee of Loan, Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Mr. Gladstone Mar 17, 1445; Observation, Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 18, 1585; Ministerial Statement, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; short debate thereon, 1656

The Military Expedition

The Supplies, Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 100

Supplies for Officers—Imposition of Customs Duty by Egypt, Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 622

Chaplains in the Soudan, Questions, Mr. J. G. Talbot, Mr. Buchanan; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 107

Military Co-operation of the Colonies, Questions, Mr. A. M'Arthur, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 5, 113

Lord Wolseley's Address to the Troops at Korti, Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 114

Affairs of the Soudan

The Mahdi, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 17, 1444

Employment of Turkish Troops, Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 883

Zebehr Pasha, Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 16, 1251

Events in the Soudan

Questions, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 114

Kassala, Questions, Sir Frederick Milner, Mr. Macfarlane; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 118; Questions, Sir Frederick Milner, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice, Mr. Gladstone Mar 10, 617; Questions, Sir Henry Tyler; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 871

Kassala—Reported Fall, Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Frederick Milner; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 16, 1250

Lists of Casualties, Question, Mr. Bryce; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 6, 288

Observance of the Rules of Civilized Warfare, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 6, 296

[cont.]

Egypt—Commons—Events in the Soudan—cont.

Troops in the Soudan—Sun Spectacles, Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 622

Vote of Thanks to the Troops, Question, General Alexander; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 12, 881

Expenses of the Indian Contingent, Explanation, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 13, 1087

The Wives of Marines Serving in the Soudan, Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Caine Mar 19, 1684

Purchase of Camels, Questions, Colonel Darnley, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 19, 1701

General Graham's Advance, Question, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 19, 1707

The Suakin and Red Sea Force

The Suakin-Berber and Nile Advance, Questions, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 117

Battle of Tamai—Mr. Cathie, R.N., Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Caine Mar 6, 287

The Suakin-Berber Railway

Question, Sir Henry Tyler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 124; Question, Mr. M'Coan; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 19, 1707

Contract for Locomotives, Questions, Mr. Houldsworth, Mr. C. B. M'Laren, Sir Joseph Pease; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Brand Mar 9, 430

Hired Transports, Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Caine Mar 10, 1683

Water Supply—Pipes and Pumps, Questions, Colonel Stanley, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Staveley Hill; Answers, Mr. Brand Mar 6, 289; Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Mr. Brand; Question, Mr. J. Lowther [no reply] Mar 9, 451; Questions, Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Ritchie; Answers, Mr. Brand Mar 12, 874

General Gordon

General Gordon's Diaries, &c., Questions, Mr. Stewart MacLiver, Mr. W. H. James; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 113; Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 13, 1069

Telegrams, Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 13, 1069

Verification of Manner of Death, &c., Questions, Mr. Macfarlane; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 10, 617

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Army in Egypt

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 19, To leave out from "That," add "it is not proper that Her Majesty's soldiers should be exposed to the deadly Summer climate of Upper Egypt, and that Her Majesty's subjects should be taxed to protect Egypt, not for Her Majesty, nor for the Egyptians, but for the bondholders foreign to Egypt, to whom the revenue is assigned" (Sir George

[cont.]

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Army in Egypt—
—cont.

Campbell v., 1713; Question proposed,
"That the words, &c.;" after short debate,
Question put, and agreed to

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll) Bill
(Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Grey, Mr. Stafford Howard, Mr. Cochran-Patrick) [Bill 19]

c. Order for Consideration, as amended, read Mar 6, 401; after short debate, Bill recommitted

Committee (on re-comm.); Report Mar 12,
1040 [Bill 85]

Considered Mar 13, 1180; after short debate,
Bill read 3^d

l. Read 1st (Lord Carrington) Mar 16 (No. 43)

ELLENBOROUGH, Lord

Egypt (Military Expedition)—The Suakin-
Berber Railway, 56

India—Bengal Tenancy, 836

ELLIOT, Hon. A. R. D., Roxburgh

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Re-comm.
add. cl. 1043

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 32; Schedule 1, 1630, 1654

Scotland—Inspection of Rivers under "The Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876," 1238

Prisons Act, 1877 — Appointment of Prison Chaplains, 1437

Endowed Schools Acts

Administration by the Charity Commissioners,
Questions, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Jesse
Collings; Answers, Mr. Mundella Mar 12, 869

Milton Abbas School, Question, Mr. Montague
Guest; Answer, Mr. Mundella Mar 10, 622

ENFIELD, Viscount

Army—Royal Military Colleges, Sandhurst and Woolwich, Report of Board of Visitors,
1666, 1668

Enfranchisement of Leaseholders Bill

Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 16, 1248

Epping Forest Act, 1878—Sale of Lands

Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 12, 858

EWART, Mr. W., Belfast

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 31; cl. 2, 767

EWING, Mr. A. Orr-, Dumbarton

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 821, 828, 829; Schedule 1,
1623

Explosives Act, 1876 — Appointment of Inspectors (Ireland)

Questions, Mr. Deasy; Answers, Sir William
Harcourt Mar 6, 276

FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W.

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services,
Motion for Re-appointment of Select Committee, 1569

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1277

FARQUHARSON, Mr. R. C. MUNRO-, Ross and Cromarty

Education Department—Highland Schools, 616
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1653

Scotland—Crofters' Commission—Highland
Fisheries, 616

Piers and Harbours—Scotch Fisheries
Commissioners, 292

FINDLATER, Mr. W., Monaghan

Town Parks (Ireland); Motion for a Select Committee, 1577

FIRTH, Mr. J. F. B., Chelsea

Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. 261

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 4, 1134, 1145, 1152; cl. 10,
Amend. 1480

Public Health (Metropolis)—Medical Officer of Health, St. Pancras, 1063

Water Supply (Metropolis)—Water Companies
Assessment, 433, 435

FITZGERALD, Lord

Law and Justice — Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic, Motion for an Address, 602

Roman Catholic Disabilities (Admissions, &c.)
2R. 1414, 1416

Trinity College, Dublin — Perpetuity Grants,
2R. 49

FITZMAURICK, Lord E. G. P. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Calne

Africa (East Coast) — German Associations
near Zanzibar, 612

Africa (West Coast)—Cameroons, 1231

Africa—West African Conference—The Papers, 634; — West African Convention — Inland Transit Duties, 1076

Asia (Central)—Questions

Afghan Boundary Commission, 626

Russia and Afghanistan, 871; — Sir Peter
Lumsden, Chief Boundary Commissioner, 112

Russian Railway, 1437

Russo-Afghan Boundary, 1241, 1430

British Ministers Abroad—Embassy at Constantinople, 634

Egypt—Questions

Courthouse, The, 274, 1077

Finance, &c. 99, 842

General Gordon's Telegrams, 1009

Prince Bismarck—Papers, 634

War in the Sudan—Employment of Turkish Troops, 623, 854. — Kassala, 116,
614, 619, 671, 1250

Zobeir Pasha, 1231

Foreign Affairs—England and Germany—Despatch of May 8, 435, 437, 612; — Earl Granville and Count Herbert Bismarck, 1077

France and China — International Law—
Seizure of the Steamship "Glenroy," 1226

GILES, Mr. A., Southampton

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1270
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 163
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, 1108, 1110

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E. (First Lord of the Treasury), Edinburghshire

Africa (West Coast)—Cameroons—Alleged Insult by Germany to the British Flag, 625
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 554
Land Forces, 406, 407, 475, 480, 491, 502
Asia (Central)—Questions
England and Russia—Declaration of Paris, 1083, 1091, 1095, 1096, 1087;—Negotiations, 1215, 1216, 1247
Russia-Afghan Frontier, 127, 1439, 1440, 1441, 1442, 1443, 1703, 1704
Russia and Afghanistan—Russian Advance, 886
Egypt—Questions
Finance, &c. 891, 892, 1249;—International Agreement, 1445, 1446
Mahdi, 1416
Prince Bismarck's Speech in the Reichstag, 126, 293
Soudan—Kassala, 619
Enfranchisement of Leaseholders, 1248
Estimates—Increase of the Army, 131
India—Bengal Tenancy, 634, 636
Ireland—Town Tenancies—Tenants' Improvements, 130
Navy—State of the Navy, Notice of Motion (Sir Edward J. Reed), 886
New Guinea—Occupation of Northern Coast by Germany, 888, 889
Oxford University—Examination in Dogmatic Theology, 1708
Parliament—Business of the House, 294, 450, 452, 624, 891, 1087, 1705, 1707
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 386, 394, 400; cl. 4, 1151, cl. 7, 1177; cl. 8, 1455
Police (Metropolis)—Wandsworth Police Court, 1247
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Diplomatic Services, 965, 966, 974
Western Pacific, Islands of the—New Hebrides, Samoa, and Tonga—Surrender of British Rights, 125

GLADSTONE, Mr. H. J. (Lord of the Treasury), Leeds

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Re-comm. add cl. 1042
Her Majesty's Palace of Windsor, 846
National Gallery—Photographs of Pictures, 861
Ordnance Survey—County of Hereford, 868
Hundred of Chippenham, 105
Parliament—Palace of Westminster—Completion of Sir Charles Barry's Designs, 879

Gold and Silver Plate—Assay Office, Exeter

Question, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 19, 1891

VOL CXXCV. [THIRD SERIES.]

GOLDNEY, Sir G., Chippenham

Ordnance Survey—Hundred of Chippenham, 105
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1151, 1154
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—National Gallery, 197

GORDON, General Hon. Sir A. H., Aberdeenshire, E.

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Land Forces, 500
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1776, 1403
Parliament—Business of the House—Questions, 840
Parliamentary Papers—Irregular Publication—Royal Commission on Trawling, 870
Scotland—Fishery Board—Surplus from Herring Branding, 1041
Trawling, Royal Commission on—The Report, 226

GORST, Mr. J. E., Chatham

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 543
Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Negotiations, 1247
Egypt (Finance, &c.)—International Agreement, 1446
Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Comm. add cl. 1143, 1144
Foreign Affairs—England and Germany—Despatch of May 5, 436, 437, 612
India—Bengal Tenancy, 1244
Islands of the Pacific—Alleged Cession of Islands, 849
Islands of the South Pacific—Society Islands, 1234, 1235
Islands of the Western Pacific—Samoa and Tonga, 103, 104, 125, 419
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 147
New Guinea—Occupation of Northern Coast by Germany, 886, 887
North Borneo, 104, 415
Parliament—Business of the House, 893
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1151, 1152, 1160, cl. 7, 1177; cl. 8, 1469, 1471; add cl. 1547; Schedule 1, 1654
Supply—Diplomatic Services, 929, 958, 960

GOURLEY, Mr. F. T., Sunderland

Army—Seaward Defence of the Military Ports, 1731
Asia (Central)—Russia and Afghanistan, 873
Navy—Questions
Royal Yacht "Victoria and Albert," 277
Shipbuilding—Private Shipbuilders, 276
State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1266
Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1277

GRANT, Mr. D., Marylebone

Indian Civil Service—Admission, 1432

GRANTHAM, Mr. W., Surrey, E.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add cl. 1530

HARRIS, Lord

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Yeomanry, 420

HARROWBY, Earl of

Africa, South (East Coast)—St. Lucia Bay, 60
Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.)
2R. 1412

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of (Secretary of State for War), Lancashire, N.E.

Africa (South)—Questions

Beechuanaland, 890;—Expedition to—Methuen's Irregular Horse, 1696

Troops for the Soudan, 96

Army—Questions

Defence of Military and Naval Stations, 1242, 1722, 1728

Force in Ireland, 131

Marine Artillery and Infantry, 122

Military Expedition to the Soudan—Defective Cartridges, 879

Militia Officers on Service in Africa, 620

Post-Mortem Litter, 440, 624

Quartermasters, 860

Royal Engineers' Department—Military Foremen of Works, 860;—Woolwich, 437

Royal Infirmary, Dublin, 1445

Royal Military Academy, Woolwich—Cadets, 837, 1243, 1691

Soldiers' Reading Room—Allahabad, 428

Staff College, 1694

War in the Soudan—Martini-Henry Cartridges, 626

Army—Auxiliary Forces

Embodiment of the Militia, 1243

Volunteer Regiments, 1691

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services,

Motion for Re-appointment of Select Committee, 1559

Army Estimates—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5, 132

Land Forces, 453, 463, 474, 485, 510

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1773, 1774, 1799, 1803, 1805

Numbers—Departmental Statement, 1733, 1737, 1740, 1745

Pay and Allowances, 1806

Asia (Central)—Russian Advance on India, 275

Egypt—Questions

Events in the Soudan, 115, 116

General Gordon's Diaries, 113, 1069

Nile Railroad, 286, 247

War in the Soudan—Observance of the Rules of Civilized Warfare, 294

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Questions

Chaplains in the Soudan, 107, 108

General Graham's Advance, 1707

List of Casualties, 249

Lord Wolseley's Address to the Troops, 114

Purchase of Camels, 1701, 1702

Suakin-Berber Expedition, 117

Suakin-Berber Railway, 124, 1707

Supplies, 100

Supplies for Officers—Imposition of Customs Duty by Egypt, 622

Troops in the Soudan—Sun Spectacles, 622

Votes of Thanks to the Troops, 851, 1236

Egypt—Military Expedition—Army in Egypt, Res. 1716, 1718

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of—cont.

Estimates—Increase of the Army, 131

General Gordon—Verification of Manner of Death, &c. 617

Parliament—Business of the House, 293

Supply—Supplementary Estimates—Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1195

Town Parks (Ireland). Motion for a Select Committee, 1550

HASTINGS, Mr. G. W., Worcestershire, E.
Prisons Board (Ireland), 1431

HAY, Admiral Right Hon. Sir J. C. D., Wigtown, &c.

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Wives of Marines Serving in the Soudan, 1646

Navy—State of the Navy—The Sinking Fund, 1291

Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1271

Navy (Supplementary Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 143, 156

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. of 1, Amendt. 320; of 2, 426; of 4, 1144; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1624, 1632, 1641, 1650, 1651

Post Office—Acceleration of the Mails to the South West of Scotland and Belfast, 447

Votes of Thanks—Campaign in the Soudan, 1256

HAYTER, Colonel Sir A. D. (Financial Secretary to the War Office), Bath

Army—Seaward Defence of the Military Ports, 1732

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1764, 1904

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Monaghan

Africa (South)—Troops for the Soudan, 96

Army—Soldiers' Reading Room, Allahabad, 428

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Concid. 401; of 1, 402, 403; Re-comm. add. of 1041; Concid. add. of 1162

Ireland—Questions

Crime and Outrage—Alleged Wounding of Denis Murphy, at Castleland, Co. Kerry, 613, 873, 876

Law and Justice—Grand Jury of Meath—Exemption from Service, 440

Law and Police—Case of Thomas Lyden, 221; Trial of the Newry Rioters, 1900

Municipal Franchise—Assimilation to English Franchise, 101, 102

Public Law—Monaghan Workhouse—Dr. Hall, Medical Officer, 446, 447

Prevention of Crime Act, 1842—Searches, 611

Prisons—Dismissal of Warders at Mountjoy Prison, 444, 624, 625

Registration of Voters, 443

Royal Irish Constabulary—Rector's Palace, 847, 848;—The Free Force, 1345, 1396, 1399, 1403

Ireland—Magistries—Questions

Co. Tyrone, 424, 425

Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P., 242

Summons for Troopers in Hunting at Bagenalstown, 429, 430, 644

HOLMS, Mr. J. (Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade), Hackney
Agricultural Statistics—Price of Barley in 1884, 1431

HOME, Lieutenant-Colonel D. Milne,
Berwick-on-Tweed

Army—Seaward Defence of the Military Ports, 1731

Staff College, 1694

Army—Commissariat and Transport Services, Motion for Re-appointment of Select Committee, 1565

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1789

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 1894

HOPK, Right Hon. A. J. B. Beresford,
Cambridge University

Education Department—Harmondsworth School Board—Conviction of a Member, 431

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 308, 361

HOULDSWORTH, Mr. W. H., Manchester

Egypt—Suakin-Berber Railway—Contract for Locomotives, 430

HOWARD, Mr. G. J., Cumberland, R.

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—National Gallery, 201

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., London

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 4, 1165

Ways and Means—Income Tax, 607

HUNTLY, Marquess of

Railway Rates and Terminals, Motion for a Paper, 417, 418

ILLINGWORTH, Mr. A., Bradford

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Sudan, 334

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. add. cl. 1555

INDIA (Miscellaneous Questions)

Railways

Preference Rates for Wheat, Questions, Mr. Horslar, Sir George Campbell; Answers, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 9, 426

The Quetta Railway, Questions, Sir Henry Tyler, Answers, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 12, 855

The Bengal Tenancy Bill, Question, The Earl of Wemyss, short debate thereon Mar 10, 596; Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell; Answers, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 10, 626; Observations, The Earl of Wemyss; Reply, The Earl of Kimberley; short debate thereon Mar 12, 831; Question, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Answer, Mr. J. K. Cross, 882; Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Gorst, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 16, 1243

INDIA—cont.

The Bengal Settlement, 1793, Question, General Sir George Ballour; Answer, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 12, 1640

The Indian Civil Service—Admission, Question, Mr. D. Grant; Answer, Mr. J. K. Cross Mar 17, 1432

India—East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Sudan)

Moved, "That, Her Majesty having directed a Military Expedition of Her Native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Sudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops, as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the Expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable. Provided, That if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels or Native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said Expedition" (Mr. J. K. Cross) Mar 5, 223; after debate, Debate adjourned Debate resumed Mar 9, 354, after debate, Question put: A. 84, N. 23; M. 65 (D. L. 45)

India—East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Sudan)

Moved to resolve, "That Her Majesty having directed a military expedition of Her native forces charged upon the revenues of India to be despatched for service in the Sudan and Nubia, this House consents that the ordinary pay of such troops as well as the ordinary charges of any vessels belonging to the Government of India that may be employed in the expedition, which would have been charged upon the revenues of India if such troops or vessels had remained in that country or seas adjacent, shall continue to be so chargeable. Provided that, if it shall become necessary to replace the troops or vessels so withdrawn by other vessels of native forces, the expense of raising, maintaining, and providing such vessels or forces shall be repaid out of any moneys which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said expedition" (The Earl of Kimberley) Mar 14, 1222, after short debate, Motion agreed to

India—East India (Loan)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Secretary of State in Council of India to raise in the United Kingdom any sum or sums of money not exceeding £10,000,000, for the service of the Government of India, on the security of the Revenues of India Mar 19, 1006

Res. reported Mar 20

[cont.]

IRELAND—Election of Guardians—cont.

Magheraclougher, Co. Donegal, Question, Mr. Kenny; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 424

Non-Resident Electors, Question, Mr. P. J. Power; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 1688

Qualifications—Mr. M. Kilkelly, Athlone, Questions, Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy, Mr. Lewis, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 16, 1239

Scrutiny of Votes, Question, Mr. Deasy; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 442

Post Office (Ireland)

Acceleration of the Mails between Belfast and Newtownards, Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 17, 1434

Telegraph Station at Leitrim, Question, Colonel O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 16, 1228

The Sub-Postmaster at Craunford, Co. Wexford, Questions, Mr. William Redmond; Answers, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 8, 106; Questions, Mr. William Redmond, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Shaw Lefevre Mar 13, 1082

Fisheries (Ireland)

Trawling, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 12, 861

Fishery Piers and Harbours (Ireland)

Arklow Harbour Works, Questions, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answers, Mr. Hibbert Mar 5, 119; Mar 16, 1225

Tarbert Pier, Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 10, 607

Inland Navigation and Drainage (Ireland)

Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 16, 1241

River Shannon—The New Works at Meelick, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 12, 862

Labourers' (Ireland) Act, 1853

Rules on Interest, Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 5, 106

Repayment of Loans, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 6, 291

Ennistymon Union, Question, Mr. Kenny; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 1068

Mr. Posnett, Official Arbitrator, Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 1692

Law and Justice (Ireland)

Disorderly Language—Case of George Barker, Clifden, Co. Sligo, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 1684

Letter Kenny Quarter Sessions, Question, Dr. Kinnear; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 10, 606

Mr. John Eccles, Petty Sessions Clerk, Portadown, Question, Mr. Small; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 13, 1070

Newtown Hamilton Petty Sessions—Mr. Starr, Question, Mr. Berrisford; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 450

[cont.]

IRELAND—Law and Justice—cont.

The Grand Jury of Mouth—Exemption from Service, Questions, Mr. Shell, Mr. Healy, Mr. William Redmond, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 12, 850

The Irish Circuits, Questions, Mr. Gibson; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland Mar 5, 91; Mar 16, 1235

"The Queen v. Ryan"—Kilrush Quarter Sessions, Question, Mr. Kenny; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 8, 118

The Magistracy (Ireland)

Appointment of Roman Catholics, Co. Clare, Questions, Mr. Kenny; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 240

Ballymena Bench of Magistrates, Questions, Mr. Moore, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman; Question, Mr. Sexton [no reply] Mar 5, 104

Belfast Police Court—Mr. Farley, R.M., Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 427

Co. Tyrone, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 424

Kildare and Clare Counties, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 19, 1685

Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M., Questions, Mr. Kenny, Mr. O'Brien; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 443

Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P., Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 242

Mr. W. W. Newnham, Co. Cork, Questions, Mr. Biggar, Mr. O'Kelly; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman; Question, Mr. William Redmond [no reply] Mar 13, 1064

Petty Sessions

Clonsilla District, Co. Leitrim, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 16, 1224

Grey Petty Sessions, Question, Mr. Small; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 16, 1233

Oldcastle Petty Sessions, Question, Mr. Shell; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 12, 856

Stoppage of Processions, &c., Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 276; Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. O'Kelly; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland Mar 9, 446

Summons for Trespass in Hunting at Rognelagh, Co. Mayo, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland Mar 9, 429; Mar 12, 864

Tippinry Grand Jury—Rendine Bridge, Newry, Question, Mr. John O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 12, 850

Law and Police (Ireland)

Alleged Misconduct of Emergency Men at Carrigrohane, Co. Mayo, Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 272

Case of Thomas Lydon, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 291

[cont.]

JENKINS, Mr. D. J., Penryn
Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1271

JONES-PARRY, Mr. T. L., Carnarvon, &c.
Mines, &c.—Dorothea Slate Quarry (Nantlle), 1630

Justices' Jurisdiction Bill [H.L.]
(Mr. Tomlinson)

c. Read 1^o Mar 9 [Bill 87]

KEYNARD, Mr. C. J., Salisbury
Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Volunteer Regiments, 1691
Army (Ordnance Department)—Purchase of Cartridges, 611
Currency—Value of Silver, 445
National Debt (Conversion of Stock) Act, 1884, 1078 ;—Conversion of Consols—The Coinage Bill, 103

KENNY, Mr. M. J., Ennis
Ireland—Questions
Labourers' Act, 1883—Ennistymon Union, 1063
Law and Justice—"Queen v. Ryan"—Kilrush Quarter Sessions, 118
Magistracy—Appointment of Roman Catholics, Co. Clare, 280, 281 ;—Mr. Clifford Lloyd, R.M. 443
Poor Law—Election of Guardians—Magheraclogher, Co. Donegal, 424
Representation of the People Act, 1884—Instructions to Clerks of Unions and Rate Collectors, 880
Seeds Supp'y Act—Repayment of Loans, 1067, 1068
Ireland—Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of Select Committee, 591
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 170
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution)—Central Election Courts—West Donegal, 438
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 29 ; cl. 2, 702, 703, 704, 812
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment of a Committee, 73
Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1371 Report, 1533
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland, 180, 192, 183
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 994
Public Education, Ireland, 922

KENSINGTON, Right Hon. Lord (Comptroller of the Household), Harfordwest
Parliament—Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons), Appointment and Nomination of Select Committee, 46

KIMBERLEY, Earl of (Secretary of State for India)
Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Russia-Afghan Frontier, 1125
Burmah—Renewal of Diplomatic Arrangements, 1036

KIMBERLEY, Earl of—cont.

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 1222
Egypt (Military Expedition)—Suekin-Berber Railway, 58
India—Bengal Tenancy, 896, 836, 836, 840

KINNEAR, Dr. J., Donegal
Ireland—Law and Justice—Letterkenny Quarter Sessions, 606

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Soudan, 555
Land Forces, 479
Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1885, 1806
Education Department—Teachers in Voluntary Schools—Mr. Draper, 865
Egypt (Military Expedition)—Army in Egypt, Res. 1715
Felling Forest Act, 1878—Sale of Lands, 838
Foreign Affairs—England and Germany—The Despatch of May 5, 435
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 167, Amendt. 169
Public Health—Condition of the Upper Thames, 1636 ;—Importation of Rags, 446
Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c., Amendt. 1342, 1343, 1344, 1347
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Superannuations and Retired Allowances, 983

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES) (Questions)

The Winter Assize at Manchester, Question, Mr. West ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 10, 606
Inadequate Sentence—Case of Charles Foster, Leeds Assizes, Question, Mr. Harran ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 16, 1228
The Commuters at St. Albans, Question, Mr. Bryce ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 6, 251

Criminal Law

The Rabbicomb's Murder—Failure of the Execution at Exeter, Question, Sir R. Anstey Cross ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 10, 613
The Dynamite Explosions—Rewards to Constables, Question, Sir Frederick Milner ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 16, 1226

Law and Justice—Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copy of the warrant, purporting to be signed by the Secretary of State, by means of which Frederick Marshall was removed from the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, before his trial on a charge of wilful murder, and committed to Broadmoor Asylum as a criminal lunatic" (The Earl of Malmesbury Mar 10, 507 ; after short debate, on question resolved in the negative Literature, Science, and Art—cont.

Purchase of Pictures from the Blenheim Collection, Questions, Mr. Cartwright, Lord John Manners; Answers, Mr. Hibbert Mar 19, 1892

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris

Parliament—Public Business, 449
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 3, 1110; cl. 10, 1438; cl. 11, 1490; Schedule 1, Amendt. 1589, 1591
Pier and Harbour Works (England and Wales)—Holyhead Mail Jetty, 90

LLOYD, Mr. S. S., Warwickshire, S.

Army (Ordnance Department)—Purchase of Cartridges, 611
Navy—State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1301
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1600

Local Authorities (Expenses of Conferences) Bill (Mr. Leake, Mr.

Algernon Ejerston, Mr. Agnew, Mr. Arnold)
c. Ordered: read 1^o Mar 9 [Bill 88]
Read 2^o Mar 16

Local Government Board—Choltenham Medical Officer of Health

Question, Mr. J. A. Campbell; Answer, Mr. George Russell Mar 16, 1890

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Labourers Act) (No. 1) Bill

(H.L.) (The Lord President)
l. Presented: read 1^o Mar 12 (No. 35)

Local Government Provisional Orders (Bolton, &c.) Bill

(Mr. George Russell, Sir Charles Dilke)
c. Ordered: read 1^o Mar 11 [Bill 91]
Read 2^o Mar 18

Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) (Corwen, &c.) Bill

(Mr. George Russell, Sir Charles Dilke)
c. Ordered: read 1^o Mar 9 [Bill 90]
Read 2^o Mar 17

LOTHIAN, Marquess of

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Suakin-Berber Railway, 49

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J., Lincolnshire, N.

Army—Peat-Moss Litter, 624
Egypt (War in the Sudan)—Water Supply—Pipes and Pumps, 290, 432, 675
India—Bengal Tenancy, 633, 637

LUBBOCK, Sir J., London University

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1894-5—Land Forces, 677
Egypt (Finance, &c.)—International Arrangement, Ministerial Statement, 1600

LEASOCK, Sir J.—cont.

Germany—Treaty with Samoa, 612
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 350; cl. 4, 1462, 1463

Lunacy Laws—Case of Mr. Charles Hillman

Question, Mr. W. J. Corbett; Answer, Mr. H. H. Fowler Mar 17, 1894

Lunacy Legislation

Question, Mr. W. J. Corbett; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 19, 1895

LYONS, Dr. R. D., Dublin

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 764; add. cl. 1549
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1019, 1019, 1020

MCARTHUR, Sir W., Lambeth

New Guinea—Occupation of Northern Coast by Germany, 855

MCARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester

Africa (South)—Famine in Zululand, 1233
White Adventurers in Stellaland, 852
Egypt (War in the Sudan)—Military Co-operation of the Colonies, 113

MACARTNEY, Mr. J. W. E., Tyrone

Ireland—Poor Law—Omagh Union—Wearing of Shoes and Stockings, 441
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 12, cl. 2, 471, 732, 720, cl. 8, 1470, cl. 9, Amendt. 1474, 1479, cl. 16, 1493, 1497; Schedule 1, 1456
Public Offices—The Treasury—Mr. Herbert Gladstone, 1249

MCARTHY, Mr. J., Longford

Ireland—Board of Intermediate Education, 966
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 3, 679
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment of a Committee, 76
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1894-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1031
Public Education, Ireland, 909

MCARTHY, Mr. J. Huntly, Athlone Bo

Ireland—Poor Law—Questions
Election of Guardians—Legal Advice, 1699
Qualifications—Election of Guardians—Mr. M. K. Kelly, Athlone, 1239, 1240
Viceregal Court—Gentleman Usher to the Lord Lieutenant, 121
Law and Police—Arrest of James Stephens, 1455
Navy—The Engineers Committee—The Report, 454
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment of a Committee, 67

Merchant Shipping

The Steamship "Clyde," Question, Mr. Carington; Answer, Mr. Cairns Mar 9, 433

The Troopship "Poonah," Question, Mr. Tatton Egerton; Answer, Mr. Cairns Mar 5, 91

The Transport Service, Questions, Mr. Deasy; Answers, Mr. Cairns Mar 5, 123

METROPOLIS

Public Health—The Medical Officer of Health, St. Pancras, Question, Mr. Firth; Answer, Mr. George Russell Mar 13, 1063

Water Supply—The Water Companies' Assessment, Questions, Mr. Firth, Colonel Mahon, Mr. Coope; Answers, Sir William Harcourt Mar 9, 433

Metropolitan Asylums Board, The—Expenditure

Questions, Mr. James Stuart, Lord George Hamilton; Answers, Mr. George Russell Mar 12, 877

Metropolitan Board of Works Bill (by Order)

a. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d" (Sir James M'Garra Hogg) Mar 24,

Amendt., to leave out from "That," add "this House regrets that the Bill contains no provision to confer powers on the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Board of Works (Thames Crossings) Bill, 1884, to the effect that two crossings being immediately required a subway at or near Shadwell should be constructed by the Metropolitan Board of Works" (Mr. Ritchie) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^d

MILLTOWN, Earl of

Law and Justice—Frederick Marshall, a Criminal Lunatic, Motion for an Address, 597, 604

Poisons, 2R. 1668

MILNER, Sir F. G., York City

Army—Militia Officers—Service in Africa, 610
Dynamite Explosions—Rewards to Constables, 1238

Egypt (War in the Soudan)—Kassala, 116, 617, 1250

Navy—Ships Fitted with the Electric Light, 1239

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 8, 1455

Public Meetings—Riot at Aston Hall, Birmingham, 110, 132, 851, 882

Mines, &c.—The Dorothea Slate Quarry (Nantlle)

Question, Mr. Jones - Parry; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 19, 1600

Mines Regulation Acts—Unworth Colliery Explosion

Question, Mr. Bart; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 6, 268

Miscellaneous and other Services

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Expenditure for Miscellaneous Services, and the Expenses of the Postmaster General and the Revenue Boards" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) Mar 19, 1465

MOLLOY, Mr. B. C., King's Co.

Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1348

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 937, 938, 1030

Public Education, Ireland, 910

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester City

Egypt—Zobeir Pasha, 1231

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 27, 1806, 1514; Schedule 1, 1857

MOORE, Mr. A. J., Clonmel

Ireland—Magistracy—Ballymena Bench of Magistrates, 104

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne (Judge Advocate General, Denbighshire)

Army Discipline Act, 1841—Colonial Contingents in the Soudan, 1700

MORLEY, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)

Army—Royal Military College, Sandhurst and Woolwich, Report of Board of Visitors, 1667

Army Administration, Motion for Papers, 1060, 1062

Army (Reserve), Motion for a Return, 1670

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Yeomanry, 420

Egypt (Expeditionary Force)—Army Chaplains in the Soudan, Motion for an Address, 1212

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Suehik-Barber Railway, 83, 87

Vote of Thanks to the Troops, 841

MORLEY, Mr. A., Nottingham

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 7, Amendt. 1172, 1173, 1177

MORLEY, Mr. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Endowed School's Acts—Administration by the Charity Commissioners, 669

MORLEY, Mr. S., Bristol

Education Acts—Injustice to Nonconformists at Totnes, 677

Morocco

Prudential Claims of British Subjects against Natives, Question, Mr. W. J. Lubbock, Answer, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice Mar 16, 1270

NAV—cont.

The Transport "Arab," Question, Sir Toller-mache Sinclair; Answer, Mr. Cairne Mar 12, 876

*Widows and Orphans of Warrant Officers—
The Compassionate Fund,* Question, Sir H.
Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Cairne
Mar 6, 281; Question, Viscount Sidmouth;
Answer, The Earl of Northbrook Mar 13,
1055; Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff;
Answer, Mr. Cairne Mar 16, 1237

Pensions

Committee on Naval Pensions, Question, Sir
H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Cairne
Mar 13, 1076

Naval Pensioners on Permanent Staff, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer,
Mr. Cairne Mar 16, 1237

Pensions—Chief Petty Officers, Question, Sir
H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Sir Thomas
Brace Mar 5, 124

The Greenwich Age Pension, Question, Sir H.
Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Cairne
Mar 12, 885

State of the Navy

The Ministerial Programme, Question, Observations, Viscount Sidmouth; Reply, The Earl of Northbrook; debate thereon Mar 6, 229

Notice of Motion (Sir Edward J. Reed), Questions, Sir Edward J. Reed; Answers, Mr.
Gladstone Mar 12, 886

Building and Repairing of Ships, Observations,
Mr. Marriot; debate thereon Mar 16, 1270

Navy—Hired Transports

Amend. on Committee of Supply Mar 16,
To leave out from "That," add "the system of chartering and managing hired transports pursued by the Admiralty officials is unbusinesslike, extravagant, and detrimental to the satisfactory working of home preparations for foreign wars" (Dr. Cameron) = 1251; Question proposed, "That the words be;"
after debate, Question put, and agreed to

New Guinea—Occupation of Northern Coast by Germany

Questions, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Mr. Evelyn
Ashley Mar 12, 846; Questions, Sir
William M'Arthur, Mr. William Redmond;
Answers, Mr. Gladstone, 886

NOL, Mr. E., Dumfries, &c.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1640, 1642

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway Co.

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Sudan), Res. 379

Ireland—Fisheries—Trawling, 861

Town Tenancies—Tenants' Improvements,
129

*Ireland—Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of
Select Committee,* 891

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 1, 741, 774, 783, 793

Supply—Supplementary (Estimates, 1884-5—
Public Education, Ireland, 808, 809, 817

NORTHBROOK, Earl of (First Lord of the Admiralty)

*Australasian Colonies—Colonial Naval Force,
Motion for Papers,* 1207

Navy—Children of Warrant Officers—Compassionate Fund, 1055

State of the Navy—Ministerial Programme,
232, 236, 239, 244

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H.,
Dorset, N.

Africa (West Coast)—Cameroons—Alleged Insult by Germany to the British Flag, 823

*Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
Army Services and Military Operations in the Sudan,* 850

Asia (Central)

England and Russia—Declaration of Paris, 1083

Russia and Afghanistan—Russian Advance,
840, 1443

Egypt (Finance, &c.), 892;—International Agreement, 1445, 1446, 1448; Ministerial Statement, 1449

*War in the Sudan—Kassala, Reported
Fall of,* 1250

Estimates—Increase of the Army, 131

India—Bengal Tenancy, 837

Parliament—Business of the House, 45, 294,
1704, 1706

*Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 846, 747; cl. 4, 1161; cl. 8,
1454; cl. 10, 1483; cl. 14, 1490; cl. 27,
1816; add cl. 1843, 1861; Schedule 1,
1614, 1619, 1631*

NORTHCOTE, Mr. H. N., Kreder

Army—Royal Engineers' Department, Wool-wich, 437

*Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. add cl. 1831, 1549*

Trade and Commerce—West of England Bank, 1262

NORTON, Lord

Egypt (War in the Sudan)—Colonies (Military Service), Motion for an Address, 1216

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingdon-upon-Hull

Egypt (Finance, &c.)—International Arrangement, Ministerial Statement, 1461

*Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 8, 1470*

O'BRIEN, Colonel F., Lestrin

Ireland—Post Office—Telegraph Station at Lestrin, 1278

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

*Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, 845, add cl. 1513*

*Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Pauper Locution in Ireland,* 1000

Public Education, Ireland, 814, 919, 920, 921

ONSLOW, Mr. D. R.—cont.

East India Expenses (Military Expedition to the Soudan), Res. 223, 580
India—Bengal Tenancy Bill, 1244
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt), &c. 157
Post Office—Parcel Post Horses, 1709
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Diplomatic Services, 948, 950, 961
Embassies and Missions abroad, 1190

ORANMORE AND BROWNE, Lord

Inland Revenue—Income Tax (Ireland), 833
Roman Catholic Disabilities (Advowsons, &c.),
2R. Amendt. 1408, 1414, 1417

Ordnance Survey

County of Hereford, Question, Mr. Rankin ;
Answer, Mr. Herbert Gladstone Mar 12, 868
Hundred of Chippenham, Question, Sir Gabriel Goldney; Answer, Mr. Herbert Gladstone
Mar 5, 105
Sale of Ordnance Maps, Question, Lord George
Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Herbert Mar 6, 283

O'SHEA, Mr. W. H., Clare

Ireland—Prevention of Crime Act, 1883—
Extra Police, Clare Co. 437
Ireland—Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of
Select Committee, 591

O'SULLIVAN, Mr. W. H., Limerick Co.

Ireland—Questions
Labourers' Act, 1883—Mr. Ponnott, Official Arbitrator, 1692, 1693;—Rates of Interest, 106
Law and Police—Gambling Clubs in Dublin,
604, 609, 1233
Representation of the People Act, 1884—
Instructions to Clerks of Unions and Rate
Collectors, 850

OTWAY, Sir A. J. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Rechester

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
Army Services and Military Operations
in the Soudan, 512, 515, 527, 528
Land Forces, 472
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1757
Pay and Allowances, 1405, 1406
Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Re-
comm. add. cl. 1043
Navy (Supplementary Estimate) Military
Operations in Egypt, &c., 141, 142, 147, 149,
154, 169
Parliament—Private Business—Railway Rates
and Charges Bills, 116
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 7, 1173; cl. 8, 1460, 1462, 1463,
1473; cl. 10, 1483; cl. 13, 1499, 1500,
add. cl. 1534. Schedule 1, 1634, 1639, 1640
Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1343,
1344, 1350, 1351, 1352
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Diplomatic Services, 950
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 993, 994, 1003,
1011, 1021, 1024

VOL. CXXV. [THIRD SERIES.] (cont.)

OTWAY, Sir A. J.—cont.

Prisons, Ireland, 145
Public Education, Ireland, 909, 917, 918,
920, 924
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great
Britain, 179

Oxford University—Examination in Dogmatic Theology

Question, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answer, Mr.
Gladstone Mar 19, 1708

*Pacific, Islands of the—see titles Western Pacific—South Pacific—New Guinea,
&c.*

PAOET, Mr. R. H., Somersetshire, Mid

Parliament—Private Business—Railway Rates
and Charges Bills, 116, 1073, 1074
Supply—Supplementary Estimates—Army of Occupation in Egypt, 1201
Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1194
Grant to the Family of the late General
Charles George Gordon, 1193

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perth

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 316; cl. 2, 823; Schedule 1, 1627

Parliament

LORDS—

Private Bills, Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown; Reply, The Earl of Redesdale Mar 16, 1203
Election of Scotch Representative Peers, Question, Observations, The Earl of Galloway;
Reply, The Lord Chancellor Mar 12, 842
Business of the House—The War in the Soudan—Military Cooperation of the Colonies, Question, The Earl of Camperdown. Answer, Earl Granville Mar 10, 327

COMMONS—

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons)

After short debate, Standing Committee appointed, to control the arrangements of the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the department of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House Mar 4. Committee nominated;
List of the Committee, 46

PRIVATE BUSINESS

Railway Rates and Charges Bills, Question,
Mr. R. H. Paet. Answer, Sir Arthur
Otway Mar 5, 116. Question, Sir Bernhard
Samuelson. Answer, Mr. Chamberlain
Mar 9, 437. Questions, Mr. H. H. Sir
Joseph Pease, Mr. Causton, Mr. R. H. Paet,
Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Tomlinson,
Mr. Hicks, Mr. Scuster-Bentley. Answers,
Mr. Chamberlain Mar 13, 1070. Question,
Mr. Peacock. Answer, Mr. Chamberlain
Mar 19, 1702

THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE

Adjournment—Rule 2—Adjournment of the House—India—The Bengal Tenancy Bill

3 R

(cont.)

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill (Mr. Gladstone, The Marquess of Hartington, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Attorney General, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman)

c. Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill); Question again proposed; Debate resumed [Third Night] Mar 4, 1; after long debate, Debate adjourned

Debate resumed [Fourth Night] Mar 6, 297; after debate, Question, "That Mr. Speaker, &c." put, and agreed to; Committee [First Night]—n.p. [Bill 49]

Committee [Second Night]—n.p. Mar 10, 639
Committee [Third Night]—n.p. Mar 11, 752
Committee [Fourth Night]—n.p. Mar 13, 1089
Committee [Fifth Night]—n.p. Mar 17, 1447
Committee [Sixth Night]—n.p. Mar 18, 1888

Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Bill (Mr. Attorney General, Sir Charles Dilke)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 18 [Bill 99]

Parliamentary Elections (Second Ballot) Bill (Mr. Brett, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Broadhurst)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 12 [Bill 94]

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Cork City
Ireland—The Constabulary—Free Force, 1381, 1384, 1387, 1390, 1393, 1397, 1405
Navy (Supplementary) Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 174
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 297, 308; cl. 2, 392, 639, 641, 642, 659, 660

Patent Medicines Act—Legislation
Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 12, 864

PATRICK, Mr. R. W. COCHRAN-, Ayrshire N.
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 624

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881—Arms Licences—James Lord, of Mount Nugent, Co. Cavan
Questions, Mr. Bigger, Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 9, 423, Mar 13, 1064

Peasant Proprietary and Acquisition of Land by Occupiers Bill (Mr. James Collinge, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. George Palmer, Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst)
c. Bill withdrawn Mar 13, 1903 [Bill 45]

Peasant Proprietary and Acquisition of Land by Occupiers (No. 2) Bill (Mr. James Collinge, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. George Palmer, Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst)

c. Ordered Mar 13
Read 1^o Mar 19 [Bill 97]

PEASE, Sir J. W., Durham, S.
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—Army Services and Military Operations in the Sudan, Amendt. 512, 515, 534, 537
Land Forces, 471
Egypt—Suakin-Berber Railway—Contract for Locomotives, 431
Private Bill Legislation, 2R. 848
Railway Rates and Charges, 1073

PEDDIE, Mr. J. DICK-, Kilmarnock, Jc.
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 312, 313; Schedule 1, 1636, 1640

PEEL, Right Hon. A. W. (see SPEAKER, The)

PEEL, Right Hon. Sir R., Huntingdon
Ireland—Queen's College, 608
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. Schedule 1, Amendt. 1898

PERCY, Lord A. M. A., Westminster
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1779
Education Department—School Board Taxation, 264

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester Ro.
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 9, Amendt. 1474, 1477, 1490
Supply—Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1344
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Public Education, Ireland, 910

Pier and Harbour Works (England and Wales)
Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Herbert Mar 8, 99.—Holyhead Mail Jetty.
Questions, Mr. Morgan Lloyd, Mr. Gray; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain Mar 8, 99
[See title Ireland]

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Sir Lyon, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's University
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 343, 390, 400, 610, 640, 803, 812, 813

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R., Dublin University
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 309, 311, cl. 2, 373, 380
Town Parks (Ireland), Motion for a Select Committee, 1377

Poisons Bill n. l.; (The Lord President)
l. Presented, read 1^o Mar 9, No. 23.
Read 2^o, after short debate Mar 19, 1663

Railway Rates and Terminals—cont.

mission with respect to terminals; and also of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company v. Gidlow" (The Lord Hen- niker) Mar 9, 405; after short debate, Mo- tion amended, and agreed to

RAMSAY, Mr. J., Falkirk, &c
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 316

RANKIN, Mr. J., Loominster
Ordnance Survey—County of Hereford, 868

READ, Mr. Clare S., Norfolk, W.
Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Cattle Disease (Ireland), 1231
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 27, 1517

Real Assets Administration Bill
(Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Warton)
a. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 4 [Bill 79]

REDESDALE, Earl of (Chairman of Com- mittees)
British Agricultural Association, 2R. 1048
Parliament—Private Bills, 1204
Railway Rates and Terminals, Motion for a Paper, 420
Trinity College, Dublin (Perpetuity Grants),
2R. 47, 48

REDMOND, Mr. J. E., New Ross
Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—James
Ellis French, late Detective Director, 439

REDMOND, Mr. W. H. K., Wexford
Army—The Force in Ireland, 131
Ireland—Questions
Law and Justice—Grand Jury of Meath—
Exemption from Service, 881
Law and Police—Meeting of the National League—Intrusion of the Police at Cashel, 279
Magistracy—Mr. W. W. Newenham, Co.
Cork, 1066
Post Office—Sub-Postmaster at Cramford,
Co. Wexford, 106, 107, 1082
Viceregal Court—Gentleman Usher to the
Lord Lieutenant, 121
New Guinea—Occupation of Northern Coast
by Germany, 889
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 314, 316, cl. 2, Motion for reporting
Progress, 390, 649, 673, 675
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Grant to the Family of the late General
Charles George Gordon, 1038
National Gallery, 219
Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 998, 1000, 1011
Public Education, Ireland, 912, 915, 917,
927, 928
Superannuations and Retired Allowances,
988

REED, Sir E. J., Cardiff
Navy—Armoured Vessels—Error in Returns,
850, 851
State of the Navy, Notice of Motion, (Sir Edward J. Reed), 848, 887
Parliament—Business of the House, 450

Registration Acts Consolidation—Legisla- tion
Questions, Mr. E. Stanhope, Sir R. Assheton
Cross; Answers, The Attorney General
Mar 19, 1690

Registration (Occupation Voters) Bill
(*Mr. Attorney General, Sir Charles Dike, Mr.
Hibbert, Mr. Henry H. Fowler*)

c. Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Dawson; Answers
The Attorney General; Question, Mr. Callan
[no reply]; Question, Mr. Craig Sellar;
Answer, The Lord Advocate Mar 8, 133
Read 2^o, and referred to a Select Committee, after short debate Mar 13, 1202 [Bill 63]

REID, Mr. R. T., Hereford
Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
Land Forces, 506

Representation of the People Act, 1884
Instructions to Clerks of Unions and Rate
Collectors in Ireland, Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. Kenny; Answers, Mr. Campbell-
Bannerman Mar 12, 660
Registration of Electors, Questions, Mr. Healy;
Answers, The Solicitor General for Ireland
Mar 13, 1066

RICHARD, Mr. H., Merthyr Tydfil
Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Declaration of Paris, 1064

RIXON, Marquess of
India—Bengal Tenancy Bill, 829

RITCHIE, Mr. C. T., Tower Hamlets
Egypt (Military Expedition)—Nashin-Berber
Railway—Supply of Pumps, 874
Metropolitan Board of Works, 2R. Amendt.
245, 263, 265, 272
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 6, 1124, 1126, cl. 9, Amendt.
1447, 1462; cl. 27, Amendt. 1503

River Thames Bill *Mr. Story-Maschelyne,
Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Elton, Mr.
Walter James, Mr. Sellar, Mr. Mellor*
c. Bill withdrawn Mar 9, 595 [Bill 71]

River Thames (No 2) Bill (*Mr. Story-
Maschelyne, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr.
Elton, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Sellar, Colonel Mabius, Mr. Mellor*)
c. Ordered, read 1^o Mar 9 [Bill 90]

SCOTLAND—cont.

The Magistracy (Scotland)

Mr. William Ivory, Sheriff of Inverness-shire.
Questions, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Macfarlane;
Answers, The Lord Advocate Mar 19, 1885

SCOTT, Mr. M. D., Sussex, E.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 14, 1497

SELLAR, Mr. A. C., Haddington, &c.

Excise Licences (Scotland), 447
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. Schedule 1, 1650
Registration (Occupation Voters) Bills, 133

SEXTON, Mr. T., Sligo

Board of Trade — Pay of Lightkeepers, Great Britain, 277

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Consid.
cl. 2, 404; Re-comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1040;
add. cl. 1041, 1042

Ireland—Questions

Commissioners of National Education—
Result of School Examinations—Supply to School Managers, 96, 97

Constabulary—The Free Force, 1390

Criminal Law—Trial of Mitchell Beatty and M'Williams at Armagh Assizes, 1432, 1433

Fishery Piers and Harbours—Tarbert Pier,
607, 608

Labourers' Act—Repayment of Loans, 291

Law and Justice—Disorderly Language—
Case of George Barker, Clifney, Co.
Sligo, 1684

Law and Police — Alleged Misconduct of Emergency Men at Clare Island, Co.
Mayo, 272;—Riots at Derry — Alleged Orange Attack on Sisters of Mercy, 621

National Education, 1708

Poor Law—Omagh Workhouse Children—
Wearing of Shoes and Stockings, 441, 442

Ireland—Crime and Outrage—Questions

Assault on Denis Murphy, Castleisland,
Co. Kerry, 286, 614, 615, 676

Ballyforan Murder Case, 440, 441

Fight for a Drum — Fivemiletown Petty Sessions, 97, 98

Ireland—Magistracy—Questions

276

Ballymena Bench of Magistrates, 166

Kildare and Clare Counties, 1683

Petty Sessions—Clewslare District, Co.
Leitrim, 1226

Right of Suppressing Public Meetings, 446

Ireland — Salmon Fisheries, Nomination of
Select Committee, 585, 594

Ireland — Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, 1676

Law and Police—Sunday News-vendors, 1437

Municipal Voters (Relief), Comm. 222

Navy (Supplementary Estimate) (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 154, 159

Parliament—Adjournment, 1843

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons), Appointment and Nomination of Select Committee, 46

Questions — Order — Newspaper Press—
Offensive Cartoons, 1670

SEXTON, Mr. T.—cont.

Parliamentary Elections—Expenses of Candidates, 264

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. 22, 25, 26; cl. 2, 300, 306, 650, 651,
749, 796, 811, 812, 813

Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment of a Committee, Motion for Adjournment, 64, 65, 88

Post Office — Continental Mails (Yorkshire),
605

Public Offices—The Treasury — Mr. Herbert
Gladstone, 1260

Scotland—Magistracy—Mr. W. Ivory, Sheriff of Inverness-shire, 1685, 1696

Supply — Civil Contingencies Fund, &c. 1344,
1349, Amendt. 1351

Report, 1806, 1810

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Court of Bankruptcy, Ireland, 161

Grant to the Family of the late General
Charles George Gordon, 1038

Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 993, 1026,
1031

Prisons, Ireland, 124, 165, 126

Public Education, Ireland, 894, 899, 911, 927

Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great
Britain, 179, 180

Science and Art Department, 187

Temporary Commissions, 1032, 1033

Shannon Navigation Bill [Bill 64]

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Herbert Gladstone)

c. Select Committee nominated Mar 6. List of the Committee, 404

SHEIL, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Ireland — Law and Justice — Grand Jury of Meath—Exemption from Service, 880

Magistracy—Oldcastle Petty Sessions, 886

SIDMOUTH, Viscount

Africa (South East Coast)—St. Lucia Bay, 62

Australasian Colonies—Colonial Naval Force,
Motion for Papers, 1208

Burmah — Renewal of Diplomatic Arrangements, 1054

Navy—State of the Navy — Ministerial Programme, 229, 231, 236, 243

Children of Warrant Officers — Compassionate Fund, 1033

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Downsbury

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), 1232

SINCLAIR, Sir J. G. T., Cairness

Navy—The Transport "Arab," 876

SLAGO, Mr. J., Manchester

Africa (East Coast) — German Associations
near Zanzibar, 612

Army Estimates (Supplementary), 1884-5—
Army Services and Military Operations in
the Sudan, 546

East India Expenses (Expedition to the Sudan), Res. 542

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution),
Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1030, 1106

STRATHNAIRN, Lord

Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Russo-Afghan Frontier, 1428

STUART, Mr. J., Hackney

Metropolitan Asylums Board—Expenditure, 877

SUDELEY, Lord

Inland Revenue—Income Tax (Ireland), 833
Railway Rates, 223, 226
Railway Rates and Terminals, Motion for a Paper, 415, 417, 420

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Westmeath

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 311, 603
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Pauper Lunatics in Ireland, 1023

SUPPLY

The Estimates—Increase of the Army, Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Gladstone Mar 5, 130
Army Estimates—The Supplementary Estimates, Questions, Lord George Hamilton, Colonel Stanley; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington Mar 5, 131
Royal Palaces—Her Majesty's Palace of Windsor, Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Mr. Herbert Gladstone Mar 12, 846

Supply—Miscellaneous and other Services

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the Expenditure for Miscellaneous Services, and the Expenses of the Postmaster General and the Revenue Boards" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) Mar 19, 1468

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee Mar 5, 133—NAVY (SUPPLEMENTARY) (MILITARY OPERATIONS IN EGYPT)—CIVIL SERVICES (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1884-5)—CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE—Votes 11, 14, 22, & 30—CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART—Votes 1, 7, & 11

Resolutions reported Mar 6

Considered in Committee Mar 9, 453—ARMY ESTIMATES (SUPPLEMENTARY, 1884-5)—ADDITIONAL NUMBER OF MEN—(OPERATIONS IN THE SUDAN)

Resolutions reported Mar 10

Considered in Committee Mar 12, 894—CIVIL SERVICES (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1884-5)—CLASS IV.—EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART—Vote 14—CLASS V.—FOREIGN AND COLONIAL SERVICES—Votes 1, 6, & 7—CLASS VI.—NON-EFFECTIVE AND CHARITABLE SERVICES—Votes 1 & 5—CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS—Vote 1

Resolutions reported, and, after short debate, agreed to Mar 13, 1194

Considered in Committee Mar 16, 1305—NAVY ESTIMATES—Departmental Statement, CIVIL SERVICES—CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS—Vote on Account, CIVIL SERVICES £1,533,650; CIVIL SERVICE EXCESSES

Resolutions reported, and, after long debate, agreed to Mar 19, 1806

Supply—cont.

Considered in Committee Mar 19, 1733—ARMY ESTIMATES (SUPPLEMENTARY)—Departmental Statement
Resolutions reported Mar 20

Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Bill

Questions, Viscount Crichton, Mr. Gibson; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman Mar 6, 282

Reduction of the Irish Bench, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. A. Dickson, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Speaker Mar 6, 102

Suspension of Erections (Scotland) Bill

Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Sir William Harcourt Mar 19, 1704

SUTHERLAND, Mr. T., Greenock

France and China—International Law—Seizure of the Steamship "Glenroy," 1237
Navy—Hired Transports, Res. 1264, 1266, 1267

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Egypt (Military Expedition)—Chaplain in the Sudan, 107
Law and Police (England and Wales)—Wandering Lunatics, 1007, 1008
Police and Sanitary Regulations, Appointment of a Committee, 87, 88

TOLLEMACHE, Mr. H. J., Cheshire, W.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, 1113; cl. 27, 1511, 1512, 1522

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1706, 1803
East India (Loan), Comm. 1606
Ireland—Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, 1552
National Gallery—Photographs of Pictures, 870
Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 3, 1111; cl. 16, 1613, 1623, 1626
Post Office—Unstamped Letters from Egypt, 443
Railway Rates and Charges, 1074
Spain—Commercial Negotiations—The Spanish Antilles, 831
Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—Diplomatic Services, 972
Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1103
Navy, 1039, 1040

TOTTENHAM, Mr. A. L., Leirtrim

Ireland—Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, Motion for Adjournment, 1578

Trade and Commerce—The West of England Bank

Question, Mr. H. S. Northcote; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain Mar 16, 1262

WAYS AND MEANS

Considered in Committee Mar 19, 1845—
DEFICIENCIES 1884-5 £2,130,034 5s. 7d.—
SERVICES 1885-6 £10,804,750—CONSOLIDATED
FUND
Resolutions reported Mar 20

WAYS AND MEANS (Questions)

Inland Revenue Officers—Retirements, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Hibbert Mar 19, 1887

The Financial Statement—Duty on Beer, Question, Mr. Hicks; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 12, 849

Revenue and Expenditure—Prohibit Duty on Freehold Property, Question, Mr. Alderman Lawrence; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 16, 1261

The Income Tax—Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 10, 607

WEBSTER, Mr. J., Aberdeen

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. cl. 2, 382

WEMYSS, Earl of

Army Administration, Motion for Papers, 1062
Army (Auxiliary Forces), Notice, 1668

Egypt (War in the Soudan)—Colonies, (Military Service, Motion for an Address, 1212, 1218, 1222

India—Bengal Tenancy Bill, 899, 897, 834, 838, 840

Parliament—Business of the House—War in the Soudan—Military Co-operation of the Colonies, 597

Water Companies (Regulation of Powers), 2R. 1426

WEST, Mr. H. W., Ipswich

Law and Justice (England and Wales)—Winter Amuse at Manchester, 606

Western Pacific, Islands of the Alleged Cession of Islands, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley Mar 12, 849

The New Hebrides—Samoa and Tonga, Questions, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 5, 103;—Surrender of British Rights, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 5, 125; Questions, Mr. Gorst, Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 9, 449; Samoa—Treaty with Germany, Question, Mr John Lubbock, Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 10, 612

[See titles South Pacific—New Guinea]

West India Islands—Reciprocity Treaty with the United States

Question, Mr. E. Stachope; Answer, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 838

WHITLEY, Mr. E., Liverpool

Elections in Counties (Hours of Poll), Comm. 401

WILLIAMSON, Mr. S., St. Andrews, fr.

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. Schedule 1, 1625

WILLIS, Mr. W., Colchester

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—National Gallery, 218

WILMOT, Sir J. E., Warwickshire, B.

Parliament—Business of the House—Order of Business, 293

Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution), Comm. 5; cl. 2, 684, cl. 2, 1000, 1111; add. cl. 1533, 1534, 1536

WILSON, Mr. C. H., Kingston-upon-Hull

Navy (Building, &c.)—Belton Cruisers, 618, 616

WOLFF, Sir H. D., Portsmouth

Asia (Central)—England and Russia—Negotiations, 1245, 1246

Russo-Afghan Frontier, 1420, 1441

Australasian Colonies—Queensland—Movement for Separation, 99

Egypt—Questions

Finance, &c., 99

Mahdi, 1444

Prince Bismarck's Speech in the Reichstag, 126

War in the Soudan—Battle of Tamai—Mr. Cathie, R.N., 287;—Military Co-operation of the Colonies, 116

Navy—Questions

Committee on Naval Pensions, 1076

Greenwich Age Pension, 866

Naval Pensions, 1227

Orphans of Warrant Officers, 207, 1227

Pensions—Petty Officers, 126

State of the Navy—Sinking Fund, 1203

Navy (Supplementary Estimate (Military Operations in Egypt, &c.), 149

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
Diplomatic Services, 964, 965, 966, 961

Embassies and Missions Abroad, 1100

WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. STUART-, Sheffield

Ireland—Town Parks, Motion for a Select Committee, 1863

Supply—Supplementary Estimates, 1884-5—
National Gallery, 218

Zanzibar—Succession to the Sovereignty

Questions, Mr. Bourke, Answers, Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice Mar 12, 833

END OF VOL. CCXCV., AND THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1884-5.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

3 9015 03393 5571

